THE RIGHT HON.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, BART.

[His Majesty having prorogued parliament on the 15th of August, the late ministry were, by virtue of the royal prerogative, dismissed on the 14th of November; parliament was dissolved by proclamation on the 29th of December, and a new one summoned for February, 19, 1835. Sir Robert Peel, being then in Italy, was sent for to England and empowered to form a new administration; the right hon. baronet, in the new Cabinet, occupying the joint-offices of First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer.]

CHOICE OF A SPEAKER.

FEBRUARY 19, 1835.

Lord Francis Egerton, in a highly eulogistic speech, proposed that the Right Hon. Sir Charles Manners Sutton do take the chair.

Mr. Denison, moved, "That the member for the city of Edinburgh, the Right Hon. James Abercromby, do take the chair."

Sir Charles Manners Sutton and Mr. Abercromby having addressed the House, a long and stormy debate ensued, in the course of which sundry charges were preferred against the late Speaker, and, among others, that of conniving at the dismissal of the late government.

Rising after Lord John Russell,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he should pursue the course which had been generally pursued by every one who had hitherto taken part in the discussion—and confine his observations to the question immediately before the House. Such a course appeared to him not only wise in relation to the topic under discussion, but to be especially necessary, as they had not yet gone through one of the formalities essential to constitute a House of Parliament. He should in the first place speak as a witness; and it would be his duty, a duty perhaps unnecessary for him to discharge, to confirm, in as far as he had any knowledge, the statement of his right hon. friend, the member for the University of Cambridge. The only part of the transactions, however, to which he would speak, occurred after his return to this country. Of what took place previous to his arrival he could say nothing. Having undertaken the duty which his sovereign had assigned him, he sought an interview with his right hon. friend; for he was anxious, from the high opinion he entertained of the talents, character, and experience of his right hon. friend in public business, to procure his assistance and co-operation. Having informed his right hon. friend of the duty he had undertaken, and the principle upon which he should endeavour to construct his administration; namely, that he should seek for aid from every man of character and talent who could unite with him consistently with his honour and his principles; he asked his right hon. friend, whether or not it was consistent with his feelings and sense of duty to enter into the service of the Crown? He received from his right hon. friend this answer—That he did not seek employment in any official capacity in the service of the Crown. There was a defect apparently in that answer which he would supply, as probably it would furnish the main reason which had induced the right hon. gentleman at such a time to withhold his services from his Majesty. The right hon. gentleman stated, that he had served in the chair of the House of Commons for a period of eighteen years; and he felt, that if he were to enter into the arena of political discussion as a member of the government, he should, after so long a service in the chair, and his personal connexion with, and authority in, that situation, run the risk of lowering it, if he appeared on the floor of the House of Commons as a member of the government. That was the reason which his right hon. friend assigned for his desire to withhold his services from the public. When he understood from his right hon. friend, that he was not willing upon that ground to enter into the service of the Crown as a member of the House of Commons, fearing that there something might occur to lower the authority of the office he had held, if he became a member of the government at a time when it was likely that there would be stormy discussions; having received that answer, he did not feel it to be his duty to consult his right hon. friend, either as to the formation of the government or its policy—and not one word passed between his right hon. friend and himself on the subject. He had asked his right hon. friend, whether he would wish again to fill the chair of the House of Commons in the event of a dissolution? He replied, that he had no wish or feeling upon the subject—that it was a matter upon which he could have no personal interest, in consequence of the former liberality of the House of Commons. At the same time his right hon. friend stated, that the impediment of ill-health, which before led him to meditate retirement, no longer existed; and that, if he (Sir R. Peel) thought that his services would be of any value to the public, as long as his health would permit he should feel it his duty not to withhold them, if placed in the chair of that House. He had expressed no opinion on the subject, and least of all any wish that his right hon. friend should resume the office, if there should be any indisposition on the part of the House to receive him. These were the circumstances, as far as his knowledge went, of the course pursued by his right hon. friend. The question now was, whether, since his right hon. friend had professed his willingness to serve, it was right and fitting that they should select another speaker. The noble lord, the member for Devonshire, said, that the House had a perfect right to choose whom they pleased. Was that the question at issue? Who contested the noble lord's position? The noble lord, who was the loudest in claiming this prerogative, ought to know that it was a trust conferred for the public good, and ought to be exercised with discretion—that it did not become him to insist on the exercise of the barren and abstract right, but to consider the more important point—namely, whether it could be exercised with justice to individuals and advantage to the public. The noble lord had said he could quote precedents; but with all his historical research, the only case which the noble lord had been able to set against the example of Earl Grey and the first reformed parliament, was the conduct of Lord North with respect to Sir Fletcher Norton. A worthy precedent truly! Did that case proceed upon any intelligible principle? Was not the argument employed then something like that used upon the present occasion—namely, “You have given us offence upon one ground, or we wish to gain an advantage upon one ground, but we will assign another for depriving you of the means of rendering further service to the House of Commons?” The ground of Lord North's objection to Sir Fletcher Norton was a speech delivered by the latter at the bar of the House of Lords. Did Lord North assign that as his reason for displacing him? No. His reason was pretended solicitude for the health of Sir Fletcher Norton. Thus it was evident that Lord North was so convinced that whatever might be the abstract right of the House, they would, by exercising it, inflict injustice upon Sir Fletcher Norton, that he carefully avoided stating in the face of the House his real reason for wishing to get rid of him. If there was any thing analogous in the two cases it was this, that both in the one and the other an offence was imputed, and the opponents of the candidate said, We will act upon that imputation as truth, and yet assign for not re-

electing you some other cause. The noble lord also quoted another precedent, that of Sir Edward Seymour, which he must have selected when it was thought that the charge could have been successfully brought against his right hon. friend of having counselled or instigated the dissolution of the last parliament; for the part of the precedent which extorted the slightest cheer was that in which it was insinuated, that if he should be re-elected, the speaker would do as he had done before. But how did the case of Sir Edward Seymour bear upon the present one? The House of Commons had unanimously elected him speaker. [A member: Against the wishes of the king]. "Against I care not what," said the right hon. baronet, with more than his accustomed energy. But he ought to beg pardon for his apparent warmth. He might say with sincerity, that he felt the duties which had devolved on him to be far too onerous for him to set in the House any such example as that of being betrayed into unbecoming warmth. He was about to observe, when he was interrupted, that the case of Sir Edward Seymour had not the least reference to the present discussion. The Commons then elected a speaker whose appointment the Crown refused to sanction, and wished to promote the election of another; it was therefore evident that the strong and just reasons urged by the Commons for adhering to their original choice which had been quoted by the noble lord, were applicable to another and totally different state of circumstances from that which now occupied the attention of the House. Not in the least doubting the right of the House to refuse to re-appoint the late speaker, the question was, whether such a refusal was fair and just, not towards the individual alone, but towards the House. Was the House called upon by a sense of fitness, or justice, to choose any other person in the place of him who had received his appointment by the almost unanimous sanction of six parliaments—who had served the House of Commons for eighteen years, against whom every charge had been abandoned, whose health permitted him again to undertake the office, and who was willing, without the possibility of his being actuated by any motive of personal interest, to continue in the performance of its duties? Would the House allow their late speaker to suffer by six weeks' uncontradicted calumnies against him, uncontradicted by himself, or by his authority, until that day, and which calumnies, and not a sense of his unsuitness for the office, had raised a feeling against him amongst the constituents of some hon. members? Might he be allowed to ask the noble lord opposite a question? Was it not the noble lord's own impression—and if it were he was sure the noble lord would have the manliness to avow it—that the late speaker was concerned in instigating and provoking the dissolution of the parliament? ["Don't answer."] He appealed to the noble lord's candour.

Lord John Russell said, that his impression was, that the late speaker went no further than this—that he took an active part with respect to the formation of a government, which government could do no other than dissolve the parliament. His grounds of objection, therefore, had certainly been founded on the supposition, that the right hon. gentleman had contributed by his conduct to the dissolution of the late parliament.

Sir Robert Peel said, that the impression on his mind was, that the noble lord at a public meeting had expressly declared the ground of his objection to the re-election of his right hon. friend to be, not that he had attended councils, but that he had been a party to the advice through which the parliament had been dissolved. That was the ground taken up by the public press, and the ground on which some constituencies had advised their representatives to vote against the re-election of his right hon. friend. He implored hon. members to reflect, that if their impression against his right hon. friend rested originally on erroneous grounds, they were bound in manliness to refuse to vote upon those grounds. They might oppose the re-election of his right hon. friend upon public principle, if they thought it applicable to the case; but if either they, or their constituents, originally formed the determination of opposing him upon the erroneous grounds which he had adverted to, he had sufficient confidence in their manliness and honour to believe that they would not act upon that determination. There had been something said about a "public principle," involved in the decision of the present question. Now, what were the arguments advanced in support of this proposition? One hon. member said, that the speaker ought to represent the opinion of the majority of the House. Was that a good principle to establish? Was it wise, or conducive to the dignity and just station of the chair, that its possessor should ever be seeking favour with the political majority in order to secure his re-election? Was it not infinitely wiser to look at the qualifications of the individual to fill the office for which he was proposed than to consider his political opinions? But that question had been decided by the first reformed parliament. Earl Grey and his adherents, having a great majority, thought it right to elect the right hon. gentleman, though differing from them in political principles, whom some of the same party now opposed. They had the power then to enforce their opinions, and why did they depart from what they now called a great principle, and wished so urgently to carry into effect? The first decision of the first reformed parliament carried with it this conclusion, that the House did not feel itself called upon to elect a speaker whose political opinions were in accordance with those of the majority of its members. But what was the explanation of that given by the noble lord? The noble lord said:—"We wanted to avail ourselves of the advantages of the right hon. gentleman's character, judgment, abilities, and experience, and therefore we elected him." But he had served their turn; he had done his work; he had answered their object; and (with singular ingratitude he must say) they would now dismiss him, after they had established the principle of electing a speaker not of their own political opinions, when they had the power of doing so. After they had availed themselves of his services, and after he had co-operated with them in establishing the character of the first reform parliament for decorum, they would unfairly take the very first opportunity to subject him to disgrace. ["No, no."] No, no, indeed; for no disgrace could be heaped upon a man who had conscientiously done his duty. It was beyond the reach of a majority to do that; but it was not beyond the reach of a majority to injure the character of the House. The hon. member who nominated the right hon. member for Edinburgh, in a speech which he might be allowed to say exhibited much good sense, said that the election of speaker was an important matter at the present time, because various important matters were about to be brought under discussion, and amongst others, questions relating to the constitution of the present and the dismissal of the late government, and, in order that justice might be done to the discussion of those questions, the hon. member urged that an impartial speaker should be appointed. Well, whom did he propose? He had taken down the hon. member's words; he said that the House required an impartial mediator to still the raging storms that would arise amidst the conflicts of exasperated parties. Did then the hon. member propose to select a gentleman who had stood aloof from party? No; his choice fell upon a distinguished member of the very government whose removal was to be brought under the consideration of the House. If impartiality in the speaker was so desirable, let not the House select a gentleman to fill that office who was a member of that government, the conduct of which was likely to occupy the attention of the House. There were two candidates for the speakership—one, the late speaker, who had served the House during eighteen years, and been elected by seven parliaments; who had declined to accept office under the Crown because he thought it would have a tendency to lower the authority of the chair;—the other a member of the late government, with respect to whom not a word of disrespect should fall from his lips, but whose impartiality the House had no means of judging of. Could they doubt which they could give the preference to? The House was bound to be as careful not to do injustice to an individual as it was not to abandon its principles or to lessen its own character. The House had another and most important duty to perform. If it had a want of confidence in his Majesty's government, let it make that fairly and openly a ground of address to the Crown; but do not let it do injustice to an individual whose high merits all admitted, by selecting him as the first victim of its displeasure. He resisted, therefore, the motion of the hon. member for Surrey not only on individual and personal, but on general grounds; and as the office in question was the only one which the House had the power of bestowing, let them make such a selection as would be in accordance with the examples which both the unreformed and the reformed House had afforded them. The only objection of a personal nature made by the noble lord to the appointment of his right hon. friend was, that he had attended some three or four privy councils which were purely of a formal character. That one charge was to invalidate the impartiality, dignity, ability, and experience practised during eighteen years. But what was the nature of this charge? If it were not fitting that the speaker of that House should be a privy councillor, let there be a regulation to that effect; but if he be one, why should he be blamed for performing the duties of the office? An erroneous opinion was entertained by a part of the public, that the meetings of the privy council which had been referred to were deliberative assemblies. The noble lord opposite also was quite mistaken when he said, that they were attended only by members of the cabinet. Any members of the council not members of the cabinet might attend, and they frequently did so. Their duty was merely ministerial, and they offered not a word of advice to the sovereign. If the speaker were in London, living in the House assigned to him for a residence by his Majesty, and received a summons to attend a privy council, on what ground was he to refuse to perform his duty? The charge respecting the late speaker attending councils was not worthy of one moment's attention, after his solemn disclaimer that he had been directly or indirectly a party to the dismissal of the late government, the formation of the present one, or the dissolution of parliament. For his part, he would give his vote in favour of his right hon. friend, of whose experience and ability he had had so many proofs. He implored hon. members to consider, that the office of speaker was one which ought not to be made the subject of party feeling. The precincts of the chair ought not to be converted into ground on which political battles might be fought. He resisted the appointment of the right hon. member for Edinburgh, not because he had any doubt with respect to his qualifications for the office of speaker, but on the double ground—first, that the qualifications of his right hon. friend were superior from his long practice and experience; and secondly, because he thought that his supersession would be unjust towards him individually, and have a tendency to disparage the authority of the chair, and the House of Commons itself.

On a division the numbers were, for Sir Charles Sutton, 306; for Mr. Abercromby, 316; majority in favour of Mr. Abercromby, 10.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE KING'S SPEECH.

FEBRUARY 24, 1835.

Lord Sandon briefly proposed, "That an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, in answer to his Majesty's most gracious Speech from the Throne.

The Address having been read from the Chair—Lord Morpeth then rose, and after justifying the policy of the late government, moved an additional clause to the Address, by way of amendment. Mr. Bannerman seconded the amendment.

SIR ROBERT PEEL rose to address the House, and spoke as follows:—Sir,—I feel, that in the situation in which I stand upon this occasion, it might seem to argue a disrespect towards this House, totally alien to my feelings, if I were to allow this debate to close, and the division to be taken, without availing myself of the opportunity which is presented of giving the House those explanations which have been required during the preceding discussion. However my opinion may have occasionally differed from many of those whom I have the honour to address, I trust that I have never, upon any occasion, or under any circumstances, shown a disposition to treat with disrespect any portion of the members of this House, or to shrink from giving an explanation, either as to my conduct when acting in a private capacity, or when called upon as a member of his Majesty's government to give those explanations, or to express those views, which, in the performance of my public duty, I am bound to submit to the House.

I shall, therefore, with the permission of the House, trusting to the continuance of that indulgence which in former parliaments I have so frequently experienced, and relying upon their consideration of the position in which I stand, charged as I am with the important duties which have fallen to my lot—I shall, I repeat, under these circumstances, confidently reckon upon their patient and indulgent attention, whilst I proceed to recapitulate and review the matters which have been alluded to in the course of the debate—the doubts expressed, and the explanations demanded.

I, shall, in the first place, refer to the circumstances under which the present government was constituted; I shall defend the course which I thought it my duty to advise the king to pursue at the period of its formation; and give accurate delineations of the measures which it is the intention of his Majesty's government to introduce; those explanations the House has a right to require, and I should shrink from that duty which is imposed upon me if I did not avow a willing disposition to afford them. I stand here as the minister of the Crown—placed in this situation by no act of my own—in consequence of no dexterous combination with those to whose principles I have been uniformly opposed, and with whom I might frequently have made, had I been so inclined, a temporary alliance for the purpose of embarrassing the former government. I stand here in fulfilment of a public duty, shrinking from no responsibility, with no arrogant pretensions of defying or disregarding the opinions of the majority of this House, yet still resolved to persevere to the last, so far as is consistent with the honour of a public man, in maintaining the prerogative of the Crown, and in fulfilling those duties which I owe to my king and to my country.

In vindication of the course which I have pursued, it is necessary that I should refer to the circumstances which preceded the dissolution of the last government. I have been asked whether I would impose on the king, in his personal capacity, the responsibility of the dismissal of that government? In answer to this question I will at once declare, that I claim all the responsibility which properly belongs to me, as a public man; I am responsible for the assumption of the duty which I have undertaken, and if you please, I am, by my acceptance of office, responsible for the removal of the late government. God forbid that I should endeavour to transfer any responsibility which ought properly to devolve upon me, to that high and sacred authority which the constitution of this country recognises as incapable of error, and every act of which it imputes to the advice of responsible counsellors. But whilst I disclaim all intention of shrinking from that responsibility, which one situated as I am must necessarily incur; I must at the same time unhesitatingly assert, what is perfectly consistent with the truth, and what is due to respect for my own character,—namely, that I was not, and under no circumstances would I have been, a party to any secret counselling or instigating the removal of any government. But although I have not taken any part in procuring the dismissal of the late government, although I could not, from circumstances which are notorious to the world, hold communication with any of those with whom I have now the honour to act, much less with the highest authority in the State, as to the propriety or policy of that dismissal, still I do conceive that, by the assumption of office, the responsibility of the change which has taken place is transferred from the Crown to its advisers; and I am ready—be the majority against me what it may—to take all the responsibility which constitutionally belongs to me, and to submit to any consequences to which the assumption of that responsibility may expose me.

I do not, then, hesitate to express it as my opinion, that the act by which the last government was removed was an act perfectly justifiable. I will, for the purpose of proving this proposition, take a review of the state of the country for some time past. Looking back to the meeting of the reformed parliament in February, 1833, it will be seen that the government which was formed under the auspices of Lord Grey, and which had carried the Reform Bill, continued in a successful course for a certain period. Was I one of those who refused to recognise and submit to the great change which had then recently been effected? Was I not the first to avow, in 1833, that the old tactics of party were no longer applicable to the new circumstances of the government of the country, and that I would give my support to the administration of Lord Grey as long as that government attempted to act upon the principle of maintaining the institutions of the country, and in maintaining, not excluding, the improvement of them? Did I seek for opportunities to embarrass that government? How many occasions were there of which I might not have availed myself, if I had been solicitous to obtain power, to obstruct the course of the government of Lord Grey? When the House of Commons determined by a vote of one night to repeal the malt-tax, and I heard that that vote would be followed by the removal of Lord Althorp from his place in the government, by his immediate resignation, in consequence of his declared inability to concede on this point to the demand of a majority of this House, consistently with the maintenance of public credit—did I seek any plausible pretext of joining those who were upon that question opposed to the government, and thereby increase its embarrassment? Did I not tender my advice that this House should reconsider that vote, and did I not share the unpopularity of rescinding the resolution for the removal of a tax to which many of my own friends were decided opponents. Again, when the noble lord (Stanley), then Secretary for the Colonies, brought forward the measure for the settlement of the great question of slavery, when the noble lord had at first proposed a loan of £15,000,000 to slave proprietors, and afterwards, to the surprise of a large number of this House, as well as the public generally, found it necessary to change his proposition into a grant of £20,000,000, although I differed from the noble lord as to that measure in some matters of detail, was I not the first to support the noble lord in his proposition for the increased vote, and to do all in my power to persuade the House of Commons to sanction it, as a vote essential to the success of the measure, and deeply involving the public honour? During the whole of the year 1833 and 1834, so far from showing any disposition to resume power by a combination with men to whose principles I was more opposed than to those of the government, my constant efforts were directed to maintain that government against the attacks of opponents more eager for innovation than ministers themselves, and I have ever given them my cordial support and assistance upon every question on which the course of the government was in accordance with my own principles.

I will now refer to the circumstances which led to my being placed in the position I now occupy. In May, 1834, the government of Lord Grey lost the services of those of its members in whom the country reposed the highest confidence, and it will be in the recollection of the House, that Lord Grey was so sensible of the loss he had sustained from the secession of those colleagues as to resolve upon retiring from the administration himself. When prevailed upon to retain office, Lord Grey reconstructed the government; but he was fully sensible of the loss his administration had sustained from the retirement of those who had quitted it, and to whose assistance he had attached the greatest importance. He was also aware of, and felt most strongly, the embarrassments which threatened the government from what his lordship called "the pressure from without." In a letter to Lord Ebrington, Lord Grey said,—"Founded on the principles of reform, the present administration must necessarily look to the correction of all proved abuses. But, in pursuing a course of salutary improvement, I feel it indispensable that we shall be allowed to proceed with deliberation and caution, and above all, that we should not be urged by a constant and active pressure from without to the adoption of any measures, the necessity of which has not been fully proved, and which are not strictly regulated by a careful attention to the settled interests of the country, both in Church and State. On no other principle can this or any other administration be conducted with advantage or safety." Who can doubt that the loss of the four Cabinet Ministers who seceded on the occasion I am referring to—Lord Stanley, Sir James Graham, the Earl of Ripon, and the Duke of Richmond—had a material tendency to weaken the authority of Lord Grey's government, and to shake the confidence of the public in it? However, the government proceeded, severe as was the shock it had sustained—but scarcely one short month elapsed, before Lord Grey himself, and those immediately connected with him, Lord Carlisle and Lord Howick, retired from the administration. It was upon that occasion that his Majesty, anxious alone for the public interests, alarmed at these repeated secessions, seeing that they proceeded, not from hostile combinations, but from internal dissensions, or intrigues, expressed an earnest wish that a government should be formed upon some new foundation, combining men of different parties in the public service. I believe it is no secret, that a communication was made by Lord Melbourne, at his Majesty's desire, to the noble lord (Lord Stanley), the Duke of Wellington, and myself, with this view. I feel bound to state, that Lord Melbourne discouraged the plan, and was not desirous that the negotiation should be entered into, because his lordship saw no reason to hope that it would end in a satisfactory result. The other parties, too, I must mention, were as little sanguine as Lord Melbourne, that by the means projected an efficient and permanent administration could be formed at that period. I refer, however, to this transaction, as showing how deeply sensible his Majesty was of the difficulties in which the country was involved, and how anxiously he desired, by every means within his control, to obviate those difficulties. The government was again reconstructed—reconstructed under the auspices of Lord Melbourne; but I now publicly assert, in the face of Parliament and the country, that the foundation of that government rested upon the continuance of Lord Althorp as Chancellor of the Exchequer, with the lead of the House of Commons; that the consent of Lord Althorp to resume these functions, was the corner-stone upon which the government of Lord Melbourne was built, and that had Lord Althorp withheld that consent, Lord Melbourne would not have attempted to form an administration. Let me also refer to the public declaration of Lord Grey as to the importance of Lord Althorp's continuance in office and in the House of Commons. On the 9th of July, Lord Grey said, referring to the communications with Mr. O'Connell respecting the Irish bill:—"But this new state of affairs deprived me of the assistance of my noble friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the leading member of the government in the Commons, the individual on whom my chief confidence rested, whom I considered as my right arm, and without whose assistance I felt it impossible for the government to go on. Former breaches had considerably weakened the government; this new breach placed it in a situation in which I could not well hope to retain my place at its head, with any view to serve the Crown or the country for any useful purpose."

Thus, then, it appears that the retirement of Lord Grey was determined by the retirement of Lord Althorp, and that the basis on which the Melbourne administration was founded, was this, that Lord Althorp should return to office, and, contrary to his own declared wishes and inclinations, resume the leadership of the House of Commons. The Melbourne government was thus constructed; but the session, though nearly at a close, did not terminate without a difference between the Houses of Lords and Commons on the Irish Tithe Bill. I will put it to the House whether, under such circumstances, it was not perfectly natural, on the necessary retirement of Lord Althorp from the Chancery of the Exchequer and the lead of the House of Commons, that his Majesty should review the position of public affairs, and should anxiously consider the question, whether he should continue the government, shattered as it was to its foundation, or seek for an administration constructed on a new basis? Was there any hope that compensation could be found for the successive losses the reform government had sustained—the loss of Lord Stanley, of Sir James Graham, of the Duke of Richmond, of Lord Ripon, of Lord Carlisle, of Lord Grey, and lastly, of Lord Althorp? From what quarter of the horizon did the ray of light and hope proceed? If there were a chance of success, it must have been in the single expectation of the consistent and unanimous support which the government would receive at the hands of those who held extreme opinions upon popular questions. But what hope of support had the government from that quarter? Was it not the fact, that it was to the series of attacks made one after another from that quarter that the weakness of the government was to be attributed?—Who was the member of the new cabinet best entitled to claim support from the popular party, and especially from the popular party in Ireland? Was it not Lord Duncannon, named to the office of Secretary of State from his especial connection with Ireland? Now mark the indications of gratitude for this appointment, and the prospect that Lord Duncannon had of cordial support from the only party on which he could place a reliance. On the 11th of October last, a month preceding the dissolution of Lord Melbourne's government, the hon. and learned member for Dublin addressed a letter to Lord Duncannon, having for its motto. "Hurrah for the Repeal," and the authority given for the motto was, "Wild Irish Cry." The following is an extract from that letter:—"My lord, I write more in sorrow than in anger, more in regret than in hostility. It is true that you have deceived me—bitterly and cruelly deceived Ireland, but we should have known you better. You belong to the Whigs, and after four years of the most emaciating experience we ought, indeed, to have known, that Ireland had nothing to expect from the Whigs but insolent contempt, and malignant but treacherous hostility." This, it might be supposed, was an ebullition of ardent and heated eloquence, delivered under circumstances of strong excitement; but no, it was no such thing; it was written from the hon. and learned gentleman's calm retreat at Derrynane Abbey, and when the hon. and learned gentleman was in the most tranquil vein possible. The hon. and learned gentleman said so himself. "It is," continued the hon. and learned gentleman, "my duty tranquilly but firmly to declare to the people of Ireland that they have nothing to expect from you; that you are as deeply steeped in the old system of misgovernment, as if you never proclaimed liberal principles, and that we must have a change of men before we have any chance of a change of measures. Still I do confess, I have arrived at this conclusion with regret. I feel nothing of the passion of anger; I cherish no hasty or violent resentment. But I do feel strongly the impulses of that duty which commands me to struggle unremittingly to procure for Ireland a domestic legislature, where, and where alone, a sympathy between the Irish and their rulers can originate and be fostered." So much for the opinions of the hon. and learned gentleman respecting the constitution of the Melbourne administration and Lord Duncannon, whom the hon. and learned gentleman had at first hailed as a most popular acquisition to that ministry. The House will see that, according to the hon. and learned gentleman's own showing, no change of men could possibly prejudice the interests of Ireland, that the Melbourne cabinet was so bad, that even the present is far preferable to it, and that the hon. and learned gentleman himself is bound, therefore, to give it at least comparative support.

And now for the hon. and learned gentleman's opinions as to individuals connected with the Melbourne administration. In the same letter from which I have just quoted, the following passages occur:—"Of what value is it to Ireland, that Earl Grey should have retired, if he has left to his successors the same proud and malignant hatred he appeared to entertain towards the Irish nation? Are the representatives of that sentiment predominant in the cabinet? I know that—(can I believe my eyes when I read it?)—that Lord John Russell cherishes feelings of a similar description. Ireland, in the unjust and disgraceful scantiness of her Reform Bill, felt deeply, and deplorably felt, that hostility." With regard to Lord Melbourne, the hon. and learned gentleman said, "I know, and every body knows, that Lord Melbourne wants sufficient powers of mind to be able to comprehend the favourable opportunities afforded him to conciliate the popular party—that is, emphatically, Ireland. In plain truth, my lord, it is quite manifest that Lord Melbourne is utterly incompetent for the high office he holds. It is lamentable to think that the destinies of the Irish people should depend in any degree on so inefficient a person." Next came Lord Lansdowne, of whom the hon. and learned gentleman said, "Lord Lansdowne, too, is hostile to Ireland, with a hatred the more active and persevering, because he is bound by every obligation to entertain diametrically opposite sentiments." I will trouble the House with but one quotation more from this deliberate and tranquil letter of the hon. and learned gentleman to Lord Duncannon:—"On this account, then, I repeat the chorus of that song called 'The Wild Irish Cry'—'Hurrah for the Repeal.' You are a much better repealer than I am. Your conduct, and that of your colleagues, has made more of the people inveterate for repeal than any arguments or exertions of mine could possibly do. Continue to govern Ireland under the special guidance of 'the sage father of all the Hannibals,' and you may possibly see the bench—but no, that is ground too sacred to be touched in public—but you will see Ireland sufficiently strong to laugh to scorn every malignant enemy, whether Whig or Orange Tory." Thus had the hon. and learned gentleman disposed of Lord Duncannon, Lord John Russell, Lord Lansdowne, Lord Plunkett, and lastly Lord Melbourne himself. Is it not then clear to demonstration that the Melbourne cabinet had not the faintest hope of support from that party on which its main reliance must have been placed?

Let me then again ask, whether it were unnatural or unreasonable for his Majesty, in considering the component parts of that administration, and the prospect of its being able to maintain its ground, weakened as it had been by the loss of the most powerful members of the Grey government, and further embarrassed by the recurrence of that event, and which had caused Lord Grey's retirement, and would have prevented Lord Melbourne from forming any administration at all—namely, the resignation of Lord Althorp and his removal from the House of Commons—let me, I say, ask, whether it was at all surprising that his Majesty should doubt the propriety of continuing the reins of government in the hands of men who, three months before, rested their exclusive hope of success on the aid of Lord Althorp?

I have already stated that I was no party in the remotest degree to the removal of the former government, never having either advised or even contemplated it; yet I feel that the acceptance of office does impose upon me a full share in the responsibility which my noble friend (the Duke of Wellington) has contracted. I am now here to answer under that responsibility. If my noble friend has acted unconstitutionally—if my noble friend has done any thing wrong in his assumption of the government, I, by my subsequent acceptance of office, have contracted, in an equal degree, the responsibility thus incurred. It has been said, that it was a most grievous crime and a dangerous precedent for any one man to monopolize so many offices. My first answer to this assertion is, that there is nothing unconstitutional in a man holding two offices, and that the propriety of their tenure depends upon the state of public affairs, and the intention with which they are accepted. The Duke of Wellington, it is true, held the offices of First Lord of the Treasury, and of Secretary of State for the home department, and had the power, in the last capacity, of performing all the duties connected with either the foreign, colonial, or home offices. The delivery to him of the seals of the home office conferred upon him the right to exercise all the functions of the other two departments—the right to advise the Crown on foreign and colonial matters, contracting, of course, all the responsibility which might attach to such advice. There might be inconvenience arising from the assumption of all these powers by one individual, but such an assumption is not unconstitutional. It is the constant practice that the secretary of one department acts for the secretary of another, during intervals of recreation, or periods of sickness; but I will not rest the defence of my noble friend on any ground so narrow. My noble friend assumed the double offices from the purest motives,—from his conviction that it was necessary for the public service. He had assumed them—not with the intention of arrogating to himself the supreme powers of the state, but for the express purpose of mere temporary occupation, with a view to deliver up those powers in their full integrity to another. The noble lord (the member for Yorkshire) has stated that this assumption was perfectly new in the history of this country, and has said (I believe I have taken down the noble lord's words correctly) that if there should be an old Whig of the Rockingham school now alive, the hairs of that old Whig would stand on end on hearing that one man had assumed two such offices as those of the Secretary of State and First Lord of the Treasury. But I shall show that, in the good times of Whig predominance, an instance occurred when an assumption of equal powers took place in order to defeat the Jacobite party, and obstruct the views of the pretender. The noble lord is well read in history, and is doubtless acquainted with the events which occurred at the close of the reign of Queen Anne. The noble lord may perhaps recollect that a short time previously to her death the Earl of Oxford had been removed from power, and Lord Bolingbroke speculated upon the assumption of supreme authority, and upon the means of constituting a government consonant to his own views. The historian thus narrates the circumstance under which one individual did assume many high trusts, for the purpose of defeating the principles of the Tories, and the views of the Jacobite party. “Lord Bolingbroke employed this awful interval (the sickness of the queen) in regulating his political arrangements; and the most alarming apprehensions seized upon all the true friends and well-wishers of the country. The Whigs, however, were not inactive, the indisposition of the queen increased, and the committee of the privy council, sitting at the palace of Kensington, began to make prompt and effectual arrangements. The Duke of Shrewsbury was present, and saw the crisis had now arrived when a decisive course must be adopted, aided by the support of the Hanoverian party. The Dukes of Argyll and Somerset entered the council-chamber, and the post of Lord Treasurer was filled up, the Council recommending to the queen the Duke of Shrewsbury as the fittest person for that office. The queen delivered to him the white staff, desiring him to use it for the good of her people. The same afternoon Lord Somers shook off his bodily infirmities, and repaired to Kensington, accompanied by several Privy Councillors of his party. The Duke of Shrewsbury desired to return to the queen the Lord Chamberlain's staff, but she directed him to keep both, so that he was possessed at one and the same time of three of the greatest posts in the kingdom, namely, those of Lord High Treasurer, Lord Chamberlain, and Lord-lieutenant of Ireland.” Was there a whisper of objection to this on the part of Whig authorities? Did Lord Somers denounce the act as unconstitutional? On the contrary, he sanctioned it by his presence! It was the urgency of the crisis,—it was the intention of the act that vindicated it, and extracted all the danger from the precedent. Apply the same principles to this case. The Duke of Wellington was offered the situation of prime minister at a time of great difficulty. He believed it better for the interests of the king and of the country, that that post should be occupied by another person, and that person was not in England. The noble duke stated in his letter to me, that he had advised the king to send for me as his Majesty's prime minister, and that he had determined to assume certain offices himself, because he thought nothing would be so unfair as to ask me to take upon myself the management of an administration, the whole of which had not been left to my formation; and further, that, if he appointed other individuals to exercise the high duties of those offices, I might probably be under an embarrassment in advising the king to remove them. It was to obviate such an embarrassment and difficulty, and to leave the appointments to myself unfettered, that the Duke of Wellington thought it better for the Crown, and fairer to me, to make an arrangement in its nature and character temporary. So much for that question.

I now come to the subject of the dissolution of the late parliament. I have been asked whether I take upon myself the responsibility of that proceeding? and, without a moment's hesitation, I answer that I do take upon myself the responsibility of the dissolution. The moment I returned to this country to undertake the arduous duties now imposed upon me, I did determine that I would leave no constitutional effort untried to enable me satisfactorily to discharge the trust reposed in me. I did fear that if I had met the late parliament, I should have been obstructed in my course, and obstructed in a manner, and at a season, which might have precluded an appeal to the people. But it is unnecessary for me to assign reasons for this opinion. Was it not the constant boast that the late parliament had unbounded confidence in the late government? And why should those who declare they are ready to condemn me without a hearing, be surprised at my appeal to the judgment of another, and a higher, and a fairer tribunal—the public sense of the people? Notwithstanding the specious reasons which have been usually assigned for the dissolution, I believe it will be found, that whenever there has occurred an extensive change of government, a dissolution of parliament has followed. In the year 1784, a change took place in the government, Mr. Pitt was appointed to the office of prime minister, and in the same year a dissolution took place. Again, in 1806, when the administration of Lords Grey and Grenville was formed, the parliament, which had only sat four years, was, shortly after the assumption of power by those noblemen, dissolved. It was on that occasion urged, that a negotiation with France having failed, it became necessary to refer to the sense of the country; but I never will admit that the failure of the negotiation with France could constitute any sufficient grounds for the dissolution of a parliament which there was not the slightest reason to believe was adverse to the continuance of the war, or dissatisfied with the conduct of the negotiation. In the year 1807, another change took place in the government by the accession of Mr. Percival to power, and then again a dissolution immediately took place. In the year 1830, Earl Grey was called into office as prime minister, and shortly after the vote in committee on the Reform Bill, the parliament which had been elected in 1830, was dissolved in 1831. Hence it appears that, in the cases of the four last extensive changes in the government, those changes have been followed by a dissolution of the then existing parliament. The present, however, I believe to be the first occasion upon which the House of Commons has ever proceeded to record its dissatisfaction at the exercise of the prerogative of dissolution.

I have been told, and indeed it has been implied in the course of this debate, that although I might have been no party to the dismissal of the late ministry, and although I was utterly ignorant of the intention to dismiss it, yet that I ought to have advised the Throne to recall the government of Lord Melbourne, and that I should have considered myself disqualified from undertaking the government of the country. The whole ground of objection to my possession of power is this, that, in consequence of the revolution in power which has taken place, and of the necessity of acting in the spirit and on the principles of the Reform Bill,—I am unfit to be in office, and therefore ought to have declined it. But I have never considered the Reform Bill to be a machine, the secret springs and working of which are only known to those by whom it has been constructed, or that its effect is to be the exclusion of any portion of the king's subjects from their monarch's service. No sacrifice of principle was required from me by the king; on the contrary, I was desired to form an administration such as seemed to myself best for the public service, to adopt such measures as I conceived most likely to advance the public interests; and I will, therefore, ask any man outside the walls of parliament, and free from the contagion of party, whether he would not entertain a mean opinion of me, had I, under such circumstances, said to the king,—"I feel for your difficulties, but I decline your service; I never can propose measures that will satisfy the House of Commons, and I therefore advise you to resort to some other quarter for assistance."

It has been urged against me, that I and those with whom I have acted in the Commons House of Parliament were at constant variance with the reform governments of Earl Grey and of Lord Melbourne, and that we have contended against those administrations which, it was assumed, were supported by the unanimous voice of reformers. Upon this head there has been much declamation, which is certainly more captivating than facts; but facts are a little more conclusive as evidence, and I will refer to certain notorious facts—facts upon record, for the purpose of deciding the question, whether or not I have acted, as was alleged, in constant opposition to the reform governments, and in continued hostility to the united body of reformers. I reject with scorn the doctrine, that because a public man resisted the Reform Bill—resisted a great change in the balance of political power, and in the constitution of the governing body—he must be placed under a ban of perpetual exclusion—denounced as an alien from the institutions of his native land, and disqualified for public service as the patron of corruption and abuse. This convenient doctrine is founded on the assumption that the House of Commons, since the passing of the Reform Bill, has been divided into two parties—the advocates and the opponents of the reforming government. A reference to facts will show that such has not been the case; but, on the contrary, that I, an anti-reformer, so far as the constitution of the House of Commons is concerned, have been the supporter of the government, and that it is the reformers themselves who have opposed them. To establish the truth of this I will review the principal domestic questions which have been discussed since the first meeting of the reformed parliament in February 1833. On the meeting of that parliament an amendment was moved on the address—the "bloody and brutal address," as it was called by the member for Dublin. The government resisted that amendment; I supported them, and was one of a very large majority. On the first reading of the Disturbances (Ireland) bill, the government were opposed by many, but I supported them. Next came Mr. Attwood's motion on the subject of the general distress; there I supported the government. So also on Mr. Harvey's motion relative to the publication of the lists of divisions; on Mr. Grote's motion upon the vote by ballot; and on Mr. Rippon's motion for the exclusion of the bishops from the House of Lords. The government opposed also the repeal of the malt-tax, and I lent them my assistance. On the motion for the alteration of the corn-laws, and for a substitution of a property-tax in lieu of the duties on malt; on the grant of pecuniary relief to the Irish clergy; on Mr. Tennyson's motion for the repeal of the Septennial Act; on Mr. Harvey's second motion upon the pension list; on Sir William Ingilby's resolution for the reduction of the malt-duties; on Mr. Buckingham's proposition relative to impressment; on Mr. Hume's motion on the corn-laws; on Lord Althorp's proposition with respect to the Church-rates; on Mr. O'Connell's motion for the repeal of the Union—on every one of these occasions I have found myself in close connexion with the government, and lending them my most earnest and zealous assistance and support.

Now, take the other side of the account. I have differed from the government on the question of the admission of Dissenters into the universities; and I had also the serious misfortune to differ from them on the motion for a committee for the persecution of Baron Smith. I voted also against them on the question of the Irish Church Temporalities, and against Lord Althorp's proposition to make bank-notes above the value of £5 a legal tender. Now strike the balance. Look at the questions on which I have supported, and those on which I have opposed the reform government—compare their number, compare their relative importance, and then decide—whether I or the ultra-reformers were the parties differing the most in views and principles from the government of Lord Grey. At the same time I feel it my duty to declare, that I will not try to conciliate the support of the House by any false professions. After the passing of the Reform Bill I saw that a great change had taken place; that there had been a complete revolution in the possession of power, and that necessarily there must be on the part of public men, who meant honestly by their country, a spirit of accommodation in their public course to the altered circumstances of government. I, however, cannot say that I intend in power, or as a condition on which to retain power, to adopt any course differing in principle from that which I pursued in opposition, subsequently to the passing of the bill of Reform. On questions in which I opposed the late government I intend still to maintain the principles which actuated that opposition. I do not mean to vote for a compulsory obligation on the universities to admit Dissenters within their walls, but will leave that question to be determined by the universities themselves. I also intend to maintain the same principles on which I acted with reference to the Church Temporalities Bill, and I will not consent to the diversion of Ecclesiastical property to other than Ecclesiastical purposes. If I differ from the majority of the House, I regret it; I differ from them with respect, but I will not make the sacrifice of my opinions on the two points to which I have referred for the purpose of gaining their favour or their support. I am no apostate; I am not deviating from any principles which I have ever professed. The rule of my conduct in office, will be that which I have taken for my rule out of office,—to make no sacrifice of public principle, but at the same time not to stand in fruitless opposition to the operation of changes in our institutions, the making of which I certainly deprecated, but which when made I was among the first to recognise as final and irrevocable.

I hope that the House will allow me to take a view of the measures indicated by the king's speech, as those hereafter to be proposed by the government, and to afford the House the explanation respecting them which has already been required of me. I am afraid that I am trespassing on your attention at a length which may become wearisome to your patience, but I trust that you will make allowance for the situation in which I am placed, and that your possible disinclination to hear me as a private individual will not apply to me as a minister of state. The first point noticed in the king's speech, is our relations with foreign princes and states. The government declares its earnest desire to cultivate the relations of amity with them. The government states, that they entertained confident expectations of being able to maintain the blessings of peace. They already see a tendency to increased confidence in the British ministry, on the part of some of the great powers of Europe, and that confidence has been manifested by the commencement of a reduction in the military establishments of two of them. I allude to the fact, that Austria and Prussia have both begun to reduce their military force—the one in her Italian, the other in her Rhenish provinces. It has been argued on the other side, that it is an ill omen, a positive evil, that the military governments of the continent should have any confidence in the ministry of England. There might be some foundation for this, if the ministers had contracted any engagements with those governments which could bind them to depart from the true principles of British policy, and from their disinclination to interfere with the internal affairs of other countries. We have contracted no such engagements, but we are proud of the confidence of foreign powers, and wish to maintain their good-will. And I must say, that nothing is more unfortunate than the course occasionally pursued in this House, of loading with personal obloquy and the severest vituperation those who possess the chief authority in countries, whose cordiality it is our interest to cultivate, even though they are governed by institutions less free than our own. What inconsistency is there in maintaining the principles of a free representative government, and yet, disregarding the difference of our institutions, in cultivating friendship with despotic powers? It would be well if those gentlemen who profess liberal principles would imitate the example of a country with institutions more liberal even than our own—I mean the United States, which sees no inconsistency and no dereliction of principle in courting the most friendly relations with foreign states, without troubling themselves about their forms of government. What advantage is there, I would ask, in alienating foreign sovereigns from us by reflections which irritate their feelings, but do not diminish their power, and which prevent us from exercising a friendly and salutary influence over their councils? But it is said that this increasing confidence in the British government on the part of certain foreign powers, must be owing to our alienation from our powerful neighbour and ally—France. Now, why should that suspicion be entertained against the present government? Who was the first to confirm the nascent power of Louis Philippe by an unhesitating acknowledgment of it, but the Duke of Wellington? Why should this government view with jealousy the increasing prosperity of France? Why should it repine at advances in improvement, which react upon our own welfare, or entertain a lurking feeling adverse to the maintenance of that cordial good understanding with France, on which, in my conscience, I believe the peace of Europe mainly depends?

The next point noticed in the king's speech is the necessity of economy. Ministers state the fact, that the estimates of this year will be the lowest that has been known since the peace of 1815. The fact being so, they have stated it, but not with an invidious comparison between their acts and those of the former government. They do not claim the reduction as their exclusive credit. They wish it to be shared with the government which preceded their own; and as that government, in its financial statement, had the liberality to admit the economy enforced by the Duke of Wellington in his former administration, so the present government, in its estimates, has the liberality to admit that it only continues to act in furtherance of the economical principles enforced by the preceding government. But at any rate, the statement of this fact is an answer to those who said, that the appointment of a conservative government would lead to increased expense in all our establishments. Comparing the estimates of the present year with those of the last, I entertain a confident hope that it will be possible to make a reduction, consistent with the due execution of the public service, to the extent of £500,000. For that ministers claim not an exclusive credit—it arises less from the reduction of establishments than from the enforcement of those wise principles of economy which were first laid down by the Duke of Wellington, and afterwards adopted by the late administration.

I will now shortly advert to the measure for the abolition of Slavery. There has been an impression that the success of that great measure will be impeded by the restoration of the present ministry to power. It is true that they have not entertained the sanguine expectations respecting its eventual success that has been entertained by many hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House; but this I will say, that if ever men were under a moral obligation to be scrupulous in promoting the success of that great measure of philanthropic benevolence, the present ministers are under that obligation, for the very reason that they have been less sanguine than its authors. And what has been the practical course which ministers have pursued respecting it? So far have they been from seeking any advantage from the patronage of the different appointments in the colonies, that their first resolution has been to continue in their post all the governors appointed under the late administration. Those governors being appointed by that administration, are cognizant of its intentions, and are therefore probably the best instruments for carrying those intentions into effect. Lord Sligo, for instance, is the governor of Jamaica. The first thing which Lord Aberdeen did upon his appointment to office, was to write to that noble lord, and to request him to remain in his situation, as he was cognizant, from personal communication, of the views and feelings of the late government. The present government has sent out additional magistrates to some of the colonies (the only instance in which it has incurred expense without the knowledge of parliament), but they have not hesitated to undertake the responsibility of such a proceeding, as the object of it is to further the success of that great measure for the abolition of slavery.

It has been said by hon. gentlemen on the other side, that the speech from the throne is in its terms vague and inconclusive; that it is couched in the usual indefinite language; and that it leaves parliament uncertain as to what is to be done. Now, of all the speeches which have ever been delivered from the throne, it does appear to me that this is the most precise as to the intentions of the government, and as to the measures which it is intended to propose. I wish the House to recollect, that I returned from the continent on the 10th of December, and that I am now speaking on the 24th of February. It is no slight labour in the interim to have constituted a ministry, and to have given the requisite consideration to such measures as are announced in the speech from the throne. Among the first of them, in point of urgency, is the state of the tithe question in Ireland. Government will propose a measure for its final and equitable adjustment. For the commutation of the tithe in England and Wales, government is also prepared with a measure. For the administration of justice in ecclesiastical causes, government intends to adopt a bill, founded on the report of the commissioners appointed by the former government of the Duke of Wellington; a bill of which subsequently the right hon. member for Cumberland has been the chief promoter; a bill which will destroy all petty ecclesiastical courts, and will appoint supreme courts for the cognizance of all ecclesiastical causes. Government also proposes to make provision for the more effectual maintenance of ecclesiastical discipline—a provision which will enforce episcopal authority, not over the laity but over the clergy, and will check, if not entirely prevent, those cases of scandal which occasionally occur, but the punishment of which is dilatory and ineffectual. Government also intends to propose a measure which will relieve those who dissent from the Church from the necessity of celebrating marriage according to its rites. I have been asked, “Is that all you intend to do for the Dissenters? You may relieve them from that grievance, but do you leave all their other grievances unredressed?” Now I must remind these objectors, that great importance has been attached by the Dissenters to the redress of this very grievance. It is no new point that I have taken up. The noble lord opposite has failed before me; and the first point to which I gave my attention on my return to power, was the mode in which I could fulfil most satisfactorily the expectations of the Dissenters on this subject. It has been objected, that there is no mention in the king's Speech of any measure for establishing a general registry of births and deaths. That is a subject full of difficulties, which I am occupied in considering and attempting to solve; and it is not the practice of the Crown to indicate in the Speech from the throne measures, until the details are all settled. Now, the consideration of these measures has occupied more time than it was almost possible to devote to them, paying due attention to the general business of the state. Any measure for establishing a general registry of births, will require long and mature deliberation. I candidly confess, that I am not at present ready with all the details of such a measure. I have not, however, any objection to the principle of it. Such a measure, well matured, would be of great advantage to the public at large, as supplying valuable statistical information, and affording better means than any that now exist, for establishing titles to property. But we are too apt to expect that we can in every case combine the advantage and facilities which despotic governments have, with those of free institutions. It may be easy in Prussia or Austria to impose a penalty on any man who has a child born to him, and who does not register its birth within a given time. I doubt, however, whether such a regulation would be at once practicable and satisfactory in this country. On this subject I will at once avow my opinion, that I wish to see the registry of births and deaths; the registry, that is, of facts, as well as of religious rites, still in the hands of the ministers of the Church, first, because I think them the most competent to keep such a registry, and secondly, because a single register for all classes of the king's subjects would prevent much trouble and expense in ascertaining facts connected with birth or death.

Then I am told, that on the subject of municipal corporations the speech is still more vague and inconclusive. On that point I will appeal to the fairness of the House. A committee was appointed in the last parliament, to enquire into the state of municipal corporations. That committee, of which the present speaker was chairman, made certain enquiries. It found that it had not sufficient powers to conduct the enquiry satisfactorily, and it recommended the appointment of a commission to conduct it. On his recent appointment to office a right hon. friend of mine, to enable the government to consider their report, to weigh the evidence which they had collected, and to examine the suggestions which they had proposed, wrote to the municipal commissioners for the information which they had collected. I can have no reserve with the House, and it will perhaps be satisfactory to it to hear the answer of the commissioners. It is dated the 27th January, 1835. The commissioners state that their enquiries are now complete; that 293 municipal corporations have been visited by them; that 241 reports have been sent in; that 182 have been printed; but that the remainder of them are at that time unfinished. The commissioners further declare that they cannot state when their general report will be ready, but they express a hope that it will be finished in the month of February. They likewise declare that it is not their intention to present a partial report on any branch of the subject unless they are specifically required so to do. Under such circumstances I contend that it would have been contrary not only to the practice usually adopted in such cases, but to the respect due to a commission appointed by the Crown, if the government had indicated in the king's Speech any definite measure of municipal reform. What would be the use of the commission, if in the very month in which it proposed to produce its report, government without even waiting to look at it, came forward with a measure of its own upon the subject? The report made by the committee of the House of Commons, of which their speaker was the chairman, on the subject of these municipal corporations, contains the following words. After expressing a decided opinion that a further and searching enquiry should be made, with a view to the adoption of a sufficient remedy, they say—"Having come to this conclusion, your committee are not enabled to offer any final suggestions as to the remedies which ought to be adopted; and being further of opinion, that from the defective nature of their enquiry, even those cases which they have examined ought to be subject to further scrutiny, they have thought it desirable, with very few exceptions, to abstain from pointing out particular defects, or animadverting on individual testimony, while there is a possibility that a different colour may be given to the case by future investigation." Is not this very passage a conclusive reason for suspending a judgment as to any specific practical measure? An hon. gentleman has asked me, and insisted upon having an answer to his question, whether ministers intend to give the ten-pounders, as they are called, the power of electing to all offices in these corporations? Now, to that question I must reply, that until I have had an opportunity of reading the report, and the evidence founded upon it, it would not be consistent with my duty to pledge myself as to what I will do upon any given point. If he were to ask me whether I have any conceivable interest in maintaining the abuses of corporations, or any prejudice in their favour, I would reply at once that I have no such interest, and no prejudice that will prevent me from giving a fair consideration to any plan for their amelioration—I will go the full length to which the government of Lord Grey went in the speech which they advised the king to make, after the appointment of the commission, but when, as at present, its enquiries were incomplete. The speech from the throne, in the commencement of the session of 1834, when Earl Grey was minister, contained these expressions—"Many other important subjects will still call for your most attentive consideration. The reports which I will order to be laid before you from the commissioners appointed to enquire into the state of municipal corporations, into the administration and effect of the poor laws, and into ecclesiastical revenues and patronage in England and Wales, cannot fail to afford you much useful information, by which you will be enabled to judge of the nature and extent of any existing defects and abuses, and in what manner the necessary corrections may, in due season, be safely and beneficially applied." I am prepared to adopt every word of that speech. I will go the full length of it, and why should I be required to go farther? I am not prepared to name any definite measure on the subject at this moment, but I will give to the suggestions of the commissioners every fair consideration. I will not, however, to conciliate a vote on this occasion, do that which is not only contrary to all usage, but also to my sense of what is the duty of a minister of the Crown.

I have been told that in the Speech from the throne not the slightest reference has been made to the subject of Church rates. It is well known that I supported the measure brought in by the late government for the transfer of the Church rates to the public revenue. That measure has met with great opposition from the Dissenters. I for one cannot agree to the extinction of Church rates. I think that there is an obligation on the state to provide for the repair of churches, but I also think that the charge of providing for that repair bears very unfairly on the land, and that subject is one which I had in view when in the king's Speech reference was made to "a method for mitigating the pressure of those local charges which bear heavily on the owners and occupiers of land, and for distributing the burden of them more equally over other descriptions of property." An interpretation has been put upon that paragraph, which is by no means intended. No new mode of general taxation is meant by it. It has a special reference to the report of the committee of last session on county rates, and to the relief of the agricultural interest from certain local burdens, of which the Church rate is one.

mission appointed by government. The subject into which it has to enquire is extensive and complicated, and I cannot promise the House to bring forward a measure upon it at a very early period. I will, however, tell the House what I have already done. On the vacancy of the first of those appointments in the Church which are usually called—I will not say rightly or wrongly—sinecures, I have advised the Crown to make no appointment to it, but to allow all the circumstances connected with it to be considered by the Church Commission. The appointment to which I allude, is a prebendal stall at Westminster, of the value of £1,200 a-year. I mean to take the same course on every other Ecclesiastical benefice of the same class that may fall vacant, that is, I will not fill them up for the mere sake of patronage, but will refer each to the consideration of the commission. Now, what is the practical course that has been adopted with regard to this prebendal stall? It has been found that in the neighbourhood of Westminster Abbey, dependent on its chapter, are two parishes, St. Margaret and St. John, with a population of 50,000 souls. In the first-named parish there are 28,000, and only one church; and it is an evident fact, that one minister must be inadequate to the due discharge of the duties of such a parish. The government has advised the commission to attach the stall to that living, making it a condition that additional spiritual instruction shall be provided for the parishioners. There is no house belonging to the minister of St. Margaret's. It is proposed to constitute the parish into a rectory, and to attach the prebendal house as a residence for the rector. This is the course which, on a future similar occasion, government intends to pursue with regard to St. John's parish, and I hope that if any delay shall occur in calling for legislative interference on this point, it will not be supposed that that delay is intended to defeat the object of the commission, but that it is required solely for deliberate consideration. I have not advised the Crown to appoint the Ecclesiastical Commission with any view to popular favour. I would not make the slightest sacrifice of the interests of the Church to obtain such favour. I have advised the commission for the single purpose of increasing the opportunities for divine worship, according to the forms of the Church of England, and of confirming and extending its legitimate influence among the people.

These are the general measures of government, the indication of which is to be found in the Speech from the throne. They are measures which, with the least possible delay, will be submitted to the consideration of this House. In rivalry to the address, an amendment has been proposed; and if the address is vague and inconclusive, the amendment is at least equally open to the same objection. It indicates no measure—it only states the hope of the House that the same principle which restored to the people the right of choosing their representatives, and which caused the bill to pass for the abolition of slavery, would be seen in the promised Church reform, and would place our Municipal Corporations under vigilant popular control. What can any one collect from such an amendment? What pledge is implied by a declaration, that the same principle which abolished slavery, should improve a corporation? Is it not evident that the amendment was produced with some other view than its professed one? Is it not evident that the framers of the amendment are afraid to recognise in it those measures which are called measures in the spirit of the Reform Bill; but in respect to which—to every one of which—they know that a difference of opinion exists among their own party? Why have they not inserted a word about the ballot? Why not a word about the repeal of the Septennial Act? Why not a word about the Pension List? Why not a word about the Repeal of the Union? They know that on all those measures, being the very measures which have chiefly occupied public attention, there is not one on which they can express unity of sentiment. No, they must go back a distance of three or four years to find some point of common agreement—to the time when their party were united on the question of the abolition of Slavery, and on the Reform Bill. They select the questions which are practically decided—which all the world admits to be finally disposed of; but the unsettled questions they dare not advert to. They shrink from a reference to the Ballot, the Septennial Bill, the Pension List, and the Extension of the Suffrage. They try to conceal their present differences, and dwell with vain regret on sympathies that once existed, and on agreements that can never be recalled,—

Et dudum amissas flemus amicitias?*”

Oh, the time of their union and sympathy is now gone by. On this very evening, from ten different quarters, have notices been given of motions for carrying further the principles of the Reform Bill; but they shrink from the indication of any opinion on those motions in the amendment, because they know that this would lead to an open rupture amongst them. No, the amendment is proposed for the sake of involving in difficulty the noble lord (Lord Stanley) and his friends near him, who, because they concurred in supporting the Reform Bill, and the bill for the Abolition of Slavery, it is hoped may be caught in this trap, so insidiously prepared for them—the trap of compliment to measures in which they concurred, and of which they were the most prominent promoters. I feel confident of this, that those whom the amendment endeavours to embarrass, will have the firmness and good sense to see what is now the real question at issue. We know that this amendment is a mere superfluous eulogium on the Reform Bill, and that for Slave Emancipation. If the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House ask whether I recognise those measures as measures which I should now support? I answer plainly, Yes. But if they ask me further, if I mean to act on the principles involved in them, I will refer to their own party struggles of the last two years, and will tell them that they themselves do not know what those principles mean. I will not say whether I concur in the remainder of this amendment. It was drawn up, I have no doubt intentionally, in such a manner that I should not comply with it. I know not what is meant by the phrase, “Remove all the undoubted grievances of the Protestant Dissenters.” Is this intended to exclude the grievances of the Roman Catholics? If so, my measure of relief in respect to marriage will go beyond that of the framers of the amendment. I request them not to hamper me and tie up my hands by their foolish amendments—not to restrict my measures of intended liberality, and compel me to confine, what I mean for the relief of all, to the case of Protestant Dissenters. As to that part of the amendment which speaks of correcting those abuses in the Church, which impair its efficiency in England, disturb the peace of society in Ireland, and lower the character of the establishment in both countries, notice has been given of a direct motion on the subject. The words imply, not that the Tithe Question, but that the Church of Ireland, disturbs the peace of Ireland. Now, this great question ought not to be disposed of by a vague and general resolution. I will frankly avow my determination not to accede to the amendment. Indeed, I cannot accede to it, without implying willing degradation on my part. I know the responsibility of the duties which I have recently taken on myself; but I will persevere in their discharge, because I fear the impossibility of constructing a government which could have stronger claims on the confidence of the public than the present. While any difference of principle remains as to the mode of dealing with the Church of Ireland, it will be a difficult task to reconstruct the government of Lord Grey. Indeed, no government could be formed without a selection of individuals from each of those numerous parties, which, though they are now acting in concert, have been but a few short months ago, and may be in a few short weeks again, in bitter hostility to each other. Take the question of Repeal of the Union with Ireland. Are there no differences of opinion on that point, which will prevent any lasting junction with the party by which the question was advocated?

The hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. O’Connell) has constantly proclaimed that no consideration could induce him to accept office under any government that did not consent to repeal the Union. But he now seems disposed to waive his scruples, and to consent to the cares of office, foreseeing the formation of a government, two-thirds of the members of which are, according to him, to be radical reformers. Suppose he is right in his anticipations. Suppose a government to be formed, purified, as they call it, from Lord Grey, from the noble lord (Stanley), and their friends, rid of the incumbrances which are said to have obstructed the march of reform—what prospect is there that they will be enabled to conduct a government which will conciliate the good-will of the intelligence, the property, the respectability of this country? You may try to overcome such obstacles, you may resort to the convenient instrument of physical force, but you will signally fail, and yourselves will be the first victims of the agent whose alliance you have invoked, but which you cannot control.

With such prospects I feel it to be my duty—my first and paramount duty—to maintain the post which has been confided to me, and to stand by the trust, which I did not seek, but which I could not decline. I call upon you not to condemn before you have heard, to receive at least the measures I shall propose, to amend them if they are defective, to extend them if they fall short of your expectations, but at least to give me the opportunity of presenting them, that you yourselves may consider and dispose of them. I make great offers, which should not lightly be rejected. I offer you the prospect of continued peace—the restored confidence of powerful states, that are willing to seize the opportunity of reducing great armies, and thus diminishing the chances of hostile collision—I offer you reduced estimates, improvements in civil jurisprudence, reform of ecclesiastical law, the settlement of the tithe question in Ireland, the commutation of tithe in England, the removal of any real abuse in the Church, the redress of those grievances of which the Dissenters have any just ground to complain. I offer you these specific measures, and I offer also to advance, soberly and cautiously, it is true, in the path of progressive improvement. I offer also the best chance—that these things can be effected in willing concert with the other authorities of the state—thus restoring harmony, ensuring the maintenance, but not excluding the reform (where reform is really requisite), of ancient institutions. You may reject my offers—you may refuse to entertain them—you may prefer to do the same thing by more violent means; but if you do, the time is not far distant when you will find that the popular feeling on which you rely has deserted you, and that you will have no alternative but either again to invoke our aid—to replace the government in the hands from which you would now forcibly withdraw it—or to resort to that “pressure from without,” to those measures of compulsion and violence, which, at the same time that they render your reforms useless and inoperative, will seal the fate of the British Constitution.

The debate was adjourned to the 25th, and subsequently to the 26th instant, when, at a late hour, the House divided on the original question; Ayes, 302; Noes, 309; majority for Lord Morpeth's amendment, 7.

SUPPLY—DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT.

MARCH 2, 1835.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of Supply, Lord John Russell put a question to the right hon. baronet, on the rumours respecting a dissolution of parliament.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, Sir, it is always my wish to give the House as unreserved an explanation of the course which I mean to pursue as a public man, as is consistent with my duty as a minister of the Crown, and I do not require the additional time which the noble lord offers me for the purpose of being enabled to answer the questions which he has put to me. In answer to the first, I inform him, that I have not felt it my duty, in consequence of the vote of the other night, to tender my resignation to the king, and that I do intend to persevere in the course which I consider it my duty equally to the king and to the public to pursue, and, notwithstanding that vote, to submit to the consideration of the House those measures on which his Majesty's government have formed their opinion, and which they are prepared to introduce without delay. I am aware, certainly, that the House of Commons did, by a small majority, in an exceedingly full House—by a majority of 309 against 302, not pass a censure upon the government, but did by a majority of seven, imply a difference of opinion with that government as to the necessity of the late dissolution of parliament, and did imply an apprehension, which I think was unfounded, that measures which would be conducive to the general interests of the country would be interrupted and retarded by the appeal which his Majesty had thus made to the sense of his people. But I do not believe, that the majority which came to that vote did mean to imply an opinion that it was tantamount to a vote for the removal of his Majesty's ministers. There are many who concurred in that vote, who will nevertheless admit that I should not be acting consistently with my duty if I considered it significant of an opinion that I ought to retire from the post to which his Majesty has called me. Some hon. members who voted for that amendment, and who spoke in the course of the debate, explicitly declared that such was not their construction of the vote. With respect to the Irish Church (for I shall take the several questions put by the noble lord in the order which will make my answers the most intelligible, though not possibly in the order in which they were presented to me), I beg to say, that I intend to present to the House the report which may be made by the commissioners of public instruction appointed by the late government. When I came into office, I ascertained that the commissioners had applied themselves sedulously to the duties that had devolved upon them, that they had completed their enquiries in nearly one-half of the parishes in Ireland, and that they were proceeding to make them in the remainder. Under these circumstances, his Majesty's ministers did not think it their duty, the commission having been appointed by the Crown, to interrupt its progress. On the contrary, without committing myself to the adoption of the commission, or of the principle of the measures which it may propose, I may say, with truth, that we have given every facility for carrying on the investigation. The noble lord has said, that I have declared that I will not found any measure upon the report of that commission. The noble lord has misunderstood my meaning. What I said was this, that I still remain of opinion, that ecclesiastical property ought not to be diverted from strictly ecclesiastical purposes. That is the principle which I have always maintained, which I still maintain, and upon which I am still disposed to act; but I do not preclude myself by that declaration from adopting any measures suggested by that commission, if I approve of them, and should they not be inconsistent with that declaration. On the subject of the corporation commission, I do not know exactly to what conversations in other places the noble lord alludes. I speak for myself, and of the course I mean to pursue. When the report of the corporation commissioners shall be presented (and I conclude that it will be presented in the course of a very short time, as we were led to expect it would have been presented at the conclusion of the last month, February)—I mean, when we are thus put in possession of the principles which it contains, and the evidence which it brings forward in support of those principles, I mean to give the evidence and the suggestions contained in that report the fullest and fairest consideration. I assure the noble lord, that I have no lurking prejudice in favour of the abuses of corporations. I cannot conceive what possible cause, particularly after the passing of the noble lord's bill, there can be of a political or personal nature, to give me any assignable interest in the defence of corporate abuses, or in the opposition to measures intended to remedy abuses where they are proved to exist, and to take effectual security against their recurrence. But I think it would be inconsistent with my duty as a minister of the Crown, after reviewing the report of the committee of 1833, of which you, Sir, were chairman, which states, that many remedies were suggested that would be fitting for small corporations, and would not be fitting for large ones—that the most popular corporations were not practically the most pure, that there were many points upon which further information was required, and with regard to which the committee themselves were not able at the time to give an opinion—I think, I repeat, that looking at that report, it would be inconsistent with my duty as a minister of the Crown, to pronounce an opinion, or to enter into engagements on this subject at present. Surely the most natural and the most becoming course for me to pursue, is to propose or promise nothing until I have had an opportunity of seeing the report of the commissioners—of weighing the evidence, and of examining the nature of the suggestions which it contains. I have the honour of presiding over a corporation; I will venture to declare that if the result of this commission should be to prove the existence of any abuses, they will give their unanimous assent to any improvement that may be calculated to remedy them. I say, then, on behalf of the corporation over which I have the honour to preside as high steward, and with regard to all other corporations, I am as free as the noble lord can be, free in respect to public engagements, free in respect to interested motives, personal or political, to give an unprejudiced consideration to any measure intended either to correct actual defects, or to conciliate towards them more of public opinion and confidence. I am determined, however, to see the nature and extent of the abuse, and the nature and extent of the remedy, before I commit myself upon the subject. As to the last question, the first indeed in point of importance, though not of order —that with which we were threatened on a former day, but from which the noble lord has himself receded—it seems to me very possible that in the interval the noble lord has referred to a question put to Lord Grey in another place, on a similar subject, in the month of April 1831. There were at that time general rumours of an intention to dissolve parliament, and not without foundation, for the question was put on the 21st of April, and on the 22nd of April the two Houses were dismissed. I find the matter thus reported. “Lord Wharncliffe said, as an allusion has been made by the noble lord (Farnham) to certain reports that are in circulation on the subject of a dissolution of parliament, I wish to ask his Majesty’s ministers whether there is any truth in the statement, that they have advised his Majesty to dissolve parliament, and that it has been resolved to adopt that course? I ask this question, because, if I should receive an answer in the affirmative, it is my intention to adopt some measure in relation to the subject, and, I can assure the noble earl opposite, very speedily. Earl Grey replied:—“I believe the noble lord’s question will be admitted to be one of a very unusual nature, and I can hardly bring myself to believe that when he put it the noble lord expected an answer. But whatever the noble lord’s expectation may have been, I have only to say, I must decline answering the question.” Now, if any rebuke (continued Sir Robert Peel) ought to be administered to the noble lord, for having thought of putting such a question, or for extracting an answer to it if put, it will I am sure be more palatable to the noble lord to receive that rebuke from Lord Grey, than from myself. But I will be more explicit than Lord Grey. The noble lord asks me whether I have countenanced the rumours that are prevalent? I tell him at once that by no act, and by no expression of mine, have I directly or indirectly sanctioned such rumours. I will tell the noble lord, also, with equal fairness, that I never have discussed with any body the case hypothetically, in which another dissolution might be necessary or justifiable. I should think it disrespectful to the House of Commons if ministers were to discuss such a contingency, and most unbecoming to hold out any menace to the House as to the possible consequence of any course of proceeding it might think fit to adopt. Therefore, in answer to that question of the noble lord, I tell him at once that I am not responsible for the rumours, having neither originated nor sanctioned them. The other rumour by which the noble lord has been disturbed, relates to the supposed intention of government to govern by a standing army in case the House of Commons should refuse to pass the Mutiny Bill. This alarming report is, I trust, of very recent origin; for I can declare with perfect truth, that the first time I ever heard the whisper of it was from the lips of the noble lord, and that like many other reports, which give uneasiness to weak and credulous persons, it is utterly without foundation. As to that other question with which the noble lord threatened me the other day, but which he did not put on this occasion, though I came down fully expecting that it was the main object of his enquiries,—namely, whether or not I would pledge myself that the prerogative of the Crown in reference to a dissolution of parliament, should not be exercised under any possible contingency, I will not take advantage of the noble lord’s forbearance and reserve, but will give him my answer though he has withheld his question. I have already stated that I never, directly or indirectly, sanctioned the rumours that have prevailed on the subject of future dissolution, and that by no act or expression of mine was any warrant given to them. I stated further, that it would be most unbecoming in me to fetter the discussions of the House of Commons by any, the slightest, menace of contingent dissolution; but I must at the same time say, Sir, that it would be equally unbecoming in me, as a minister of the Crown, to consent to place in abeyance any prerogative of the Crown, or to debar myself by previous pledges from giving to the Crown, as a Privy Counsellor and a responsible adviser, that advice, which future exigencies of the public service might require me to give. I have thus endeavoured to give an answer to the various interrogatives put to me by the noble lord, and I think I may venture to anticipate that my answers have quieted some of his alarms, and on the whole have been satisfactory.

After some conversation, the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a motion, that Mr. Bernal be called on to resume his place as chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means; which was agreed to, and the House resumed.

ORANGE LODGES (IRELAND).

In a conversation, resulting from the presentation of several addresses from various Orange Lodges in Ireland, Mr. John Stanley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether when petitions were presented to the Throne, supposed to originate from unrecognised societies, it had ever been the practice to add to the acknowledgment of such petitions the words "graciously received?"

SIR ROBERT PEEL could not exactly answer the question of the hon. gentleman. He apprehended that a great deal must depend upon the language of the petition. [No, no!] A great deal must depend upon the language of the petition. [No, no!] Language might be used in a petition to the throne, coming from a body, calling itself a political union, or a trades' union, of such a nature as might alone justify a minister in refusing to present it; but he apprehended that a petition coming from a trades' union would not on that account alone be refused by the minister. He had himself heard discussions in parliament, on the occasion of the Speech from the throne having denounced political unions, whether the House of Commons would be justified in receiving petitions coming from such unions, and the sense of the House was, that they ought to be received. [No, no!] Did the House uniformly reject petitions, because they professed to come from political unions, or from persons calling themselves members of a political union? With respect to the addresses presented to his Majesty, he apprehended that it would be a most painful duty to be imposed, either on his Majesty or his ministers, to refuse receiving those addresses, on account of the presumed illegality of certain acts performed by the persons who signed them. The rule ought to be to widen, rather than contract, the avenue, by which the people might approach the throne. He was certain that that was the principle upon which the House would act. On the part of the Crown he would say, "You must apply your principle uniformly." If the House of Commons did not enquire too narrowly into the character of the parties who petitioned it, nor undertake to presume the illegality of bodies signing petitions, it was but natural that his Majesty should receive petitions from his subjects, without a very minute enquiry into the particular societies from which they came. Then, with respect to the exact nature of the answers of the Crown to parties addressing it, they were but mere matters of form. Indeed, no actual answer was given, for the words amounted only to an acknowledgment that the addresses had been received. He did not exactly recollect what the rule was, but the usual terms, he believed, were that the petitions or the addresses (as the case happened to be) had been graciously received. At all events, he was sure that it was a good rule to pursue, unless they were always to assume that the petitioners or addressers were members of an illegal body.

MARCH 6, 1835.

Mr. Sheil rose to move, "That there be laid before the House copies of the letter written by Lord Manners to the Rev. Mr. Johnson respecting the legality of Orange Societies, and of the opinion of the Attorney and Solicitor general respecting such legality, given in the year 1827; also, of the addresses to the King from several Orange Lodges on the 5th of December last, and of the answers to the said addresses."

In reply to some remarks by Mr. Feargus O'Connor—

SIR ROBERT PEEL was very happy to hear, that the hon. and learned gentleman who had just sat down was going to substitute moral strength and power for the irritable and inflammable qualities that had formerly been exhibited on that side of the House; but he really could not find, in any thing that had occurred in the course of that debate, any justification for even that degree of mitigated warmth which the hon. gentleman had displayed in the course of his address to the House. He must say that the hon. and learned gentleman appeared to him to take fire very easily, and boil at a very low temperature. He thought he could convince the hon. and learned gentleman, that there was nothing on the present occasion to justify the ebullition which he had just exhibited. He had told them, that now the Irish members were supported by a powerful party, they were determined to try their strength. Now, what was the question before them? The hon. and learned member for Tipperary (Mr. Sheil) had given notice, for the information of the whole of the House, that on that day he would move for the production of certain documents—namely, the addresses to the Crown from the Orange bodies, and the answers returned to them by the Secretary of State, thinking that on the production of those documents he should be enabled to found some measure criminatory of that member of the government. The Secretary of State said, “I am perfectly willing to accede to your motion, in which I am myself concerned, and to produce the Orange addresses and the answers thereto. I am perfectly willing to follow out the objects which you declared you had in view in the notice you gave, and as far as I can have a personal or political interest, to promote them.” But the hon. and learned gentleman did not adhere to his notice, but got up, and without any notice whatever, moved for the production of a letter written by Lord Manners in 1827, and the opinion of the officers of the Crown of the legality of these societies. “I say,” continued the right hon. baronet—“I say to the hon. and learned gentleman, take your division on this point, and if you have a majority, I would infinitely prefer being in the minority for opposing, than in the majority for acceding, to it. I say, in the first place, your notice misleads us; and when you give notice of a motion for the production of documents dated in 1834, relating to the Secretary of State, and he says, ‘I am willing to produce them,’ I say, in the face of any majority, that it is not fair, without the slightest notice, to make a motion for the production of a letter written by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland in 1827. It might or it might not be right to produce it, but he would say that it was not fair to call for its production without previously giving notice of the intention to move for it. It tended to diminish the confidence of the government in their notices, and to mislead them, when they gave notice of a motion for the production of one document, and then moved, without notice, for the production of another, with no possible reason for so doing. What motive could they possibly have for refusing the production of those documents, if, consistently with the ordinary and constitutional practice, they could lay them before the House? He had sat in parliaments which had evinced extreme unwillingness to receive the opinions of the law officers of the Crown—he had sat in parliaments which had said, ‘The opinions of your law officers are nothing to us, and we will not be bound by them; we distrust the opinions of the law officers of the Crown on questions of constitutional law;’ and when a proposition had been made by a Secretary of State for the production of such documents on a question in which his own political conduct was implicated, he had seen men, claiming for themselves the title of friends of constitutional liberty, the first to oppose the production of the opinions of the law officers of the Crown. The present question, therefore, was one demanding the gravest consideration. He could have no interest in opposing the motion, but he thought he had a right to call upon the House not to decide in favour of the production of these documents until after regular and proper notice had been given. He trusted the hon. and learned gentleman would divide, and show the House, if he had no moral force on his side, what was his boasted physical strength. He had that confidence in the manliness and fairness of the hon. and learned gentleman, that he did expect him to redeem his pledge, and take the sense of the House upon the question. What was the question after all?—the only question on which the hon. and learned gentleman could take the sense of the House? Government had promised to produce the addresses and answers, and the only question was, whether the additional document should be produced which had been moved for, without any notice having been given. What was the drift of the hon. member’s speech? If the motion had any object at all, it was this, not whether, in compliance with the form that prevails on such occasions, the Secretary of State had returned certain answers, but whether, in point of fact, there had been any intention shown on the part of government to countenance certain exclusive societies. The hon. gentleman opposite had said, in reference to him, that when he was in office as secretary for Ireland, he had found it convenient and necessary to encourage those confederacies, and to look for their support. He would follow the course the hon. member had taken in his speech, and show that in attempting to found the charge against this government, which he had endeavoured to substantiate, he must himself have been sensible of the reply which it was in the power of the government to make. He would read to the House the language he had made use of in 1827, when speaking on the subject, and he would beg them to remember, that that was the period when he was supposed to be an encourager of Orange associations. In the language which he had used the other night, he had expressed himself, as at present, averse to such associations, and he should now show that he had never thought it necessary to encourage them. He was aware that it might be said, that he afterwards changed his opinions as to the relief to be given to Catholics; but the period of which he was now speaking, was in 1827, when he certainly was opposed to the removal of the Roman Catholic disabilities, and this was the language he then used:—"First, however, he must be allowed to say, that he heartily wished all these associations were at an end. He believed that they were dying away; but at the same time he agreed with the right hon. baronet, that if the processions were done away with, it would be better for the peace, the tranquillity, and the happiness of Ireland. Any opinion, therefore, which he might hold—any of the strong opinions which he was known to entertain respecting Catholic Emancipation,—could not fairly be supposed to influence him upon the present question. If he were a private gentleman in Ireland, he declared to God that he would, by his influence, by his example, by every means in his power, endeavour to put down these associations and processions." Did this imply any desire on his part to encourage these associations? Did this show that any alteration in his opinions on the subject of the Catholic claims, had influenced his sentiments with regard to these associations since 1827, at which period, although himself opposed to the Catholic claims, he had endeavoured to put them down, and expressed his belief that, if they were done away with entirely, it would be better for the peace, the tranquillity, and the happiness of Ireland?

Mr. Sheil. That was precisely what he wished to show. It was to this very statement of the right hon. baronet that he had referred.

Sir Robert Peel would then ask, whether this was not in direct opposition to the argument, that he had first encouraged, and afterwards opposed, these confederacies?

Mr. Sheil begged to interrupt the right hon. baronet for a moment. He had never charged him with having encouraged these societies.

Sir Robert Peel was putting the accusation in the form in which it had been put by the hon. and learned member for Cork (Mr. Feargus O'Connor), and he was contrasting the arguments of the hon. and learned member for Tipperary (Mr. Sheil) with those of that hon. and learned gentleman.

Mr. Feargus O'Connor. I give the right hon. baronet credit for assuming the two distinct characters.

Sir Robert Peel. That was the point on which he was desirous to set himself right with the House. He was anxious to show that he was not entitled to the honour of those two distinct characters on the subject of Orange associations, and never had been. When he opposed Catholic emancipation in 1827, he had earnestly desired the discouragement of those associations in every possible way; that had been his uniform course, and he had never assumed two characters with reference to the subject. But it had been said, that there was a Mr. McCree, from whom he had received an address. He had received an address from Mr. McCree, and, if he had been desirous of encouraging those associations, would he not, in his reply, have omitted all reference to them? Had he done so? On the contrary, he had distinctly stated in his answer, that he totally differed in opinion with Mr. McCree, and that he could not agree with him; that it was not desirable to fritter down the law, which had established perfect equality and justice between all his Majesty's subjects. Again, it had been said, the constitution of the present government was such as to destroy all confidence on the part of Irish members. They had been told, that in 1827, when there was a discussion about Orangemen, the very person who brought the question forward, and expressed himself most strongly against Orange associations, was the right hon. member for Montgomeryshire, and he had been selected by his Majesty as a member of the present cabinet. Well, but was it likely, if there were any desire to encourage confederacies of an exclusive nature on the part of the government, that his Majesty would have selected for his adviser the very man who, according to the hon. gentleman's statement, had directed his voice and influence against Orange associations in 1827? [Mr. Sheil: In 1830.] The difference was of no great importance; it did not affect the force of his argument. The question, after all, was not as to the precise legality of these associations. It was possible that associations might strictly conform to the law, and yet, that all the evils to which they gave birth, might be lasting. These evils would not be cured by making them conformable to the law, because the real danger was not the breach of the law, but the encouragement and dissemination of angry feelings. If such an association were formed, so as to conform strictly to the law, but still so as not to free it from the promulgation of angry and malignant feelings, though such an association would be within the verge of the law, it would not be freed from that which was the real objection. They could not pass an act that no Orange lodge should be formed excluding Roman Catholics. They might, indeed, say that no oaths should be administered to an Orange association, or that the test of an Orangeman should be, that he took the oath of allegiance; but he could not see how they could object to their not receiving any particular class of persons into their associations. His opinion was, that the course followed by the opponents of those associations was, in many respects, unwise. They had been taunted, threatened, and provoked; and now the feeling, which in a great measure kept them together, was, that they would resist the threats and despise the taunts which were heaped upon them. He had never sought to conceal his opinions upon this subject; he had never supposed that a conformity to the law would remove the real objection to these associations; he had always been of opinion, that the best mode of proceeding with reference to them, was to adopt that tone which would not only induce them to conform to the law, but which would enable them to form some sense of the danger of encouraging angry feelings, and the memory of fends, which were no longer called for, and which ought to be buried in oblivion. To those who wished for the tranquillity and peace of Ireland, he would say, that they ought not to set the example of establishing these dangerous associations themselves; and, above all, that they should avoid language which might tend to keep up the feelings which engendered them. But, with regard to the particular question before the House, he was surprised at the manner in which it had been discussed. It was a privilege secured to the king's subjects by the bill of rights, that they should lay their petitions before his majesty; and, he would ask, would it be proper or wise that the king should stop to make minute enquiries, as to what particular association the persons sending the address belonged to, or what particular opinions they held, before he received their addresses? No doubt, the hon. member would be able to show, with respect to political unions, that before they were denounced by proclamation, the king had received their petitions, and that the king did not inform them they had forfeited the common right of his subjects. Was it not clear, then, that his right hon. friend, in following the ordinary practice of his office, had not the slightest intention to pronounce an opinion on the legality or illegality of the body from whom the addresses had come, but merely, in conformity to that practice, to return the usual answer? If this principle had been acted upon in the case of the political unions, why was it objected to in the case of the Orange association? It was an attempt to narrow the right and privilege of the subject to address the Crown, or to cause the Crown to enquire into the particular opinions or associations to which those persons belonged who did address it, and, in that way, to prevent those opinions being conveyed to the sovereign, or to parliament, in the manner most palatable to those who wished to express them. If these bodies were illegal, why were they not put down? Hon. gentlemen would seem to assume that they were illegal—if they were, would there be no difficulty in suppressing them? Although he considered that they led to irritation, he was not satisfied of their illegality; but if they were illegal, why not institute a prosecution against them? If they were illegal, let them be prosecuted; but, if they were not, his earnest advice was, to set an example of forbearance, and let the advice conveyed to them be in friendly terms; for then he was confident that it would have a much more salutary impression than the most violent and menacing language that could be resorted to.

After a long and angry discussion, the motion—withdrawing the part objected to—was agreed to.

CANADA.

MARCH 9, 1835.

Mr. Roebuck presented a petition from certain members of the Legislative Council and House of Assembly of Lower Canada, complaining of the grievances under which they laboured.

SIR ROBERT PEEL:—I beg to assure the hon. member who has just concluded, as well as the House at large, that it is because I wish to act upon the advice he has now given me, and because I desire to view the subject dispassionately, and divested of the difficulties in which it is sought to immerge it, that I rise for the purpose of deprecating the continuance of a discussion which, in my humble opinion, is neither likely to conduce to the amicable settlement of the unfortunate difficulties that prevail between the Canadian colonies and the British government, or to place the question in a point of view which will make it more intelligible, or less intricate to those to whom its several bearings are imperfectly known. I do hope, Sir, that this debate will not be continued; but should it not meet the wish of the House that it should here stop, I do trust that it will be continued without any farther reference to Mr. Papineau or his actions, to the Canadian party as opposed to the English party, or, in short, without further reference to any of those exciting and unincidental topics with which it has pleased the hon. and learned member for Bath to charge his speech. I am, however, inclined to hope that the course which his Majesty's government have resolved upon pursuing in reference to the subject, and which I am now about to announce, will be deemed a conclusive reason why the advice of the hon. member for Worcester should be generally followed, and why this discussion should, at all events for the present, be brought to an end. Before, however, I proceed to state the intentions of the government, I must be allowed to say a few words in answer to an observation of the hon. and learned member for Bath. Referring to the great delay which has taken place in the settlement of the disputed matter, the hon. and learned member said, he attributed it altogether to the frequent changes which had of late years occurred in the office of Secretary of State for the Colonial Department, and concluded by recommending that a fixed office, not determinable on the changes in the administration, should be created for the management of Colonial affairs. Such a remedy, I do not hesitate to say, is one altogether incapable of adoption. The Executive for the time being, it is quite evident, must, as a body, be answerable for the management of the highly-important affairs coming under the jurisdiction of the Colonial Department. Now, how could that responsibility be attached to them if they were to have at the head of that department an officer altogether independent of their control, and totally irresponsible to them for any acts he might direct in the management of those affairs? Such an arrangement could not be satisfactory to any of the parties concerned in colonial affairs; and, great as might be the inconvenience attendant upon frequent changes in the office of Colonial Secretary, I am prepared to maintain that the remedy proposed would be far from an improvement. I think I can, however, satisfy the hon. member, that at all events the recent change in the administration has not prejudiced the consideration of the present question, and that it shall not do so. I am ready, on the part of my noble friend the Secretary for the Colonies, to give the hon. member every pledge he may desire. On the appointment of Lord Aberdeen, he found this Canadian question in precisely the same condition it was left by the committee which sat in 1830. The right hon. gentleman opposite has stated that, when removed from office, he was on the eve of proposing to his colleagues in office certain principles on which a settlement of the question should be sought. I believe that to have been the case; but, as the right hon. gentleman has stated, of those principles no record was left by him at the Colonial Office. For my part, and I am sure I may say the same on the part of my noble friend, I much wish that such a record was in our possession, because, in addition to the opportunity it would have given us of testifying our respect for the opinions of the right hon. gentleman, it could not but materially have assisted us in the task we had to perform. The right hon. gentleman's motive for taking with him all the documents he had prepared on the subject, no one can question; it was that his successor in office should not be embarrassed by his views in forming his decision; but, much as I am disposed to do credit to the proper spirit which characterised his conduct, I cannot help repeating my regret that Lord Aberdeen should not have had the benefit of his opinions. However, notwithstanding the recent change of government, and notwithstanding, also, the arduousness of the duties in which, immediately on his appointment as Secretary for Colonial Affairs, he finds himself involved, I am happy to say measures have already been taken to ensure a settlement of the differences. On our taking office, we felt that the question demanded instant consideration, and we accordingly had it communicated to the Colonial authorities that we were determined at an early period to proceed to the settlement of the disputes. With this view we authorized Lord Aylmer to inform them that his Majesty had determined to send out to Canada a representative totally unconnected with local politics, altogether unembued with local prejudices, and completely unmixed in Canadian affairs, who should be enabled on the spot to take a whole view of the subject, and being in full possession of the opinions and intentions of the government here upon the several matters in dispute, might report upon the best and most satisfactory means for bringing them to a final adjustment. This is the course we propose to adopt. We felt the greatest difficulty in bringing the matter to a conclusion by written communications. There might be misunderstanding on some points, misinterpretation on others; and the distance between the two points rendering the clearing of those misunderstandings and misrepresentations a most tedious and difficult process, we, after mature deliberation, came to the resolution, that it would be better to send out a person in full possession of our views and intentions in the several matters to be adjudicated, and enabled to enter into full communication with the Canadian authorities upon them. Our final intention is, upon a report of the real state of the case being made to us, to remove what is justly obnoxious, and in place of it, to propose those measures which we believe to be consistent with justice to the parties concerned, and with sound policy as regards the general interests of the country. Under these circumstances, I think the House will feel that I take the most prudent course in declining to enter further into the subject at present; and I, at the same time, hope they will agree with me in the opinion, that the course most likely to bring about an amicable settlement of the dispute, is that which his Majesty's government have adopted. We do not mean to disregard the petitions of the Canadian population, but we mean to appeal to their sense of reason and justice; and we believe, firmly believe, that our appeal will prove successful. We will give their claims every just consideration; but, at the same time, I am bound distinctly to state, we do not mean to declare any new principle of government in the Colonies. Our object is to see of what it is the Canadian people complain, and then to see to what extent those complaints are founded in justice. If we find they are not founded in justice, our aim shall be to prevent their continued and useless agitation; but if, on the contrary, we find they are founded in justice, we shall apply ourselves in a spirit of conciliation, and without regard to the epithets of contumely and insult previously heaped upon us, to their permanent and satisfactory removal. Having stated thus clearly what is the course we have resolved upon pursuing in reference to this question, I beg to assure the House, I shall not occupy their attention by any comment upon the numerous and unincidental topics introduced by the hon. member for Bath into his speech. One word, however—a sense of justice compels me to say in defence of the noble lord, the member for North Lancashire, whose conduct has been so unjustifiably attacked by the hon. member who originated this discussion. Sir, I do not believe that the conduct of any ministry of this country, or any public man, minister or otherwise, was ever exposed to so severe an ordeal as that of the noble lord to whom I allude; and I may say further, I doubt whether any man could go through such an ordeal with more honour or credit to his character than did the noble lord. While a minister of the Crown, that noble lord went before a Committee of the House of Commons—a Committee indiscriminately chosen—having on its list many members adverse to the policy of the government with which he was connected—a Committee as fair a representative of the average opinions of that House as could possibly be selected—a Committee as fully the representative of the interests of the Canadian body, as of the British party in Canada—before such a Committee the noble lord went, and, after producing to them every document, public or private, his office contained, left it to them to judge whether the complaints brought against him were founded in justice or otherwise. Sir, I repeat, I know of no example of a minister having taken such a course to free himself from accusation, and much less of a minister, after taking such a course, passing through the ordeal so honourable to himself and his character, as did the noble lord. As far, therefore, as the accusation of the hon. member for Bath is concerned, I think the noble lord best consults his own dignity by treating it with indignant, or rather contemptuous silence. I would here, Sir, cease to occupy the attention of the House, were it not that there occurs to me one other point in the hon. member for Bath's speech, which I do not think I ought to pass over without notice. The hon. member has been pleased to threaten us, that unless every thing the Canadians ask for is granted them, they have determined upon rebellion. Those, I think, were the expressions of the hon. and learned member. He also undertook to assure us, that thirteen million inhabitants of the United States of America, a country with which Great Britain at this moment enjoys the profoundest amity, a country with which Great Britain is almost daily interchanging expressions of most friendly feeling, a country with which Great Britain has scarcely a subject of difference—their old jealousies being now removed, and each, conscious that the prosperity of the other must influence its own prosperity, reciprocally desiring that peace, tranquillity, and good order might flourish in the other—such, Sir, I say, being the state of the two countries, the hon. gentleman thinks fit to declare that if a rebellion should break out in Canada, the whole of the United Provinces are prepared to interfere in our domestic quarrels, and join these rebellious Canadians. Now, Sir, I will not do the United States the injustice to believe, even for a moment, that they, or any one on their behalf, could have authorized the hon. and learned member to make such a declaration within the walls of the British House of Commons. I have too high an opinion of their justice and integrity; but even if that opinion were wanting, I entertain such a sense of their shrewdness, common sense, and discretion, that I cannot believe they would select as their organ in this House, the hon. member who has thought proper to represent himself in that capacity. With respect to his declaration of the intentions of the Canadians I have also a word to say. I think, Sir, it is far better for me, instead of being exasperated by the language the hon. and learned member has been pleased to put, as it were, into the mouths of the Canadian party, of whom he says he is the representative, and instead of demeaning myself by retorting equally hard words and unworthy expressions, simply, and in the plainest language, to state, that I both hope and trust the hon. gentleman has had no authority from that party to tell the British House of Commons, that, unless all their demands are acceded to, they will have recourse to rebellion. Indeed, Sir, painful as the alternative would be, I should be rather inclined to believe that for the moment—I say, Sir, only for the moment—the wisdom and discretion for which the hon. and learned gentleman is so remarkable, forsook him, than to suppose that he gave us a correct report of the intentions of his, as he has been pleased to term them, constituents. But if, on the other hand, it should turn out that his information is correct—if it be true that the Canadian people, or any part of them, have instructed the hon. member to act in the capacity of their minister at war, and to declare in the British Parliament that they are prepared to rebel if all their demands are not acceded to—I, as minister of the British government, will meet them, not with any counter declaration of hostility, but, with the hand of peace and friendship grasping theirs, I will say to them, “Still we intend to do you justice—still, notwithstanding we derive from your menaces a fresh source of strength—although by your threats you arm us with fresh means of arousing public opinion on our side—and although by your unfounded accusations, which in the end will recoil on yourselves, and give us the strength to disregard your vaunting, you induce a fresh conviction of your injustice and intemperance, we are determined to go on unflinchingly in the course we have set out on; and, by removing all fair ground for complaint, take from you even the pretence for asserting that his Majesty's colonial subjects do not meet from the British government that consideration and attention to which they are entitled.

Mr. Hume, Mr. Baring, and Mr. Labouchere having addressed the House,—Mr. Sheil rose, and was proceeding to read from the report of the committee a copy of a despatch, dated Colonial Office, 1830, when,—

Sir Robert Peel objected to the course which the hon. and learned member was pursuing as unparliamentary and unprecedented. The hon. member was reading to the House quotations from the evidence taken before a committee of the House which had never been laid on the table, and which was, consequently, not within the cognizance of the House.

Mr. Sheil stated that he had found the report on the table of the House, and had only made the same use of it as his hon. friend the member for Bath had done, without incurring the reprehension of the right hon. baronet.

Sir Robert Peel said, that he had expressly desired to avoid entering into the subject, because the effects of a preliminary discussion might have the effect of prejudicing the question at present pending. He thought the Canadian House of Assembly was a fitter place to entertain complaints of the nature of those contained in the petitions in the first instance than the British House of Commons, to which an ultimate appeal only ought to be addressed.

Mr. Roebuck having replied,—

Sir Robert Peel said, that if the first speech of the hon. gentleman had partaken of even a portion of the spirit of forbearance which pervaded the second, no observations should have fallen from him which contained a syllable of reproach or invective. He congratulated the hon. member on the altered tone of his second address, which he said was conceived and expressed in a far wiser, better, and more temperate spirit than the first. He would add, that every possible degree of caution had been used in the selection of the individual who was to be sent to Canada as the representative of the British government; and every necessary power had been conferred on him to settle the questions at issue between the local executive and the legislature. He had also to state, that a notification of the appointment, and an intimation of the probable time of his arrival, had been sent to the Canadas upwards of six weeks since.

The petition to lie on the table.

THE MALT DUTIES.

MARCH 10, 1835.

In the debate arising out of the Marquess of Chandos's motion, "That it is expedient that the present duties upon malt shall altogether cease and determine,"

SIR ROBERT PEEL spoke to the following effect: The course which I intend to pursue in the present debate, makes me peculiarly anxious to rise at an early period of the discussion, when I am not likely to be diverted by any reference to topics of party excitement from the attempt to call the attention of the House—not to matters mixed up with political considerations, affecting merely the interests of parties in the state, but to the review of those facts and arguments upon which their judgment ought to be formed, and the exclusion of which from their consideration would, in my opinion, produce the most serious prejudice to the best interests of the country. The question which must this night be decided involves interests so complicated and comprehensive, as to impose upon the House—upon that jury of which the noble marquess has spoken, the solemn obligation of finding their verdict upon the dictates of their conscientious conviction. I too call upon this jury, impannelled on this high occasion, to decide, not on partial opinion, not upon promises rashly and inconsiderately made, not upon unsound prejudices, not with reference to the particular interest of any one class of the community, but as becomes a jury, upon a comprehensive view of the merits of the whole question, upon a calm consideration of the evidence I shall offer, and the arguments I shall adduce.

I am called upon to consider this question—namely, whether I can consent to a resolution which pledges me irrevocably to the total repeal of the malt-tax. I am called upon to consent to that resolution, at a period when the House has had no opportunity of hearing any financial statement—at a period when it knows not from any authentic declaration what is the amount of the demands for the public service—what is the amount of disposable revenue—before it has had any opportunity of considering any other claim for the remission of taxation: I am under these circumstances called upon to pledge myself irrevocably to deprive the public revenue of several millions of money. If such a motion as the present is at any time defensible, I appeal to the House, whether it ought not to have been postponed at least till after an authorized exposition of the national means had been laid before the House? It will be my duty to make such a communication to the House as soon as possible after the close of the financial year—namely, the 1st of April; I shall then have an opportunity of describing to the House the state of the public revenue, and the amount of the demands for the public service, and the House being thus put in possession of the actual amount of the surplus, may appropriate it either to the remission of taxation, or in any other way it may think expedient. The noble marquess, however, would not wait for this explanation, but has called upon the House, in fact, to exclude the consideration of every other interest, except that which he advocated, by pledging itself that the malt-tax should be the first, and I need scarcely add the only, burthen of taxation it would repeal. Thus forced into a discussion, which I think ought to have been postponed, it becomes necessary for me to enter on the task of convincing the House of the impropriety of acceding to the noble marquess's proposition, and of cautioning it against the consequences which would result from a precipitate, and in my opinion unjustifiable, pledge to repeal the malt-tax.

Of course, I am unable to develop with perfect accuracy the financial prospects of the ensuing year; but I may refer to a statement made by my predecessor in the office which I now fill, which I apprehend is correct enough, in its results at least, for all practical purposes. The noble lord (Lord Althorp), in his budget last year, after providing for the repeal of the house-tax, made a calculation of the probable available surplus for the year beginning the 1st of April, 1835, and ending the 1st of April, 1836. It is sufficient for my purpose to state, that although in some respects the calculations of Lord Althorp are erroneous; yet I think that, upon the whole, the result at which his lordship arrived is not far from the truth. Lord Althorp estimated, that the demands for the service of the present year would be identical with those of the last. I, however, have the satisfaction of stating to the House, that I trust there will be a considerable reduction in the estimates for the present year. I believe that the estimates for the ordinary service of the year will exhibit a reduction of at least £470,000. Although this will of course increase the available surplus revenue; yet, as there are miscalculations in the statement of the noble lord (for which his lordship is in no degree responsible), as to the amount of charge on the consolidated fund, the correction of which will diminish the amount of surplus revenue to an extent not very far short of the saving on the estimates, Lord Althorp's estimate of the amount of available surplus is upon the whole not an inaccurate one. Lord Althorp calculated, that on the 5th of April next the revenue would exceed the expenditure by about £250,000 I think, and after reducing nearly half a million on the estimates, I cannot calculate upon having a greater surplus than £250,000; I mean, of course, after providing for £750,000, an annual charge for compensation to the West-India proprietors, and after the revenue has been subjected to the operation of the repeal of the house-tax.

In this state of our financial prospects, with a surplus of £250,000, the noble marquess requires the House to pledge itself on this night to the repeal of the whole of the malt-tax. Now, what is the total amount of this tax? I believe, that the gross produce of the malt-tax last year was £5,150,000; but perhaps it would be more satisfactory to the House if I were to state what has been the net amount paid into the exchequer for the last four years on account of this tax. That will afford the best indication of the productiveness of the impost. In the year ending the 5th of January, 1832, the net sum paid into the Exchequer on account of the malt-duty was £4,208,000; in the year ending the 5th of January, 1833, the net amount was £4,675,000; in the year ending the 5th of January, 1834, it was £4,772,000; and in the year ending the 5th of January, 1835, it was £4,812,000. Thus, then, it appears, that with a surplus of only £250,000, the House is called upon to sacrifice a revenue—and observe, a gradually increasing revenue, of £4,812,000; that is to say, it is required to cause a defalcation, an actual deficit, of £4,562,000.

The noble lord has told the House, that by repealing the whole of the malt-tax, all the expense consequent on its collection will be saved to the country. Of course, there can be no doubt that, in determining on the policy of a tax, the charge of its collection is a material consideration. For that very reason, I have taken the pains to ascertain what is the charge at which the malt-tax is collected; and I venture to say, that there will be found few taxes, the collection of which is accompanied with less expense to the public than the malt-tax. I have endeavoured to ascertain what extent of establishment might be dispensed with, supposing that it should be determined to part with the whole of the malt-tax. It is of course difficult to estimate the precise charge of collecting any particular tax, because the same revenue officers are employed in the collection of various taxes, but it is not difficult to determine what charge may be got rid of by repealing a tax; and this, indeed, is not an unfair indication of the expense entailed on the country by that tax, as the charge for its collection. I think, then, that I can with confidence state, that the charge of collecting the gross revenue of £5,100,000, derived from the malt-tax, is certainly not more than £150,000; and I do not believe, that it is possible to make any reduction, in respect of establishment, which would save the country a larger sum than that which I have just mentioned, if the House should consent to repeal the whole of the malt-tax. Besides the cost of its collection, another material consideration in determining on the comparative policy of a tax, is the opportunity it affords for frauds and unfair dealing. Now, I can with equal confidence state, that there is no tax by which £5,000,000 of money is raised, nor any combination of taxes producing the same amount, which, on the whole, admits of fewer opportunities for fraud and unfair dealing than the malt-tax. I do not at the present moment pretend to give any opinion as to the possibility of adopting still further securities against the commission of fraud; or of affording greater facilities for the manufacture of malt, by freeing it from excise restrictions. It is not necessary for me to enter into the discussion of these points; for if the House should unfortunately, in the absence of all information, pledge itself to the total repeal of the malt-tax, it will render it unnecessary to consider whether any modifications or improvements can be made in the excise regulations respecting the manufacture of the article, or the collection of the duty.

The noble lord, and the hon. gentleman who seconded the motion before the House, complain that no remission whatever has recently taken place with reference to the malt-tax. Is it then forgotten, that in the year 1830, this very article of malt was relieved from a charge to which it was subject in the shape of a duty on beer?—a charge which, if calculated with reference to the quarter of barley, was not less than 35s. the quarter in amount? The noble lord said, that he called for a repeal of the malt-duty, because the agricultural interest is in a state of depression, and because the price of agricultural produce has rapidly fallen. Is that, I ask, the case with regard to barley? Can it be said that the present price of barley is lower than the price of the same article during the last year? Is it not a singular circumstance, that the price of barley at the present moment is higher, with reference to the price of wheat, than it has ever been known before? And yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Handley) assumes, that certain relief will be afforded to the agricultural interest by freeing from duty that article which bears the highest price, independently of the duty. The price of wheat, being untaxed, is low, while the price of barley, subject to a heavy tax, is high. Such being the facts of the case, by what reasoning does the hon. gentleman arrive at the conclusion, that the removal of the tax from barley will necessarily increase the price of that article?

There is another remarkable fact which ought to be borne in mind, that the rate of duty having continued the same, and the intrinsic price of the article having risen, there has taken place during the last four years a progressive and considerable increase in the consumption of barley? If the rate of duty had tended to lessen the number of the quarters of barley brought to charge, or to diminish the amount of the revenue derived from the tax, the hon. gentleman would then have been in possession of a powerful argument in favour of its remission; because he might have contended, that if the duty were lowered, the consumption of barley would be increased, and the apparent loss to the revenue, by the abatement of the tax, would be made up by an increased use of the article. But I am prepared to show, that while the rate of duty has remained unchanged, the quantity of barley brought to charge has gone on increasing. The net payments into the Exchequer for the last four years on account of the malt duty are as follows:—

1833.....	4,772,000	1834.....	4,812,000

Thus, then, there is an increase in the amount of duty received by the Exchequer, an increase in the consumption of barley, and also in the price of that article. These are three remarkable facts which ought not to be lost sight of. But though those who advocate the repeal of the malt-duty cannot deny that an increase in the price of barley has taken place, yet they contend that that increased price is the consequence of a deficient harvest. True it is, they say, that there has been an increase in the consumption of barley during the four years preceding the last, but in those years there have also been good harvests of barley; in the last year, however, there occurred a bad harvest, and an increase has consequently taken place in the price of malting barley. Now, if that statement be correct, there is also another effect which a deficient harvest ought to have produced—namely, it ought to have diminished the quantity of barley brought to charge. The whole of that argument will therefore be destroyed, if I can show that the quantity of barley brought to charge since October in last year has increased, as compared with the quantity brought to charge in the corresponding period of the preceding year. Well knowing that it would be alleged there has been a defective harvest in barley last year, and that the rise in the price of the article is sufficiently accounted for by that fact, I have taken the trouble to obtain from the Excise-office, this very morning, an account of the number of bushels of malt brought to charge from the 10th of October, 1833, to the 19th of February, 1834, in order that I might compare the amount then brought to charge, with the quantity brought to charge within the corresponding period, namely—from the 10th of October, 1834, to the 19th of February in the present year.

In the first of these periods the number of bushels brought to market was.....	} 18,509,904
In the second.....
Being an increase in the latter, as compared with the former, of.....	846,779

This then is clear, that so far as we have hitherto the means of judging, the assumed deficiency in the harvest of last year has not led to a diminished consumption of malting barley. We have a higher price, and an increased consumption—why then disturb the tax? and what ground have you for hoping that barley, subject to the tax, being very high, and wheat subject to no tax, being very low, the removal of the tax on barley will ensure a rise in the price of wheat?

In discussing the present question, I have no desire to make any appeal to the fears or passions of the House, or to refer to any topic calculated unduly or unfairly to influence the House in its view of the present question. I will willingly deprive myself of any such illegitimate advantage, if the House will only consent to give me its patient attention while I strictly confine myself to a statement of facts, and to a review of the arguments, if arguments they can be called, which have been urged in favour of the revision of the malt-tax. That the agricultural interest has the first claim to your consideration, I readily admit; that its present depressed state is a subject of deep anxiety, and calls for your warmest sympathy, I am the foremost to acknowledge; but it is the part of a true friend not to permit his reason and judgment to be overpowered by his feelings, but to consider dispassionately whether real relief will be afforded by a specious proposal. The advocates for the repeal of the malt-tax contend that there exists no other means of relieving the agricultural interest except by repealing the duty; and it is prophesied that many collateral advantages will result from the repeal of the tax. Matters of prophecy are of course matters of uncertainty; but I am anxious to ascertain, by the aid of past experience, what probability there exists of the realization of the prophecies to which I allude.

In the first place it is stated, that a great diminution in the consumption of malt is produced by the operation of the tax; and that if the quantity of malt and beer consumed in recent years is compared with the quantity consumed at an earlier period in the history of this country, it will be found (to use the words of the hon.

member, Mr. Handley) that the consumption of the old national beverage of this kingdom has greatly diminished. I am ready to admit that, in proportion to the population, the quantity of beer consumed at present has diminished, as compared with the quantity consumed at an early period of the last century. But the question is not as to the fact, but as to the cause of it. Does that diminution arise from the operation of the duty on malt, or from the competition of other articles, which have come into general use in this country? The hon. gentleman who seconded the motion, has drawn rather a singular inference from the increased consumption of these articles. He has expressed his surprise at finding that, while the consumption of beer in proportion to the population has diminished, the consumption of tea, coffee, and spirits has increased. Now I had intended to refer to the increase of the consumption of those articles for the very purpose of accounting for the decrease in the consumption of beer, but it seems that that fact had led the hon. gentleman (Mr. Handley) to a conclusion quite opposite to that which it produces in my mind. The hon. gentleman exclaimed, "You see the people of this country drink vastly more tea, more coffee, and more spirits than formerly. Why then," he asks in a tone of great surprise, mixed with much triumph, "do they not drink more beer also?" My reply is, because they consume more spirits, tea, and coffee. It is owing to a change in our national habits, and not to the operation of the duty, that the diminution in the consumption of malt is attributable. I will state the case in the manner which the hon. gentleman will admit to be the most unfavourable to myself. I will select the year in the last century, in which, of all others, the consumption of beer in proportion to the drinkers of beer was the greatest. That year was the year 1722. In 1722, the population amounted to about 6,000,000, and the number of barrels of beer consumed, as stated in the returns, was about the same, nearly 6,000,000, being in the proportion of one barrel to each person. In 1833, the population amounted to 14,000,000, and the average annual consumption for the last three years preceeding the repeal of the beer-duty amounted to no more than 8,200,000 barrels. Now I give the hon. gentleman the full advantage of these facts, and of any conclusions he may draw from them. The hon. gentleman would, no doubt, contend that this lamentable falling off in the drinking of beer, arises from the tax, and the tax alone. I, on the other hand, must argue, that the deficiency arises from altered habits, from new tastes, and consequently the increased consumption of other articles. It is very important to examine this matter a little more in detail. In 1722, the total quantity of tea consumed in this country did not exceed 370,000lbs., or about an ounce to each person. In 1833, the quantity of tea consumed amounted to 31,829,000lbs., being about two pounds and a quarter to each person. The use of tea has in fact superseded, to a great extent, the use of beer among all classes of the community. In like manner, the consumption of spirits has increased also. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Handley) may say that he deprecates the increased use of spirits; but he would find it quite impossible, let him propose what regulations he would, to prevent their consumption. The hon. gentleman might increase the duty on spirits; and he might flatter himself that he was diminishing their consumption, while he would in fact be only lessening the revenue which they produced. In 1722, there was about 3,000,000 gallons of spirits consumed, which gave a proportion to each individual of about half a gallon. In 1833, 12,332,000 gallons, being at the rate to each person of six-sevenths of a gallon. An extraordinary increase has also taken place in the consumption of coffee. With respect to that article, there are no accurate returns previous to 1760. In that year, however, the quantity of coffee consumed was not more than 262,000lbs., or three quarters of an ounce to each person. In 1833, the consumption of coffee had increased to 20,691,000lbs., or nearly one pound and a half to each person. With these returns before me, I cannot help arriving at conclusions the opposite of those to which the hon. gentleman arrived, that the increased consumption of the three articles I have mentioned, viz., tea, coffee, and spirits, accounts for the decreased consumption of beer; that you cannot expect those who drink three times the quantity of other beverages, to drink, on that very account, a greater quantity of beer; that you cannot have an immensely increased revenue from tea, from coffee, and from spirits, and also a corresponding increase in the revenue derived from the article which they displaced; and lastly, that, so far as morality is concerned, no very great advantage would be gained by discountenancing the use of tea and coffee for the purpose of substituting beer in their place.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Handley) seems to think that the use of tea and coffee is unfairly encouraged, and that their consumption is increased in consequence of the duty on those articles being lower than that which is applied to beer. He calls out for justice to the old national beverage, and demands that it should not be sacrificed to the undue favour that is shown to the articles of foreign extraction. But it is better to appeal, in matters of this kind, to figures and facts, than to the passions and feelings of the audience, and, instead of being pathetic, calmly to enquire, whether the rate per cent of the duty levied on barley, compared with the prime cost of this article, is so much higher than the corresponding rates on the other articles that compete with beer. The duty on malt is 2*s.* 7*d.*, per bushel, or about fifty-seven per cent on the price of the article:

The duty on other articles of general consumption, compared with the cost price, is as follows:

	Rate of Duty,			Rate per Cent. on Market Prices.
	s.	d.
On Port and Sherry. ....	5	6	½ gall.	...	85
Coffee, West India .....	0	6	½ lb	...	63
Ditto, East India .....	0	9	½ lb	...	106
Tea .....					100
English Spirits .....	7	6	½ gall.	...	333
Rum .....	9	6	½ gall.	...	407
Brandy .....	22	6	½ gall.	...	627
Geneva .....					930

Such are the facts of the case, and I will ask the hon. gentleman, whether the increased consumption of the several articles I have named can justly be attributed to any favour shown to them in the amount of duty as compared with that upon beer.

I shall proceed in the review of each of the several allegations and arguments of the noble mover and seconder of the motion. I wish to omit none of them; but calmly to submit each to the test of accurate enquiry and fair reasoning. The noble lord and the hon. gentleman have observed, that the House ought not to estimate the gain which would accrue to the consumer from the reduction of the duty on malt solely by the amount of that duty: for, that there are some enormous profits made by the maltsters, in which, as soon as the malt-duty should be repealed, the public would fully participate. The malt-duty is 20*s.* 8*d.* per quarter, and the total amount received by the exchequer is no more than £5,000,000; but, according to the statement of the noble lord, a sum of £16,000,000 apart from the duty, finds its way by some mysterious process into the hands of the maltsters, and is divided among them. I certainly do not pretend to understand whence this sum of £16,000,000 comes, or the proportion in which it is divided among the happy maltsters; but, I will ask, is it credible that in this country, and in an open trade, such extravagant profits can be made by the manufacturers of malt? Is it credible that while the whole amount, of revenue received by the government on account of malt does not exceed £5,000,000 the public is burthened with an additional charge of £16,000,000, which goes into the pockets of the parties by whom that article is manufactured? Is it likely that such enormous profits can be made in a trade which is open to all the world? There is, in fact, great competition in the malting trade. The number of maltsters is not less than 14,000; and there is one peculiar circumstance in that trade which will always ensure a great competition—which will draw speculators into this trade who will not, and cannot, enter into other trades. The manufacture of malt is, in fact, carried on in a considerable degree by capital provided by the public. The maltster, by giving bond, is allowed to defer the payment of duty, although he realizes the amount of that duty on the sale of the article, and is enabled thereby to make a fresh purchase of barley. But it is said the difference between the price of barley and the price of malt is alone sufficient to prove the enormous profit of the maltster. I recollect a calculation on this head, which was made by the hon. member for Oldham last year. The hon. member stated the price of barley to be 25*s.* per quarter, and the rate of duty to be 20*s.* 8*d.* per quarter; he, therefore, concluded that the price of a quarter of malt ought to be, independent of the charges of its manufactures, 45s. 8d. But the hon. member said, that in point of fact, the quarter of malt cost 66s.; so that a clear profit of 19s. per quarter, at least, went into the pockets of the maltster. It is well, in discussing any subject, to have the latest information respecting it that can be obtained; and I, therefore, sent this morning to Mark-lane, to learn what is the price of barley, and the price of malt of equal quality; so that I might be able to judge whether the statement respecting the enormous gains made by the maltsters is well-founded. I am informed that the price of good malting-barley in Mark-lane this day is from 36s. to 40s. per quarter. That is, undoubtedly, a pretty good price for barley, for the article of which, notwithstanding the high price, the consumption has, according to the last returns, increased, instead of having diminished. Adding to the price of the quarter of the best barley, namely, 40s., the amount of the duty on malt, which is 20s. 8d., the price of malt, independent of the cost of manufacture, ought to be 60s. 8d. per quarter. The price of the best malt in Mark-lane, is, in fact, 66s. per quarter, leaving a difference of 5s. 4d. between the price of malt and the price of barley, increased by the amount of the duty. Now, I do not think that after deducting the actual expenses of malting from the sum of 5s. 4d., any such profit would remain to the maltsters as would enable them to divide that mysterious gain of £16,000,000, which the noble marquess has assigned to them.

The noble marquess (Marquess of Chandos) and the hon. member (Mr. Handley) have spoken of the advantages which would result from the remission of the malt-duty, in consequence of the facility which would thereby be afforded to the farmer of malting his inferior barley, not for the purpose of making beer, but of feeding his cattle. Now, I have the satisfaction of being able to inform my noble friend that this object is in a great measure effected by an order of the Board of Excise, which I am anxious to make public, and which I regret has not been sufficiently known before. I apprehend, that it is not necessary that barley, for the purpose of rendering it suitable for feeding cattle, should undergo the process of malting. I understand, that if the barley be steeped and afterwards dried, all those saccharine qualities which make barley peculiarly useful as food for cattle will be developed. I believe that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Handley) has stated, that it would be highly advantageous to the farmer to be enabled, not to malt, but to steep his barley for that purpose. I certainly do not credit the assertion, that two bushels of malt equal in nutritive quality three bushels of barley. [Mr. Cobbett: More nutriment is contained in two bushels of malt than in three bushels of barley.] I do not think such an assertion is correct. I know that two bushels of malt will not produce the same quantity of spirit as two bushels of raw barley; and I therefore cannot understand how it is possible for the former to contain fifty per cent. more of nutritive quality than the latter. I will now read the order of the Board of Excise to which I have already alluded, and to which I desire that the greatest publicity may be given. It is in the following terms:—"The practice of steeping barley in water to prepare it as food for cattle having become prevalent, and as the revenue may be injured by the application thereof to other purposes,—ordered that the respective supervisors and officers endeavour to ascertain the parties who carry on this practice within their several districts, and their manner of disposing of the corn so steeped; but that no interruption whatever be given thereto, except upon actual proof or well-grounded suspicion of fraud. Particular attention must be paid to the situation of the premises where the corn may be steeped, with respect to any kiln or oven upon, or in, which it could be dried, as well as to the proportion which the quantities of barley steeped bear to the number of horses or other cattle to be fed therewith; and if any suspicious circumstances shall be discovered, the matter must be fully investigated, and the particulars stated to the board."

It will be seen that the object of this order certainly is not to permit the malting of barley, but to afford every facility to the farmer to prepare that article for the purpose of feeding his cattle, which is consistent with the safety of the revenue.

One favourite argument in favour of the repeal of the malt-duty is, that it will encourage the poor man to brew his own beer. The arguments by which it is attempted to support that assertion appear to me exceedingly fallacious. What inducement can the poor man have to brew his own beer which he does not possess at the present moment? Why should he not at present buy his malt, and with that brew as much beer as he needs for his own consumption? The hon. member for Oldham argued, that in consequence of the high price of malt, and the large profits of the maltsters, it is quite impossible for the poor man to buy malt in retail, but that if you repeal the malt-duty every man will be his own maltster. But, supposing that the malt-duty were repealed, would the poor man then be in a better condition to compete with the great maltster? Would the poor man in his small cottage, and with his limited means, be then better able to compete with the great maltsters, with extensive capital, great skill, great experience; and with buildings and floors, and cisterns and kilns, all suited for the purpose of making malt on a large scale? If not, what greater temptation would he have to brew than he has at present? Oh, it will be said, he will be relieved from the duty, and will not the regular maltster be relieved from it also? How will their relative position be altered? How will the means of the maltster to manufacture an article of equal quality at a less price be diminished? What gain is it to the poor man to be able to manufacture a bad article at a high cost? But again, if the poor man is so much disposed to brew his own beer, how is it that he did not do so previous to the repeal of the duty on beer? At that time a very heavy duty per barrel attached to the great brewer, which the poor man, who chose to brew in his own cottage, was not called on to pay. But if the poor man did not then brew his own beer, having that advantage, why should it be supposed that he would do so should the malt-duty be repealed, when he certainly will not have an advantage equal to that which he had then? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Handley) has said a great deal against the beer-shops, and, like many others, who are warm panegyrists of what they call our old national beverage, seems to think that if beer be drunk in beer-shops, all its salutary qualities vanish at once. He has come to the conclusion that beer is a noxious fluid unless it is drunk by labouring men in their own houses after having been brewed by their own hands. But I entreat the House not to consent to the loss of £5,000,000 of revenue, under the delusive expectation, that encouragement will thereby be given to the agricultural labourers to brew their beer and drink their beer in their own cottages. The same reason which induces them to go to the beer-shop at present will continue to operate after the repeal of the malt-duty. At this moment, if the labouring man purchases his beer at the public-house, and takes it away to drink at his own house, he may have the beer at a reduced rate. There is a considerable difference between the price of a pot of beer purchased at the public-house and carried away, and the price which is charged to a man who sits down and consumes a pot beside a fire in the public-house. Notwithstanding this difference of charge, there is, however, something in the charm of a good fire and of good company, which tempts the labourer to pay an additional penny for his pot of beer. And after the repeal of the malt-duty, which will not reduce the price of the pot of beer more than a halfpenny, I believe that the same temptation will still exist, and that the public-house, the natural love of society—the harmless, I must say, enjoyment of it, if not carried to excess, will be preferred to the solitary pot of beer brewed by bad brewers with bad utensils from bad materials. Let not the House, then, hazard a large amount of revenue for the sake of creating a small reduction in the price of a pot of beer, which after all will not be attended with the effect anticipated by its advocates.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Handley) has spoken about the possibility of finding substitutes for the malt-tax, but he has only mentioned a few of these substitutes. This is undoubtedly very prudent on the part of the hon. member, especially when the fate which has attended the member for Lincolnshire, the late Sir W. Ingilby—I mean to say, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, for that was the character assumed by the hon. baronet—is taken into consideration. The fate of that hon. baronet, according to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Handley), is a warning to all hon. members against appearing in the assumed part of Chancellor of the Exchequer. That hon. baronet, it appears, had made a most popular motion on the subject of the malt-duty, by which he conciliated all the advocates of the repeal of the tax. However, he unfortunately thought it necessary to suggest a few substitutes in the place of the malt-tax, which destroyed all the popularity which his motion for the repeal of that tax had gained for him, and cost him his seat in parliament. He lost his election even for an agricultural county. Such was the odium he excited by his praiseworthy efforts to discover substitutes. I, then, ask the agricultural members to take warning by this, and to reflect that, if the modest suggestion of new taxes cost Sir W. Ingilby his seat for a most agricultural county—what will become of their seats if they have mixed constituencies, and actually vote for the new taxes that must be proposed? I will ask them this question—granted that there would be an advantage to agriculture in this repeal of the malt-tax, would that advantage be general or not? What description of agriculture, let me ask, is distressed? Are the light barley lands suffering most at the present moment, or the pasture lands, and the clay lands which grow wheat? Is it not notorious that the clay lands growing wheat are the description of land which, at the present moment, is suffering under the greatest depression? The only effect of repealing the malt-duty will be to force the clay lands into an unnatural cultivation, and the owners will be induced, instead of growing wheat, to try the expensive cultivation of barley on unsuitable land. Supposing that the available surplus of the revenue could be applied to the remission of the county-rates, or to those local charges to which all land is subject, would not the advantage resulting from that remission be more equally distributed over the whole land than a reduction to the same amount of the duty on malt? The noble lord and the hon. gentleman opposite, propose to give the whole advantage of the remission of the malt-duty to the barley growers, though that class of agriculturists are, of all, the least distressed.

I am conceding, for the sake of the argument, that the barley grower is to be greatly benefited by the repeal of the malt-duty, but I cannot help thinking that, if the present motion succeeds, the barley interest itself will suffer more injury than many hon. gentlemen are, perhaps, aware of. By allowing the maltsters to give security for the amount of duty, and suspending for a time its payment, a capital belonging to the public, amounting to about £3,000,000, may be said to be lent them for the purpose of carrying on trade. In consequence of this practice, individuals with small capital are enabled to engage in the manufacture of malt. If, however, the duty were repealed, this advantage given to small capitalists would be withdrawn, the public money, applied as so much additional capital in the purchase of barley, would be withdrawn also, and the result, quite opposite to that expected by the advocates of the repeal of the duty, must inevitably be, that the malting trade would be much more monopolized than at present by a few large capitalists. It is taken for granted, that increased consumption of malt must follow diminished duty. This may be so for the future, but it certainly has not been so for the past. There are some striking proofs in the history of the malt-duty to show that the consumption of malt is influenced much more by seasons, and other circumstances, than by the rate of duty. In 1816, the duty was 4s. 6d. per bushel. The average consumption of the two preceding years was 25,500,000 bushels. You reduced the duty in 1816 from 4s. 6d. to 2s. 6d. Was there a great increase of consumption? By no means. The average consumption of the two following years, that is, under the reduced duty, was only 22,700,000 bushels, a falling off of nearly 3,000,000 of bushels, instead of an increase. You raised the duty, in 1819, to 3s. 7d., and the average consumption of the two following years was 25,000,000 bushels, an increased consumption under an increased duty.

I wish to call the attention of the House, and particularly of the agriculturists, to another and very serious risk they will incur from the total repeal of the malt-duty. My noble friend said, that if the malt-tax were taken off, there would be a great increase in the consumption of beer. Now I have an impression that the very contrary effect would be produced by the removal of the tax. I am greatly afraid, that the direct consequence would be to promote illicit distillation to an almost incalculable extent, and thereby proportionately to diminish the use of beer. My reason for thinking so is this. It is no difficult matter to prevent, by the vigilance of the excise, the illicit malting of barley. The process is a dilatory one, and it is not easy to avoid the exposure of the article for the purpose of drying it and preparing it for use. But the process by which illicit spirits are distilled from the barley after it has been made into malt, is very easy. Every man, after the repeal of the malt-duty, would have a right to make malt. It might be made in every cottage and every hovel without restraint. Does any man believe it to be possible, that security can be taken against the conversion of this malt into spirits, or will it be tolerated that there shall be a universal right of inspection and inquisition on the part of the excise into every house in the kingdom, in order to prevent a fraud on the revenue so easily practised as the conversion of malt into spirits? The result, then, would be, not as my noble friend anticipates, an increase in the consumption of beer, but a positive reduction in the revenue, produced by loss of duty on spirits, and a great increase in the amount of illicit distillation. For these reasons, then, I am of opinion, that the benefits which are looked for from the repeal of the malt-tax will not follow its removal, and surely, unless some almost inestimable advantage is clearly shown to be the necessary consequence of its immediate repeal, hon. members ought to pause before they give their votes in favour of a measure which strikes at nearly one-third of the disposable revenue of the country.

But what course is the House to pursue when they have adopted the resolution of my noble friend? My noble friend has, indeed, declared his intention, when the House shall have sanctioned the principle which his resolution embodies, to bring in a bill to settle all the details. But has my noble friend calculated the embarrassment and confusion into which trade will be thrown in the meanwhile, and in what uncertainty the whole of the malt trade, and of the agricultural interest dependent on it, will be placed by his resolution? What brewer would purchase a bushel of malt while he saw matters in this state? I would undertake to say, that malt would suffer an immediate depreciation of 4s. or 5s. the quarter, for the House may rely upon it, that if hopes were held out to the public that the malt-tax should be no longer paid after the 10th of October, 1836, no man, except for immediate use, would make his malt or brew his beer, till he could do both without being subject to a duty.

Supposing, however, that the House, in spite of all argument to the contrary, is determined to vote in favour of my noble friend's resolution, what other measures is it prepared to adopt? I will assume for the present that the House is resolved to supply the deficiency that will be created by the repeal. You must hope to do this in one of three methods. You may increase the duties imposed on other articles of consumption, or you may resort to a property-tax, or you may demand a corresponding reduction of the estimates. I can assure hon. members that I feel no pleasure in witnessing improvident expenditure, and that I have no interest to serve in maintaining the present amount of the public burthens; but I will ask any man in this House, whether he conscientiously believes that, looking to the reductions in the estimates which were made by Lord Althorp in the last year, and the further reduction made by myself in the present year, to the amount of £500,000,—whether, looking at this, it is possible to make any, even the most trifling, reduction in the estimates? But, at any rate, if any reduction is to be effected, let the question of such reduction be looked at abstractedly with reference to its own merits, and not with a view to substitute the sum thus saved for the produce of the malt-tax. But I cannot persuade myself that any man, bearing in mind the reductions which have been made, and the demands of the West-India proprietors on the public purse, can hope to replace the £4,800,000 which the malt-tax furnishes, consistently with the maintenance of the public honour, and regard to the interests of the country, by any considerable reduction in the sums voted for the public service. But the money must be obtained from some source. I will, however, caution those gentlemen who look for a substitute for the malt-tax in an increased duty on other articles of consumption, against hoping that an increased duty either on wine, or spirits, or beer, will lay the foundation of a large permanent addition to the revenue of the country. First, as to spirits; of what benefit will it be to the agricultural interest that a heavier tax should be laid upon spirits? What are they made from? They are distilled from corn. If an additional tax of 1s. a-gallon were to be imposed on spirits, it would be equivalent to laying a tax of 16s. a quarter on malt. I believe that from a bushel of barley can be obtained two gallons of spirits, and thus there will be laid a tax of 16s. a-quarter on barley, and that too on the poorest description of barley. But there are other considerations which affect this question. In the course of last session parliament enacted, that there should be a reduction of the duty on spirits in Ireland, and yet some hon. members are now favourable to the project of increasing the duty on Irish spirits. Now, this unsteadiness of purpose, this constant vacillation, is the unwisest course that can be adopted by a legislative assembly. In the course of last session the duty on Irish spirits was lowered from 3s. 4d. to 2s. 4d. a-gallon, yet it is now in contemplation to increase the duty. Perhaps, however, this objection may be met by a proposition to raise the duty on spirits in England only, leaving Ireland subject to the present rate of duty. But surely the difference of duty between English and Irish spirits is already sufficiently great. Surely, it will not be wise to increase the present rate of duty in England—namely, 7s. 6d.; leaving Ireland subject only to a duty of 2s. 4d. Such an unequal rate of taxation will offer a temptation to smuggling, too strong to be resisted. It is impossible, but that with so large a bonus thus held out to the unfair trader, he would fully avail himself of the advantage which the legislature would afford him. But you may propose to tax Ireland and England in this respect in the same proportions, and to increase the duty in Ireland as well as in England. First, let us ascertain what has been the result of the reduction of duty on spirits in Ireland. I have this morning received an account, from which it appears that on a comparison of the last four months with the corresponding period of last year, 1,000,000 gallons more spirits had been brought to charge. With the knowledge I possess of this fact, I hope to be excused for asking whether the hon. members who advocate the increase of the duty on spirits are quite sure that they would raise the revenue by that method of taxation? But this is not the only danger. If by increasing the duty on legal spirits, you hold out a premium to illicit distillation, that distillation will not necessarily take place from grain. The farmer must not flatter himself that he will find increased demand for agricultural produce from the illicit trader. If you encourage by high duties a fraudulent manufacture of spirits, the article employed will be not grain but molasses, on account of the greater facility in the process of conversion into spirit, and the readier means of escaping detection. No one denies that spirits are a fair subject of taxation, of taxation to the highest point that is consistent with the collection of revenue. But this should never be forgotten, that the discoveries in science, and improvement in chemical apparatus, increase the facilities of fraud more rapidly than the facilities of detection. At this very moment illicit distillation of spirits is carried on in large towns to an extent which we had better not encourage by any considerable increase of duty on the legal supply. I hope I have satisfactorily shown, that by attempting to make an addition to the duty on spirits, there is considerable risk that, at the same time, you will benefit no one interest, you will injure agriculture, and will ruin the revenue.

I now come to the third substitute proposed for the malt-tax—namely, a property-tax. Under circumstances not dissimilar to the present, excepting that the late Chancellor of the Exchequer had then at his disposal an available surplus of £1,500,000, it was proposed to repeal half the malt-tax and the house and window tax, amounting in the whole to £5,000,000 sterling. The House then determined by a very large majority, that such a deficit could only be supplied by the imposition of a property-tax. Now my prophecy is, that you will make that tax necessary—to that you must come at last if you repeal the malt-tax. You will try your taxes on articles of general consumption, on tobacco, and spirits, and wine, and you will meet with a storm which will make you hastily recede from your first advances towards a substitute. To a property-tax then you must come; and I congratulate you, gentlemen of the landed interest, on finding yourselves relieved from the pressure of the malt-tax, and falling on a good comfortable property-tax, with a proposal, probably, for a graduated scale. And you, who represent the heavy land of this country—the clay soil—the soil unfit for barley, I felicitate you on the prospect which lies before you. If you believe that the substitute will be advantageous to your interests, be it so, but do not, when you hereafter find out your mistake, lay the blame upon those who offered you a timely warning, and cautioned you against exchanging the light pressure of a malt-duty for the scourge of a property-tax. My noble friend (the Marquess of Chandos) has made some calculations to which I hesitate to subscribe; certainly, I think he has made a mistake in some of his figures. My noble friend has calculated, that the extent of advantage which will accrue by the repeal of the duty on malt, to a farmer occupying a farm of 250 acres, will amount to between £70 and £80 a-year. Now I have certainly never heard so favourable an account as this of the present state of agriculture, that a farmer of land of that number of acres consumed so much beer as to make that difference to him in a single year. I believe that the average quantity of beer consumed on a farm of 300 acres is about 100 hogsheads a-year, and yet, if my noble friend's calculations are correct, the occupier must consume something like 500 or 600. But I will resume at the point from which I broke off. I have been diverted from the consideration of the manner in which a property-tax would operate as a substitute for the malt duty. The hon. and learned member for Ireland—I mean for Dublin—in reference to the imposition of a property-tax, said on a former occasion, that if it was to be laid on, it ought to affect all his Majesty's subjects equally, and certainly, this was no more than justice. I beg, then, the representatives of Ireland to consider what will be their situation if they vote for the repeal of the duty on malt. It would be infinitely worse even than that of the occupiers of clay soils in England. Ireland pays at present but £240,000 out of the £4,800,000 which the malt-tax produces, and it would be a great hardship to Ireland to have a property-tax imposed upon her as a countervailing substitute for her moderate proportion of the malt-tax. They may depend on it, however, that a property tax is inevitable if the malt-tax is repealed, and the attempt, I will not say to levy that tax, if imposed—for I must presume the people of Ireland would obey the laws—but to impose the tax in this House, would be a fruitless undertaking.

I now come to the fourth alternative: that is, to make a deficit, and do nothing else; and I am afraid there are many members who, when it comes to the trial, will (professing no doubt much reluctance) make up their minds to act in that manner—who, upon the whole, will prefer the plan of a large deficit, and no substitute. The hon. member (Mr. Handley) has recommended a small loan, but why not a large one? Why hesitate about the amount of new debt in time of peace, if once you affirm the principle? The hon. gentleman, indeed, offered the security: "Sell the Crown lands," he says, "exact the uttermost farthing from the Crown lessees." This is the first time I have heard the complaint, that the Crown is too indulgent a landlord, or that the Crown lands afford the means of a large permanent increase to the revenue.

This, after all, is the great question to be resolved by this night's debate:—Shall we maintain the public honour, or shall we enter on the disgraceful course of deficit, and the suspension of payment, and the breach of national engagements? Has honesty been bad policy? Have you suffered pecuniary loss from being honest? Is it not a fact, that by keeping up the value of the public securities, and faithfully performing the national engagements, the government of the country has been enabled, since the year 1822, to reduce the annual interest of the public debt to the amount of £2,350,000. If you continue to pursue the same course you will derive the same advantages. You have a debt of £250,000,000 in the three and a-half per cents alone, which you may hope to redeem at no distant period. You have the experience of the benefits of good faith, not only in point of character, but of substantial gain; but if you are careless to secure the honour of England, and maintain the national credit, you will simultaneously forfeit a good name, and dry up the sources of future and of honourable economy. I hope the House will not enter on the tortuous path of contradiction and vacillation into which this motion would force it. I warn you not to forget that on this very question of the malt-tax, you have, on three different occasions, retraced your steps. In the year 1816, the House of Commons took off a part of the malt-tax, but found themselves obliged to put it on again in 1819. In March, 1821, the House, by a small majority, repealed the tax; but in one month after, in the following April, they were obliged to rescind this vote, the offspring of their hasty legislation. In the year 1833, the House, in a moment of delusion at the prospect of the advantages expected from the remission of this tax, resolved that it should be partly repealed, but on reflection they found it necessary to rescind on the Monday the resolution to which they had come on the previous Friday, and passed a counter resolution in the following words:—"Resolved, that the deficiency in the revenue which would be occasioned by the reduction of the tax on malt to ten shillings the quarter, and the repeal of the tax on houses and windows, could only be supplied by the substitution of a general tax upon property and income, and an extensive change in our whole financial system, which would at present be inexpedient." If, then, a majority of the House should agree to the motion of my noble friend, and if they shrink hereafter from the dishonesty of a deficit, there will be no other safe alternative but retraction and repentance, and the replacing of this malt-tax. It is my desire to rescue parliament from the charge of vacillation and inconsistency, from the shame, the certain shame of rescinding an unwise and hasty vote, that I respectfully, but most earnestly counsel you not to take the first step in ways which lead to dishonour.

I have been told that there is no hope of preserving the malt-tax, that there are so many members pledged to their constituents to repeal the malt-duty, that they cannot help themselves, and must vote in favour of its abolition. But my uniform answer has been, that I never would believe that public men, invested with a sacred trust, had committed themselves irrevocably beforehand, that they would refuse to listen to discussion, and give a vote against evidence, against conviction, against conscience. I have paid them the willing compliment of trusting in their integrity and wisdom, and have rejected the odious imputation that they would sacrifice the real interests of their constituents and their country, for the mere purpose of satisfying an impatient clamour, or redeeming pledges which must have been conditional, that the redemption of such pledges would bona fide serve the parties to whom they had been given. I have a full assurance that the vote of to-night will prove that my confidence in the House of Commons has not been misplaced; but, be that as it may, my own course is clear: I am bound to give that advice which appears to my judgment the best, and to leave those who reject it, responsible for all the consequences of a rash and unwise decision.

A long discussion then ensued, and the Marquess of Chandos having briefly replied, the House divided: Ayes, 192; Noes, 350; majority against the motion, 158.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS.

MARCH 12, 1835.

The Attorney-general, in a brief speech, moved for leave to bring in "A bill to improve the Administration of Justice in Ecclesiastical Courts."

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, I trust that this House will receive the present measure as the first practical fulfilment of the pledges given in his Majesty's speech from the throne, that his Majesty's ministers were desirous of introducing into the administration of the law the most substantial reforms, and of redressing every grievance of which just complaint can be made. I do hope, that it was some kind of prognostication of the nature of those reforms, which convinced the hon. member for Middlesex, that it was not necessary to hold over his Majesty's ministers the menace of limited supplies. The hon. member will see in the strong and uniform testimony borne to the efficacy of this reform, a guarantee of the intention of his Majesty's ministers, with respect to reforms in general. This reform in the ecclesiastical courts throughout the kingdom, is founded on the report of a commission of enquiry, established upon the advice given by his Grace the Duke of Wellington to the Crown. Nothing can be further from my intention than to claim for his Majesty's ministers the exclusive merit of this reform. Few things are more honourable to party connexions in this country, than the manifestation on the part of public men of a willingness to co-operate in measures of reform, that are complete and well calculated to promote the public welfare. The hon. and learned member who spoke last, has, with a modesty and forbearance most creditable to himself, concealed the fact, that he was one whose co-operation had been of such signal utility to the enquiries of the commission. The hon. and learned gentleman, and the hon. and learned member for the Tower Hamlets, notwithstanding their total alienation from that political party by which this commission was instituted, were not unwilling to tender their gratuitous and invaluable services to forward all the purposes of the commission. I do say, that such conduct redounds much to the honour of the hon. and learned member; and that it redounds generally to the honour of gentlemen, who, notwithstanding all their differences in party politics from the government of the day, were the first to tender their services to perfect the laws of the country. A grateful testimony has likewise been borne to the dignified ecclesiastics, and to the clergy throughout the country, who were willing to sacrifice their private patronage, and to cast aside all personal interests, in order to benefit the country by promoting the objects of the commission. I find this conduct has been invariable on the part of the right reverend prelates, notwithstanding the attacks that I see have been made on them in other quarters. Yes, Sir, uniformly have they evinced the same disposition to sacrifice every private consideration, in order to further the progress of useful reform. As soon as his Majesty's commission was established, the first offer made by every member of that commission, whether ecclesiastical or lay, was to suspend every appointment to ecclesiastical preferments which had not attached to them a cure of souls, until the report of the commissioners should decide upon the utility or inutility of filling up the places. Such has been the conduct of the Archbishop of Canterbury, of the Archbishop of York, and of the Bishops of London, of Lincoln, of Gloucester, and of the Lord Chancellor. All signified to the commission, that not one of them would make any appointment to any ecclesiastical preferment whatever, till the circumstances of the preferment had undergone the consideration of the commission, and until it had been determined in what manner the preferment could be made most beneficial to the interests of the Church. With respect to the particular measure before the House, I go farther, much further, than some of those hon. gentlemen who claim to themselves the title of reformers. The hon. gentleman, the member for Cambridge, advises that the local ecclesiastical courts should be continued in existence, while the whole object of the present bill is to put an end to these local courts. Another hon. and learned member (Sir J. Campbell) has said that the Diocesan courts should be continued, lest the country attorneys might petition the House, and oppose the bill, through the medium of country gentlemen, whom they may be able to influence. Why, Sir, I am a greater reformer than even his Majesty's late Attorney-general. If the local jurisdiction be good, maintain it; if bad, for God's sake, don't let us permit local attorneys, for their private and personal interests, to obstruct the course of reform. If the country attorneys have any vested rights, any vested interests, in the maintenance of these courts, let us compensate them; but if it be useful, if it be for the benefit of the country at large, that central courts shall be established, and that local courts be abolished, what grounds have country solicitors to obstruct the course of reform? I know that the country solicitors are a powerful body; but if the present measure be right, if centralisation be more advantageous to the country than the continuance of local jurisdiction, I see no earthly reason why the power of the country solicitors should impede the progress of reform. I am one of those who think that the jurisdiction of parliament ought to be trusted and relied upon. Most undoubtedly, no one can witness, with any degree of satisfaction, the examination of witnesses at the bar of this House, on occasions of such a nature; but still, I think, that such a proceeding is not without an indirect effect upon the public mind and morals. I am not of opinion, that an easy mode of obtaining divorce would be attended with much advantage, nor am I that great admirer of the Scotch system, in this respect, that some hon. members profess to be. I very much doubt, indeed, that it would be at all for the public benefit that local courts should have the jurisdiction of granting divorce a mensa et thoro. Such facilities would not be unlikely to lead to much collusion, particularly where females were concerned. The greatest confidence should exist in any tribunal possessing a jurisdiction of this nature, and too much care cannot be taken in the establishment of such a court. I should be doing great injustice to Sir John Nicholl, and Sir Herbert Jenner, if I did not take this occasion to acknowledge the prompt, willing, and efficient assistance I derived from those learned and distinguished civilians, as members of the commission, voluntarily tendered immediately on my return from abroad, and my appointment to office. Am I not, then, justified in saying, that where effectual reform is seen to be necessary, there is no indisposition, in the highest authorities of the country, to give them both assistance towards so desirable an end. I entirely agree, and soon did agree, with those who feel that there never can be a perfect system of law reform established, until all judicial sinecures shall have been destroyed. In any measure intended to be effective, provision must be made to abolish judicial sinecures. I, myself, introduced a bill to destroy those abuses, and I believe with no little success and benefit; but, if any still remain uncorrected, I will give my support to any bill, the object of which may be to render as pure as possible every thing connected with the administration of justice.

Mr. Hume stated, that in changing his intention with respect to the supplies, the measure under consideration never entered into his contemplation. The fact was, the right hon. gentleman had crept into the nest of the late administration—was then hatching the eggs which his predecessors had laid—and now, forsooth, he was taking great credit for the incubation.

Sir Robert Peel, in answer to the question just put to him, by the hon. member for Middlesex, said that it was the intention of his Majesty's government to introduce a bill for facilitating the local administration of justice. [Mr. Hume said, his question had reference to county courts.] What was the difference? Were not county courts a local administration of justice? The bill which he had stated it was the intention of his Majesty's government to introduce, was for facilitating the local administration of justice; and the hon. member would have an opportunity, on its introduction, of expressing his opinion as to the best mode of securing that object. While on his legs, he must beg to observe that the hon. gentleman entirely mistook some of the observations which had fallen from him. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had not denied that the late government were prepared to bring in a measure similar to the present; he had merely stated what was the fact, namely, that the commission, upon the report of which the measure was founded, had been instituted by the Duke of Wellington's administration. There was no merit in merely drawing the bill; for it was drawn from the suggestions contained in the report made by the hon. and learned gentleman opposite, and the other members of the commission. So far from having shown any want of candour on the occasion, he had given the merit to those to whom it was due. The hon. member for Middlesex had been wonderfully learned, and curiously facetious upon the subject of incubation. The hon. gentleman had recently had some practical experience of the throes of labour, and the anxious cares and doubtful results of the process to which he had alluded. The hon. member had laid an egg, which he could neither hatch himself, nor get any body else to hatch for him. What was to become of this redoubted egg? It had been, after an appropriate prelude, laid a week since; there was, then, a grave doubt as to whether it was to be hatched by the hon. gentleman or some other hen; but, after all this patient agony of incubation, it appeared that neither the hon. member for Middlesex, nor any other biped, feathered or unfeathered, could bring this egg to maturity. He had found an excuse for the hon. gentleman for deserting his nest, in the earnest of reform measures which had been given by the government; but he (Mr. Hume), instead of receiving it as a courteous assistance, had accused him of creeping into the nest of the late ministry.

After a short discussion, leave was given to bring in the bill.

AMBASSADOR TO RUSSIA—THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY.

MARCH 13, 1835.

On the Order of the Day being read for the House resolving itself into a Committee of Supply—

Mr. Sheil rose to move, as an amendment to the motion that the Speaker leave the Chair, "That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, praying that he be graciously pleased to order that there be laid before the House a copy of any appointment made within the last four months, of an Ambassador from the Court of London to St. Petersburg, and of the salary and emoluments attached to such embassy.

In the debate which followed—

SIR ROBERT PEEL spoke to the following effect:—I was certainly not aware that to the other charges to which I am liable could with any degree of justice be added that of an unwillingness to take a fair share in the discussions of this House; and I confess it was with no small degree of surprise I heard the hon. member who spoke last but one in this debate attribute it to me. While, however, I quite admit the right of that hon. member—or any other who may coincide with him in thinking I am called upon to defend my conduct with reference to the appointment in question—to comment upon my silence, I must claim from him in return the right of postponing that defence until such time as may appear to my own mind most suited for that purpose. But, Sir, even if I were not to avail myself of that prerogative, I think it will not, upon consideration, appear unreasonable to the House that I should have, at all events, up to the present moment, refrained from presenting myself to their attention. I think, when I am told from so many quarters that, be the result of Lord Londonderry's appointment what it may, the main responsibility must, at all events, rest on me—when I am in general terms informed that the government to which I belong will forfeit the confidence of those over whose interests they are selected to preside, by selecting for the situation of Ambassador to the Court of Russia an individual whose conduct disentitled him to that honour, but it was natural that I should wish to hear what were the specific charges which could be adduced against that noble lord, or against myself, before I took an opportunity of making a reply in his, or my own defence, the more especially when it was quite clear that, in compliance with the forms of the House, I could only address it once. Upon the question of responsibility, I have but little to say.—I trust I never have shrunk, and never shall shrink from any responsibility which properly could be said to belong to me, or try to transfer to another the responsibility that ought to attach to myself. I admit, distinctly admit, that, for whatever may be done in any department of the state, practically, though perhaps not constitutionally, I, who have the honour to fill the first post in his Majesty's government, ought to, and will, while I retain that situation, consider myself altogether responsible to my sovereign and to my country. I do not hesitate here, in my place in parliament, to declare, that for every step taken in this appointment there is no individual belonging to the cabinet who has contracted greater responsibility than myself, and whatever may be the course the House may think fit to take in consequence of that appointment, it shall never find me either anxious or desirous to shrink from the declaration I now make. That the appointment of Lord Londonderry to the post of Ambassador to the Court of Russia, or to any other office, however insignificant, under the present administration, has failed in giving satisfaction to certain hon. gentlemen opposite I do not—I cannot doubt. Is it not perfectly notorious that there is no one appointment connected with the present government which gives them the slightest satisfaction? Nor is it very wonderful that such should be the case. Don't I know—don't we all know—that in proportion as men take an active part in politics, and in proportion as they desire to see the party they espouse gain the ascendancy in the state, in exactly the same proportion will the appointments of a government, which exists in direct opposition to them, be at all times, and especially at the moment they have ceased to hold power, unsatisfactory to their feelings, and consequently the objects of their condemnation in their speeches. Have they expressed dissatisfaction at Lord Londonderry's appointment only? Why, not one single individual composing the government is acceptable to them—not one single appointment the government has made appears to give them satisfaction. Even their old friends and allies—even those whose co-operation and assistance they courted when they were in office—have now become the objects of their attack and condemnation. Is not the Attorney-general for Ireland under the late administration, the Attorney-general for Ireland under the present government? And yet are we not reproached with even that appointment? Is not my right hon. friend the paymaster of the forces denounced by hon. members on the other side as unworthy of the trust reposed in him? Did not the noble lord, the leader of the opposition, contrary, I must say, to his usual practice, and contrary, I must also say, to what prudence ought to have dictated to him above all others, rake up the forgotten quarrels of 1829, and, speaking of the language used by the right hon. baronet at a time of great excitement, and, with reference to a measure upon which the greatest difference of opinion prevailed, attribute to him expressions which, if the right hon. baronet ever used them, and I possess not the slightest recollection of his having done so, he must in his calmer moments have regretted; and the noble lord having done so, did he not urge the inexpediency of his having been selected to fill an office under the present administration? [Cries of “Hear, hear!” from the opposition.] Hon. members on the other side of the House cry “Hear, hear!” but, Sir, let me ask, is it or is it not the fact that my right hon. friend, whose appointment to the situation of the paymaster of the forces, is considered so convincing an indication of illiberal dispositions on the part of the government—whose appointment is considered sufficient to condemn in the eyes of the people, the whole policy and intentions of the government—is, I ask, the report, which at the time was very generally credited, that my right hon. friend was offered by the government of Lord Grey a still higher appointment than that he now holds, true or false? [“No, no!”] All I can say is, I have heard it stated, and I have not before heard it contradicted, that the office of secretary of war was offered to my right hon. friend. [“No, no!”] My right hon. friend did not himself tell me so, but as it was publicly stated, and as it has never been hitherto contradicted, I maintain I have a right to assume it is true. [Renewed cries of “No, no!”] It was certainly so stated in the only vehicles of news to which the public at large have access, and sure I am that in those publications it was not contradicted. I know not, I repeat, whether the fact was as stated or not, but I do know it was publicly stated, and that it was not publicly contradicted. [“Hear, hear!”] Well, then, I say, Sir, if such an offer as that to which I allude was made to my right hon. friend, it is not fair to blame his appointment to an office under the present administration as an indication of his intention to pursue an illiberal or unpopular system of policy. I come now to the particular question under discussion.—[Cries of “Hear, hear!” from the opposition benches.] Surely hon. members opposite are not so impatient that they cannot spare me even five short minutes to make an ordinary preface to an ordinary speech. [Laughter.] Surely they are not so impatient as not to allow me time to lay the groundwork for my defence. I will, however, not trifle with that impatience, but at once proceed to the point in dispute. As I said before, I have not the least doubt that the appointment of Lord Londonderry must be unsatisfactory to those members of the House whose policy is directly opposed to ours; but I want to know—and I thought from the course the present debate has taken that I might have attained that knowledge—what are the allegations, what the specific charges, which can be brought against Lord Londonderry, and upon what grounds it is that his appointment as ambassador is to subject the government to which I have the honour to belong to the censure of this House? Up to the present moment I believe the sole charge against the noble marquess is—and it is the charge of the hon. and learned member for Kirkcubright—that of his having expressed an opinion in his capacity of a peer of the realm, that the late government had pursued their interference on behalf of the Poles to an unjustifiable extent, and that he had termed them “the rebellious subjects of the emperor of Russia.” And is that alone sufficient to disqualify the noble marquess from being employed under the government? Why, Sir, I heard but a few evenings since an hon. member on the bench opposite tell the House, that unless every thing his Majesty’s Canadian subjects required was conceded to them by the British government they would become—I quote the hon. member’s precise words—“rebellious subjects of the king of England.” Is this sufficient in his own estimation to disqualify that hon. member from obtaining any government appointment; but, Sir, putting for the moment out of view this consideration, I have to say, that the scraps of speeches upon which the hon. member for Tipperary has founded his allegations against the noble marquess do not appear in the authentic reports of the proceedings in the House of Lords. I have before me “Hansard’s Debates,” and there I cannot find them. [Mr. Sheil—They will be found in the Mirror of Parliament.] I know not as to the Mirror of Parliament, but I have here before me, certainly, an authentic work, and one which appears to be very carefully edited, in which I can find no such expressions as those attributed to the noble marquess. I am not in a situation positively to deny his having used them; but I cannot find them in the very careful version of parliamentary reports I hold in my hand. But, Sir, are we to judge of individuals by the language they may make use of in the excitement of debate? Do we not daily see here, within the walls of this our House of Assembly, hon. members led away by the warmth of discussion, by their party feelings, or—and I shall not have to impose a great tax on the recollection of hon. members in stating the last of my incitements—by their desire to criminate a government to which they entertain hostility—make use of expressions by which, in their calmer moments, they would much regret being obliged to abide. This takes place almost every day, and is it, I ask, fair or just, that upon such evidence the conduct of a public man should be judged? The hon. member for Tipperary admitted, that as far as Lord Londonderry's personal character is concerned, he has ever acted with the manliness which is inseparable from his mind and character. Is this, let me ask, an unimportant quality in an ambassador? The hon. member for Middlesex, in order to make out a case against the noble marquis, has brought up the collateral question of the salary connected with the office of ambassador. Sir, let me ask what is that hon. gentleman's authority for stating that the salary of the Russian ambassador is £15,000 a-year?

Mr. Hume had stated, that the salary attached to the office was £10,000 a-year; but that in addition to that sum, there was an allowance of £1,000 a-year for a house, which, with contingencies calculated at £4,000 a-year, brought the annual income of the office up to the sum of £15,000.

Sir Robert Peel:—I don't exactly know how the fact may be, and therefore cannot deny the hon. member's statement. The hon. member may be right, but still I may say he is not so uniformly accurate in his statements, that I would wish to take it on his representation alone. But be that as it may, is it exceeding the salary usually allotted to the ambassador to the court of Russia? Is it more than the salary allowed to Sir Stratford Canning? Is it not, in short, the rate of salary fixed upon by Lord Palmerston, and sanctioned by the late government? What right, then, let me ask, has the hon. member for Middlesex—or any other hon. member—to endeavour to create an impression against the individual by speaking of the amount of salary attached to the office he is appointed to fill? Is the amount of the salary sufficient to vitiate the appointment? If it be, reduce it. If the character of the individual selected makes his selection an improper one, attack it; but do not endeavour to create a feeling against the individual by joining the question of character with that of salary, which the present government did not fix, but which they found established by their predecessors. The hon. gentleman's other accusation against Lord Londonderry was this—that he had been attacked in The Times. He said, "You will find that twice in The Times there have been severe attacks against him." The hon. gentleman says, The Times is a fair indication of public opinion. Will the hon. gentleman consent to take his own character from The Times? Now I think that is a very fair way of going to work; for if the hon. gentleman comes down with The Times as a witness against Lord Londonderry, and attaching the greatest importance to the opinions of The Times, and its extensive circulation—brings The Times forward as the justification of his attack upon Lord Londonderry, I can only say, that he has a feeling for a witness not very favourable to himself. Lord Londonderry has long served the public in public capacities. He believes that no one can call in question the military pretensions of Lord Londonderry; and that no one will say that any officer, except the gallant general under whom he had served, has ever shown greater devotedness to the public service, or exposed himself in the course of that service to greater personal danger. [Cries of "Oh!" from the Opposition.] "Oh!" says the hon. member for Marylebone, ever ready to hear an attack on those to whom he is politically opposed, and ever equally ready to interrupt those who seek to defend the absent from unjust imputations. [Sir Samuel Whalley was not the only member who had interrupted the right hon. baronet.] I presume the hon. gentleman will not require me to name such offenders seriatim; at all events, the hon. gentleman was one of those who interrupted my defence of an individual for whom I again claim the credit of having nobly served his country; but I will not take up the time of the House by bestowing any more notice on the interruption. The right hon. baronet proceeded to observe that Lord Londonderry had been on the staff in the Duke of Wellington's army from the year 1809 to 1813, and Adjutant-general in the army in Spain. He was aware that many persons might assert, that to show a successful military career and great devotion to the service, was no proof of general ability; but he should address himself to that part of the subject hereafter. His noble friend, Lord Londonderry, having been Adjutant-general for a period of four years, and during a campaign of no ordinary difficulty, could not surely be considered a very inefficient person. His noble friend served in a diplomatic capacity from the year 1813 till the year 1822. He was appointed minister at Berlin in 1813; he was appointed Ambassador to Vienna in 1814; and he retired from the service in the year 1823, at his own request. Reference had been made—and he really thought most unfairly made—to an application made by his noble friend for a pension, to which he thought himself entitled. He did not receive that pension.—He put an erroneous construction on his claim. But suppose his noble friend did so, he would ask any man—he would refer the matter to any hon. gentleman opposite, and ask him, as a private individual—could the circumstance of a public man, entertaining that opinion, and making that claim which was not acceded to, be fairly taken as evidence of his general character, and as proof of his inefficiency to serve the public? Surely the main question, after all, was, as to the manner in which his noble friend had conducted himself—not in his military capacity, not in his office as Adjutant-general, though important duties were connected with it—but in the diplomatic situation he had held, of equal rank with that for which he had been now designed, and which he had held, for a period of ten years, in most critical times? It would not be difficult to obtain testimony to the conduct of his noble friend. No doubt, however, if an appeal were made to Lord Aberdeen, hon. gentlemen opposite would object to the testimony of that noble lord; or, if an appeal were made to the Duke of Wellington, they would equally protest against being bound by the noble duke's evidence in such a matter. But if he referred to the opinion of Mr. Canning, could hon. gentlemen object then? Could they refuse to receive the opinion of Mr. Canning as to the ability, as to the integrity, in short, as to the qualifications of his noble friend, Lord Londonderry? Mr. Canning, on his appointment to office, on the ground, be it borne in mind, of his foreign policy, received the cordial support of hon. gentlemen opposite. They overlooked his opinions on some matters of domestic policy, declaring that out of consideration for the course taken by him in foreign politics, they were prepared to give his government general and cordial support. It might be said, that he was speaking of an early period of the life of Mr. Canning—but considering that Mr. Canning was in the situation of a minister of the Crown, there could not be any one but must be proud of such a testimony to his ability and qualifications as that which he was about to read. When his noble friend Lord Londonderry expressed a wish to resign his situation at Vienna, he received the following letter from Mr. Canning:—

“MY LORD —Having laid before the king your excellency's despatch, dated the 26th ult., requesting his Majesty's gracious permission to retire from the eminent post of his Majesty's ambassador to the court of Vienna, I have received the commands of his Majesty to signify to your excellency, that his Majesty has been most graciously pleased to grant the permission you solicit, accompanied with an expression of his Majesty's deep regret for the loss of your excellency's services, and of his Majesty's full and entire approbation of the manner in which your excellency has for a series of years, and in times of the most critical importance, conducted the affairs of the embassy intrusted to your charge, and maintained the intimacy and cordial good understanding so happily subsisting between his Majesty and his Majesty's imperial ally.”

Such was the testimony borne by Mr. Canning to his noble friend Lord Londonderry, on his resignation, on the last occasion on which he was employed in the public service; and he must say, that considering the intimate personal acquaintance of his noble friend with all those who were concerned with—and the part he had himself taken in the great events which followed the year 1814, considering the proof given that he had performed his arduous duties most satisfactorily (such being the opinion, as he had just read, of Mr. Canning), he could not believe that any angry speeches—he could not believe that any such speech as that delivered at Hillsborough, he could not believe that an application for a pension, would be sufficient to countervail the weight of that testimony which had been given by an impartial individual. He wished to know—apart from the extract produced by the hon. gentleman, and apart from the general prejudice entertained against his noble friend by hon. gentlemen opposite—he wished to know what was the allegation against his noble friend which he had not met? Apart from that particular passage which the hon. gentleman read, what, he again asked, was the allegation against his noble friend? The hon. and learned gentleman touched lightly on our relations with Turkey and Russia. The hon. gentleman said it was the duty of government to have taken steps for the purpose of preventing the Turkish barriers being crossed by the Russian army. He knew not what some hon. members might think, but he was of opinion that the House of Commons would not have sanctioned the sending of a great military expedition, such as would have been necessary for the purpose of preventing the Russian troops passing the Balkan. In the first place, entreating hon. gentlemen to recollect the situation we were in at that time with respect to Greece, he greatly doubted whether any actual interference on the part of this country would have been effectual—he doubted that the House would have sanctioned it, and at all events he thought it must have terminated the negotiations that were then going on in behalf of Greece by this country. Then, if we had taken a hostile position, a small force would not have been sufficient, and he begged to ask the hon. member for Middlesex, whether he would have been disposed to consent to a considerable increase of our military establishment with such an object in view? A force of 30,000, or 35,000 men, would have been required for the protection of Constantinople: experience had shown the impolicy of any nation involving itself in the difficulties of a hostile position without a sufficient force to accomplish its object. If once they had commenced war for the protection of Turkey, would any hon. gentleman say, that such a war ought to have been undertaken with a small force? Lord Holland was not one of those who thought it desirable for this country to go to war for the purpose of defending the tottering empire of Turkey, which was falling probably by its internal dissensions and misgovernment, as much as by hostility on the part of Russia; that noble lord did not think it desirable that we should interfere actively and singly against all the other powers. Lord Holland's opinion he was not going to denounce: he quoted him only as an authority, not for the purpose of condemnation. Speaking of the opinion, that Turkey was our ancient ally, his lordship said:—"No, my Lords, I hope I never shall see, God forbid I ever should see—for this proposition would be scouted from one end of England to another—any preparations, or any proposition, or any attempt to defend this our ancient ally from the attacks of its enemies. There was no arrangement made in that treaty for preserving the crumbling and hateful, or, as Mr. Burke called it, the wasteful and disgusting empire of the Turks from dismemberment and destruction; and none of the powers who were parties to that treaty, will ever, I hope, save this falling empire of Turkey from ruin." Supposing that he (Sir Robert Peel) were to refer to this passage from Lord Holland's speech, a passage containing opinions so widely at variance from those of the hon. gentleman opposite, and supposing that he were to argue, as the hon. gentleman now argued, that the man who delivered the opinion, that England ought never to interfere for the preservation of Turkey, was unfit to be admitted into the councils of his Sovereign, because he had given an opinion that might encourage Russia to attempt the dismemberment of Turkey, because he held opinions which, being known to Russia, proved to her that she might attack Turkey with safety, secure from danger of defence being offered from that government of which Lord Holland formed a particular part, would it be fair in him to select that for the purpose of attacking Lord Holland on the policy that was pursued? He really thought hon. members ought not, therefore, to be too critical of each other's language. But this attack against the noble lord had been made in his absence. He did not complain of the hon. member who made it, he only desired the House to recollect who the individual was who had made the speech, an extract of which he had just read—to recollect that the book which he held in his hand, did not prove the allegation that had been made against the noble lord, and that the noble individual ought to have an opportunity of vindicating his own conduct. If the hon. gentleman should think it expedient to make a precedent to interpose a negative between the exercise of the king's prerogative, and to establish it with respect to the appointment of an ambassador, the House might rest assured, that the precedent would not stop there; but that it would be acted upon in the case of every appointment that a powerful minority might choose to question—[Cries of a "Majority"]—well, if it were a strong majority, à fortiori the constitutional objection to this course of proceeding was still stronger. He had no wish, he could assure hon. gentlemen opposite, to underrate their force: but if they were a majority, still it would be an infinitely better course for them to exert their power in an attack on the ministers—to ask the Crown to remove them—to declare their entire want of confidence in those ministers, and address the Crown for their removal—it would surely be infinitely better for the majority to take that course, than to lower the prerogative of the Crown by assuming undue powers, and interfering with those which properly belonged to the Crown.

March 16, 1835.

Lord John Russell begged to ask the right hon. baronet whether, after what passed in this House on Friday night, it is still the intention of the Marquess of Londonderry to proceed to St. Petersburg as his Majesty's ambassador?

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I will answer the question of the noble lord without the slightest reserve. About an hour since a letter was sent to me by the Secretary of State for foreign affairs, which he had just received from the Marquess of Londonderry. The noble marquess stated, that after the debate on Friday, he felt that his power of usefulness as his Majesty's representative at St. Petersburg must be greatly impaired. He had therefore thought it a public duty to relinquish the situation for which he had been chosen. I am bound to add, that that course was adopted by the noble marquess entirely on his own judgment, unsolicited and unsuggested, either directly or indirectly, by his Majesty's government.

Lord John Russell could not help feeling that it must greatly diminish the respect and consideration with which this government is viewed by foreign courts, when it is found that the notification of the Secretary of State for foreign affairs that an ambassador has been appointed, may afterwards be cancelled, not by a direct vote, but by an implied censure of the House of Commons.

Sir Robert Peel: The noble lord has assumed, that the retirement of the Marquess of Londonderry took place in consequence of the proceedings of the House of Commons. I do not mean to deny that it arose out of the discussion here—I meant nothing so unfair or so uncandid as to deny that the resignation was the consequence of that discussion; but I beg leave to remind the House, that it was only a discussion, and not a vote in the form of an address to the Crown. When the right hon. baronet, the member for Nottingham, asked me, on Friday night, whether it was my intention to advise the Crown to cancel the appointment, or to withhold the completion of it, I did feel myself bound distinctly to state, that I should not consider it consistent with my duty as a public man to tender that advice. Some may suppose that the decision of the Marquess of Londonderry, though not directly suggested by government, was made in consequence of some indirect communication. I beg leave distinctly to declare, that such was not the case. It was the single unsolicited act of the Marquess of Londonderry. No doubt, that appointment met with the disapprobation of those who expressed themselves in the course of the debate on the former night; but at the same time I cannot help reminding the noble lord, that even if a majority of the House had pronounced itself adverse to it, it would be some consolation to recollect that, I will not say the same majority, but still a majority, pronounced itself adverse to the re-appointment of Viscount Canterbury to the Chair. With respect to the observation of the noble lord, upon the inconvenience to the public service of government not being possessed of the confidence of a majority of the House of Commons, I can only say, that whenever the noble lord, or any other man, thinks himself able to form a government possessing more of public confidence, I submit that the proper course will be for him to give notice of that direct motion. It may be some such motion, probably, as the hon. member for Middlesex has intimated will be brought forward, and then we shall be enabled to see by the result, whether the House of Commons is prepared to agree to a vote which would be tantamount to a direct address for removal. Because a man in the situation I hold, has a perfect right to consider, whatever may be the consequence of a resignation of the trust, that it is not upon slight grounds, nor for a slight disappointment or mortification, that he ought to feel himself warranted in retiring from the king's service. The true way for the House of Commons to displace an administration is, not by a motion which those who vote for it state they hope will not have the effect of removing the government, but by a motion that will distinctly imply, that some other government possesses more of the confidence of the House, with greater ability to preserve it by the discharge of its public duties. No man is more anxious than I am that that question shall be brought to a fair and a speedy trial.

Later in the evening,—

Sir Robert Peel begged to represent to the House, that he was placed in a difficult situation by debates arising out of questions put to members of the government. An hon. member on the opposite side of the House got up and asked a question, which he answered, not expecting a debate; and he was afterwards precluded from taking any notice of what occurred. He would take advantage of the indulgence of the House to thank the right hon. gentleman (Sir John Hobhouse) at least for the fair spirit with which he had judged of the course taken by the government—a spirit, let him add, worthy of a public man, and very different from that which characterised the remarks of the hon. member for Middlesex. Supposing that he had said, in answer to the question which the hon. baronet had put to him the other night, that he was prepared to advise the Marquess of Londonderry to retire, should he not have deprived the noble lord of the grace and dignity of voluntary retirement? He could not conceive any thing more unjust than not to have given to the noble marquess an opportunity of considering the situation in which he was placed, and to have robbed him of the merit of deferring to what appeared to be the sense of the House of Commons. The right hon. baronet opposite (Sir John Hobhouse) had also done justice to the government in another particular, namely, in inferring that they would not have abandoned the Marquess of Londonderry, after the appointment had been tendered to, and accepted by that noble lord, at a period of great difficulty, and under the peculiar circumstances in which the government were involved. The hon. member for Middlesex had accused him of acting in opposition to the majority of that House. Now, he would ask, did he stand forward and declare the intentions of government in a hasty and insulting manner to the House of Commons? A question having been put to him, he could not avoid stating the course which government intended to pursue. If the opinion expressed by the House was meant as a condemnation of the foreign policy of the government, he must be permitted to say, that that was too important a question to be disposed of, not by votes, but by a discussion springing up on the motion, that the House resolve into a committee of supply. He could not then regard what had occurred as intended for a condemnation of the foreign policy of the government, but only as the expression of the opinion of the House with respect to an individual appointment. What steps the House might have thought proper to take if the Marquess of Londonderry had not acted as he had done, it was not for him to say; but he had said before, and he now repeated, with all respect towards the House, and with no wish to slight its opinion, that he never would have suggested to the Marquess of Londonderry to take the course which, from a sense of his own honour, and the dictates of his own judgment, that nobleman had adopted; nor would he, until the opinion of the House had been expressed in a regular and formal manner, have tendered his advice to the Crown to revoke the appointment. He felt obliged to the House for having allowed him to trespass so long on its attention, and he would not avail himself of the indulgence further than again to state, that he considered it would be only fair, on the part of the hon. member for Middlesex, to give him notice of the day when he intended to bring forward any motion involving the existence of the government. It, undoubtedly, was hardly fair in the hon. member to be threatening the government with motions from time to time, asserting that they would be brought forward at an early period, and yet shrinking constantly from naming any particular day. The hon. member for Middlesex had already threatened the government with a motion for limiting the supplies, and certainly he should have been prepared to resign if the House of Commons had voted in favour of such a motion; for that, undoubtedly, would have been such a demonstration of want of confidence as would have rendered it impossible for any government afterwards to remain in office. Now, he told the hon. member for Middlesex, that if he was anxious to bring forward any motion against the government, and could not find a day for the purpose, he would facilitate the hon. member's views. But if the hon. member would not name a day for any such motion, it was hardly fair in him to deal out menaces which he was prepared to enforce.

Lord John Russell would not expose himself to the chance of being told that he had rejected the reforms of the right hon. baronet before being able to judge of them, but was willing to wait for the time and hour when he would bring forward those great measures of reform which he had promised.

Sir Robert Peel said, that it would then appear from the noble lord's statement, that the course the ministry was pursuing was the right one, for the noble lord did not mean to refuse a hearing to the ministry; the noble lord was, in fact, prepared to give them confidence, he was prepared to wait for their measures. He intended to propose to-morrow a bill for the relief of persons dissenting from the Church of England in regard to the celebration of marriage; and another bill in the course of next week, to promote the commutation of tithe in England. In the course of the present week also an attempt would be made to settle a question, the most difficult of all, and requiring immediate attention—namely, the tithe question of Ireland. Now, he begged to put this question to the noble lord opposite—if, in consequence of discussions in that House, and of votes, excepting the questionable votes on the speakership and on the address, he had thrown up the government, would not the noble lord, with his present sentiments, have turned and said to him, “You are guilty of a cowardly abandonment of office; you never meant to remove grievances; we never brought forward a direct vote of censure—we were prepared to hear your propositions, but you yourself have shrunk from the trial?”

The subject was dropped, and the House went into a committee of supply.

DISSENTERS' MARRIAGES.

MARCH 17, 1835.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the motion with which he should on this occasion conclude, would have for its object to effect the settlement of a great and important question, which was of great consequence to the public, and which interested a large portion of the community. It was a question which had been for a long time unsettled, and to settle which various, but ineffectual attempts, had at different times been made; and, if it were once set at rest on proper and satisfactory principles, that would tend to promote harmony, peace, and contentment among those who adhered to the principles of the Established Church of England themselves, as well as to those who conscientiously dissented from the principles of that Church. The object of the motion which he should submit to the House was, to provide relief in regard to the celebration of the ceremony of marriage to those Dissenters from the Church of England, who objected to having the ceremony of marriage performed as at present required according to the rites and ordinances of the Established Church. It was no doubt known to all who heard him, that in the year 1754, an Act had passed, 26 George II., commonly known by the name of Lord Hardwicke's Act, which made a great alteration in the law of this country in respect to marriage. By that Act, it was provided, that no marriage ceremony should be performed by any clergyman, excepting by a clergyman of the Church of England, and according to the rites and ordinances of the Established Church. The only exception made was in favour of Jews and Quakers, who were allowed to contract marriage according to their own forms and ceremonies. The Dissenting body objected to the provisions of that Act. They alleged that there was no relation in life which tended more to the happiness of individuals, and the general good of society, than that of marriage; and they objected to a law which rendered that relation invalid, unless it were contracted according to rites, and in conformity to ceremonies, in which they could not conscientiously concur; and they, therefore, required of the legislature the enactment of such a law as would enable them to contract the ceremony of marriage, without being compelled to go through those forms and ceremonies from which they conscientiously dissented. That was the objection brought by the Dissenters to the law as it now stood. Now, he would say, that if the scruples of the Dissenters were really sincere, that no one could deny, not only the justice, but the policy, of affording them the relief which they required. The Church of England could have no object in calling upon those who conscientiously dissented from its tenets and principles in all other matters, to contract the ceremony of marriage according to the rites of that church. Neither had society any interest in requiring that such a ceremony should be performed. It was not sufficient to say, that the ceremony of marriage, as contracted according to the rites of the Church of England, was a mere form of words, and that the persons so contracting marriage were not called upon to subscribe to any of the doctrines or principles of that church. The persons contracting marriage received, according to the rites of the Established Church, a solemn benediction from the mouth of the clergyman, expressly and avowedly for the purpose of giving a religious sanction to the ceremony; and if the contracting party could not conscientiously comply with the ceremony, or concur in that benediction, it ceased to be that solemn and religious ceremony which was intended. Under those circumstances, it became necessary to consider what mode of relief could be afforded to Dissenters; and it occurred to him, that of all the plans proposed, there were only three which were at all feasible, or by which the object the Dissenters had in view, could possibly be accomplished. In the first place, it had been suggested as a remedy, that it might be possible to alter the ceremony of the Church of England. But the alteration in that ceremony would, in his opinion, be a violation done to the consciences of those who, adhering to the doctrines of the Church, entirely approved of that ceremony. There was nothing in that ceremony to which they felt the slightest objection; on the contrary, the benediction and all the proceedings contained the essential and vital principles of their faith. The members of the Church of England, therefore, had a fair right to object to the alteration of a ceremony with which they were perfectly satisfied, and which was entirely conformable to their feelings and doctrines, provided that any other mode of satisfying the conscientious scruples of those who dissented from the Church could be discovered. Besides, the only object that could be gained by such an alteration would be, provided a concomitant enactment were passed for the purpose, that no marriages should take place, unless they were solemnized according to the altered form. Because, if the form of the Church of England were altered in the first instance, and parties were afterwards left to perform what rite they pleased, for the purpose of giving a sanction to the act of marriage, it was quite clear that nothing would have been gained; and, on the other hand, if it were made compulsory on all parties to celebrate the ceremony of marriage according to the altered form, he believed it would be quite impossible to establish any rite, to be performed in the Church of England, by a minister of that Church, which would be satisfactory, without exception, to the whole Dissenting body. In fact, there were, he believed, some parties who objected to any religious ceremony at all. Others there were who did not object to the religious rite, but who objected to the principle of being compelled to solemnize the act of marriage in the Church of England, or through the aid of a minister belonging to the Established Church. The result, therefore, of any attempt to alter the marriage ceremony of the Church of England, would probably be, that the legislature would do violence to the consciences of the members of that Church, and at the same time give no satisfaction to the Dissenters, but the reverse, if the House were to compel them by law to celebrate their marriages according to a certain ceremony, let that ceremony be as different as it might from the existing one. In his opinion, therefore, it was not expedient to attempt any alteration of the religious rite of the Church of England, with the view of giving satisfaction to the Dissenters, especially with our knowing whether such an alteration would meet with the general concurrence of the members of the Church. But even if the concurrence of the adherents of the Church were obtained, he did not know whether it would be proper to adopt the plan, for he could not hope to make such a change in the present ceremony, as would give satisfaction both to all classes of Dissenters, and to the members of the Established Church. He, therefore, dismissed from his mind all hope of settling the question by the adoption of that plan—namely, by an alteration in the Liturgy of the Church of England. The second mode by which it might be possible to give relief to the Dissenters, and a mode which had been hitherto almost always tried was, to make some provision by which Dissenters should be able to perform the ceremony of marriage within Dissenting chapels, and various bills had been submitted to the consideration of Parliament, since the year 1824, some of which had passed the House of Commons, founded on the principle of giving permission to Dissenters to celebrate their marriage ceremony within their own places of worship. In 1824, a measure was introduced for that purpose, but it provided relief solely for the case of the Unitarians. In 1825, another bill was brought in for the same object; and in 1827, a measure was introduced founded on a different principle. At length, in 1834, the noble lord opposite proposed his bill, and that was the last measure on this subject which had been submitted to the consideration of parliament. The noble lord's bill was founded on the principle of attempting to give perfect satisfaction to the Dissenter, by permitting him, under certain regulations, to celebrate the ceremony of marriage in his own Dissenting chapel. He would proceed to describe the provisions of that bill. In devising any plan for the relief of Dissenters, in respect to the celebration of marriages, it was necessary to consider three points, each of which was of essential importance. The first was the notice which should be given (either in the way of license, or of bans, or by some other mode), by the instrumentality of which the commission of fraud, and the celebration of clandestine marriages, might be prevented. The second point was the nature of the contract or ceremony which should be performed. The third point was the mode of registration. The noble lord's bill provided for these three separate and important objects in the following manner.—The noble lord proposed that the bans for the marriage of a Dissenter should be published in a church, by a minister of the Established Church, in the same manner as bans were at present published; that a declaration of the fact of the publication of the bans, should afterwards be given by the minister of the Church, and that the Dissenter should then be allowed to celebrate the ceremony of marriage in a Dissenting chapel, duly licensed for that purpose. The noble lord's bill also enacted that a license should be issued for the solemnization of marriage in any Dissenting chapel, provided that an application for such license should be made by twenty householders; and the Quarter Sessions had no power to withhold the license, if so applied for. The bans of marriage having been previously published by a minister of the Church of England, the Dissenter was at liberty to have his marriage solemnized in one of the licensed chapels. With respect to registration, the noble lord's bill provided, that the minister, teacher, or preacher, who officiated in the licensed chapel, should keep the registry of marriages; that the book should be provided at the expense of those who frequented the chapel for the purpose of worship; and that, after a certain period, the registry should be transmitted to the register of the diocese, to be kept by him. Such were the provisions of the bill brought in by the noble lord, unquestionably with the best intentions, and for the purpose of giving satisfaction to the Dissenters; but it was open, in his (Sir Robert Peel's) opinion to objections; and, first of all, to this very powerful objection—that it gave no satisfaction whatever to those it was intended to relieve. The grounds on which the Dissenters were displeased with that bill, were stated in various petitions presented to the House; and he would refer to one of those petitions, in which their objections were very briefly but emphatically expressed. The petition to which he alluded was presented in the course of the last session, and it contained a solemn and decided protest on the part of the Protestant Dissenters, against the bill of the noble lord, which they opposed on the following grounds;—1, because they objected to the celebration of marriages in places of worship exclusively; 2, because they objected to the publication of bans in parish churches, and to the granting of licenses by surrogates; and 3, because they felt, that the affixing the license granted for the solemnization of marriages in some conspicuous part of their places of worship would give rise to feelings which it would be better to avoid exciting. It would be seen, therefore, that very material objections were entertained by the Dissenters to the measure proposed by the noble lord. In his opinion, the third objection was one of minor importance; but still it must be remembered that it was put forward by the Dissenters themselves. Besides these objections there were others which he thought might be urged to the noble lord's bill on general grounds. The noble lord proposed to permit the marriage ceremony to be solemnized in any place licensed for that purpose on the application of twenty resident householders. Now, he was sure that, however they might differ on matters of religion, they would be all of one opinion, as to the extreme importance to society of taking effectual precautions against fraud, and the celebration of clandestine marriages. In his opinion the Dissenters were equally interested with the rest of the community in the adoption of these precautions, for the sake of the peace of their own families, as well as for the general interests of society. And he thought that, as such precautions were in a great measure effectual in the case of members of the establishment, he was not going too far in saying, that members of the Dissenting bodies must be peculiarly anxious to have similar precautions adopted in respect to themselves. Unless effectual precautions were taken in their case, the Dissenters, and particularly the female members of their families, would be subject to be practised upon by imposition and unfair artifice. It was quite clear that society in general was interested in taking effectual precautions against the commission of frauds in this matter. In making new regulations, it was necessary not only to take into consideration the regulations already existing, but also the means which might be afforded, in consequence of the alteration of the law for the commission of fraud. It was well known, that the law placed no impediment in the way of the registration of Dissenting chapels; the law imposed no test by which the character of Dissenting chapels could be known. Any parties wishing to register a place for the purpose of religious worship, had only to apply in proper form, and on the payment of half-a-crown the registration was effected as a matter of course, and the place then became entitled to the protection of the law as a place of religious worship. It was not necessary that the place registered should be a separate building; and he apprehended, that if application were made for the licensing of a room for the purpose of religious worship, the license must immediately follow on the payment of 2s. 6d. If the noble lord's bill, then, had passed into a law, how easy would it have been for parties, on their application, though it might not be a bonâ fide application, to get a room licensed for the purpose of religious worship in the first instance; and afterwards, if twenty persons had made application that that room should be licensed for the solemnization of marriages, there would have been no authority to prevent the issue of a license for that purpose. Where so general and promiscuous a license was given for the performance of the ceremony of marriage, great apprehension would necessarily be felt, that those frauds and evasions of the law, against which it was so desirable to guard, would take place. The noble lord proposed to permit the ceremony of marriage to be performed by any teacher or preacher. Now, it was undoubtedly true, that in some Dissenting communities there were preachers with a fixed and stationary character, fully recognised as ministers of settled congregations; but there were also some ministers who had no such fixed or stationary character, and who belonged to various congregations. The noble lord's bill, however, would have given authority to the latter description of preachers to celebrate marriages. It therefore appeared to him most desirable, in giving relief to the Dissenters, that the House should proceed on a principle which would apply equally well to all classes and kinds of Dissenters. With respect to registration, the noble lord's bill provided, that the registries should be kept by the minister, teacher, or preacher, that they should not only be in his handwriting, but also in his custody. Now, if this regulation were applied indiscriminately to all descriptions of preachers—both to those who had a fixed and stationary character, and to those who had no settled character—and they were invested with the important duty not only of making the registries, but also of keeping them in their custody, it was quite clear that sufficient precautions would not have been taken against the evasion of the intentions of the legislature. But as the noble lord's object was to give relief to the Dissenting body, it was the less necessary for him to refer to the other provisions of the bill, since it had proved unsatisfactory to the Dissenters. It was quite clear, that the great object which the noble lord had in view, had not been gained by the introduction of that measure. He had already alluded to two modes by which it might be supposed, on a first impression, that relief should be given to the Dissenters:—1st, to an alteration of the marriage ceremony of the Church of England, which he set aside as an ineffectual mode; and 2dly, to the mode adopted by the noble lord, which continued the publication of the bans by the ministers of the Church of England, but which permitted the marriage of Dissenters to be solemnized by the ministers of the congregations to which they belonged. The second mode not having given satisfaction to the Dissenters, it therefore remained to be considered by what mode satisfaction could be given to that body, consistently with a principle which would admit of universal application without inconvenience or mischief. He would now, after much consideration of the noble lord's bill, which had proved unsatisfactory, not only to the Dissenters, but also to many members of the Established Church (for they had objected to be made the instruments of performing the preliminary ceremony of the publication of the bans, in respect to a rite which it was proposed should cease to be sanctioned by the religious forms of the Church of England)—he would now, he repeated, proceed to state to the House the principles on which he proposed to found a bill, for the purpose of giving relief to the Dissenters. It appeared to him that by far the most efficient and least objectionable mode of giving that relief was to propose two ceremonies, one a civil ceremony, and the other a religious ceremony; taking care to encourage, as far as possible, the religious ceremony, but not imposing it as an absolute and essential condition of the validity of a marriage. He would make the civil ceremony an indispensable preliminary of marriage. That was the security which he would require on the part of society. He would fain hope, however, that the ceremony of marriage would not, in consequence, be divested of its religious character; he believed that it would not. He believed, that so much importance was attached to the religious rite by the Dissenting body, that they would in almost all cases superadd the religious to the civil ceremony; and he doubted not, that the religious sanction so superadded, would be more efficient as a sanction if left to be imposed by the parties themselves, according to such forms as were most acceptable to them, than if prescribed in the nature of a fixed ceremony by the legislature. Every one must desire to see the religious sanction possess a solemn and binding character; but was it probable that it would have the effect of solemnity, or be of a binding nature, if it were not precisely in accordance with the conscientious feelings of the parties on whom it was imposed; but if it were, on the contrary, prescribed and determined by law, to which they would be compelled to submit? He repeated, that he would encourage as much as possible the religious ceremony, but he would not exact its performance as an indispensable condition of the validity of marriage. Indeed, it would be impossible for the legislature to impose one fixed form of religious ceremony; it must be varied to suit the different opinions of the different bodies of Dissenters. The religious ceremony that would suit the Unitarians, would not suit the Independents, or the Baptists. But it appeared to him, that if the legislature were to leave the Dissenting bodies to superadd to the civil contract of marriage such religious observances as were in accordance with their peculiar opinions, nothing of the value of a religious sanction would thereby be lost. In acting on this principle he was acting in precise conformity with the principle of a bill which passed the House of Commons in the year 1827, and which proceeded in the House of Lords to a third reading, and which was then only postponed on account of the advanced period of the session. The bill, which related to Unitarians, was introduced by Mr. W. Smith, and the House would see from a description of its provisions, that it directly recognised the principle on which he now proposed to proceed. The bill provided, that "the bans were to be published in Church. Where both parties were Unitarians, a certificate of the publication was to be given by the clergyman, on payment of the usual fee. On presentation of that certificate to a magistrate, the magistrate might marry the parties. The parties were required to make a declaration, that they were both Unitarians. Magistrates marrying the parties were required to give certificates of marriage, such certificates to be deposited in the parish chest, and marriages to be entered on the parish registry." Before he entered into an explanation of the particular details of the measure he proposed to introduce, he wished to show the House that the principle on which it was founded was recognised by the law of England previous to the marriage act of 1754. He apprehended that the law of England recognised marriage as a civil contract; and that it did not require, as an essential and indispensable condition of the validity of that contract, the performance of any religious ceremony. In the famous case of "Dalrymple v. Dalrymple," Lord Stowell, then Sir W. Scott, laid down that principle, and in support of his opinion, he referred to the judgment of Lord Holt, in the reign of Queen Anne, in the following terms:—"It was said by Lord Holt, and agreed to by the whole court, that if a contract be per verba de presenti, it amounts to an actual marriage, which the very party themselves cannot dissolve by release, or other mutual agreement, for it is as much a marriage in the sight of God, as if it had been in facie ecclesie." In Wigmore's case the same Judge said, "that a contract per verba de presenti is a marriage, so is a contract per verba de futuro; if the contract be executed, and the man take her, it is a marriage; and they cannot be punished for fornication." Lord Stowell stated, that in the ecclesiastical courts, as well as in the common law, "the stream ran uniformly in the same course," and he referred to the case of Lord Fitzmaurice, the son of the Earl of Kerry, brought in the year 1732, before the court of delegates. In that case it appeared that the engagement to marry was made in the following terms:—"We swear to marry one another," and it was held that each party was bound by that declaration. The decision of the court was to the following effect:—"The court, composed of a full commission, paid no regard to the objection, and found for the marriage, and, on application for a commission of review, founded upon new matter alleged, was refused by the chancellor." Lord Stowell next observed, that things continued on this footing till the marriage act of 1754, which was not intended to give the ceremony of marriage a religious sanction, as a religious sanction; but was only intended as a precaution against fraud and clandestine marriage. In making, therefore, the civil contract an indispensable condition of the validity of marriages, and leaving parties to superadd the religious sanction, he was acting in conformity, not only with the principle of the bill of 1827, but with what was the principle of the law of England previous to the marriage act of 1754; and he thought he was only acting in conformity with the dictates of reason and good sense in not prescribing any precise religious ceremony, but in leaving the parties interested to fix for themselves such religious sanction as was best suited to their religious opinions. The principle of his bill was also recognised by the existing law, because the marriage act of 1754 did not impose the religious ceremony as an indispensable condition in all cases, for that act expressly provided that its enactments should not extend to the cases of Jews and Quakers. He knew that ingenious doubts had been expressed as to the validity of the marriages of Jews and Quakers; but he apprehended, that no man could doubt that the whole course of law established this position—that the marriages of Jews and Quakers were valid as far as regarded the legitimacy of the offspring, and the transmission of property. But in some of the possessions of the British Crown marriages could be performed without the intervention of a minister of the Established Church. In Ireland, the presence of a minister of the Church of England was not necessary to give validity to marriages; neither was it necessary in India. There were others in that House better informed on the subject than himself, but he believed that, according to the existing law in India, a marriage performed either by a minister of the Church of England, or by a Roman Catholic priest, was valid; while a marriage performed by a Presbyterian minister was not valid.

Dr. Lushington stated, that an act had been passed to legalize marriages performed in India by Presbyterian ministers.

Sir Robert Peel said he was not aware of that fact. He might extend his former remarks to the state of the marriage law in Newfoundland; but he thought he had said enough to show that the whole state of the marriage act required review and revision. In some of our dependencies, and even in this empire, it was far from being in a satisfactory state. Having said thus much of the general principles on which he proposed to proceed, he would now proceed to explain the enactments which his bill would include. It would be recollected that the Dissenters had objected to the bill of the noble lord opposite, because it required the publication of bans in churches by ministers of the Established Church. The present method of notifying the intentions of Dissenters to contract a marriage with one of their own community was repugnant to the feelings of the Dissenters, but if he could devise any other mode by which effectual notice could be given, which should relieve the Dissenter from the necessity of conforming to the religious rites of the establishment, and if he could introduce some simple form of notice, by which the conscientious feelings of a minister of the Church would be spared the pain of assisting in a ceremony which was in opposition to the forms prescribed by the establishment, he thought that the object he had in view would be effectually answered. In some cases, also, it would occur that an individual might assent to the civil contract, but might not wish to have it confirmed by the performance of any religious ceremony. Now, his bill would do a good deal to effect these objects. The form he intended to propose would be very simple, and if, when he had laid his views on this question before the House, this was found not to be sufficient, why, then, let the Dissenters join with him in framing one which would answer the ends better. If there were two parties who had an objection to the form of marriage as solemnized by the Church of England, they would have within their power the remedy which it was the object of the bill to secure to them. But he did not wish to make this enactment compulsory on all who conscientiously differed from the doctrines of the Church. He did hope that the impediment of pride being removed, when it was no longer absolutely necessary for the Dissenter to be married according to the forms and establishment to whose doctrines he could not subscribe, he would, in many instances, not avail himself of the kind of relief proposed by the bill. He would give the Dissenter every facility of being married elsewhere, if he preferred it, but he hoped that the Dissenter would be induced, unless there was some serious objection in his mind to the form of the marriage ceremony as performed in the Church of England, to conform to that ceremony. What he meant to say was, that he did not wish to repudiate and reject the Dissenter from joining in the performance of the common rites and ceremonies of the establishment, if he thought proper to do so; but, on the other hand, if he objected to those rites and ceremonies, the bill would give him a full and satisfactory remedy. He proposed, that a civil ceremony only should be performed between parties who objected to the marriage rite of the church; and to render them competent for the performance of the ceremony, it would be necessary that one or both of them should have resided at least seven days previous in a certain hundred, before the magistrate of which the proceedings were to take place. The parties would have to give notice to the magistrate of the hundred, who would preside at the performance of what he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) would call the civil ceremony of marriage—namely, the acknowledgment of the contract between the parties. Each would have, on the ratification of the contract, to give a written certificate, stating that he or she acknowledged the contract to be binding. The form would be found in the schedule of the bill, which he proposed to lay on the table, and was of the most simple kind. Each party would then sign a form, acknowledging the other as standing in the relationship of husband or wife. The written acknowledgment, or completion of the ceremony, before the civil magistrate, was not to take place till after a period of fourteen days subsequent to giving the notice, and must take place within three months of the period. He preferred the proceedings before a single magistrate, although he was aware that it might be said, that the security would be greater if the ceremony took place in the presence of several; but, when he recollected the nature of the ceremony, and the character of those who generally attended at the petty sessions, he was satisfied that it would be a relief to the parties about to enter into the strict relationship consequent on the contract, if he enabled them to enter into it before a single magistrate. He was sure that the grace and value of the gift would be diminished, if they made it requisite that the ceremony should be performed before a number of magistrates. He had now mentioned the nature of the relief which he intended to propose, and the nature of the civil contract he wished to recommend for those who objected to the performance of the ceremony in the Church. At present it was necessary to make a declaration previous to procuring a marriage license. He intended to propose, that a similar declaration should be made before the magistrate, on entering upon the civil contract; and the same oath, as on obtaining a license, would be administered, namely—that the parties were above the age of twenty-one; that the contract was with the consent of the parents or guardians; and that neither of them were aware of any legal impediment to the marriage. It might be said, that a door would be open to clandestine marriages by the non-publication of bans. At present, however, nothing was so delusive as the publication of bans; such a complete change had taken place in the state of society since they were adopted, that they gave no security for the object for which they were intended; he was convinced that most of the illegal or clandestine marriages that took place, were those where bans had been published. In many populous places, parties might have bans published, and their names escape observation. Under the system which he proposed, there would be no greater temptation to illegal marriages than there was at present. If the notice were incomplete, of course the magistrate would not suffer the contract to be completed. Where there were no religious scruples, it was not intended to alter the present form; but all that he had in view was, to relieve those who entertained objection to the marriage ceremony being performed in the Church by the clergyman. It appeared to him that the securities he had taken were quite as valid as those which existed on applying for a license. He was convinced that if he were to attempt to take superfluous securities, he would only diminish the value of the relief which he was anxious to afford. He should previously have stated that he also proposed, that the magistrate before whom the acknowledgment of the contract was made, should take two or three copies of the form, which were to be signed by the parties, which would be the best evidence that could be obtained of the contract, and that one of these copies should be sent to the minister of the parish, whose duty it would be to keep the register of the civil contract of marriage. The Dissenters would not be brought into contact with the minister, but the magistrate would transmit to him one of the copies of the certificate, that the parties had entered into contract. It had been said, that they ought not to call upon clergymen to enter the names of the parties in the register, when the ceremony was not performed by themselves, but he was sure that the ministers of the Church would not object to become registrars. Whatever register, however, was adopted, he thought it desirable that they should, if possible, make it a common register, and not make distinctions. His own earnest wish was to leave this register, under the present state of things, in the hands of the ministers of the parish, being convinced that they would be less liable to inaccuracies than any other parties that could be chosen. He was aware, that there were some points that he might have passed over, but he trusted that the House would excuse him when they considered the number of matters he had had to consider during the sitting of parliament. It was not possible for him to give several important matters the attention which he wished. Among other things, he had been unable to give the consideration he desired to some measure for a general civil registration. If they were not able to obtain a new registration on a general principle immediately, he thought that it was desirable, in the mean time, to avail themselves of that form of register which they had. By the mode which he proposed, they would have a civil registry in one place, and a religious one in another. With respect to the claims for compensation, and the fees to the clergyman, for the simple registration, he had little to say. He believed, that when those matters which affected the scruples of Dissenters, were removed, that there would be less objection than at present, to the performance of the ceremony in the Church, and still less to the payment of fees. He intended to propose that the whole amount of fees payable in the civil contract of marriage, should not be more than seven shillings. There would be no necessity for payment for a license in this case any more than at present, when bans were published. Out of this fee of seven shillings, he proposed that five shillings should go to the parish officer or clergyman, who kept the register; by this means, he was justified in saying that the whole expense of a marriage would be less than it was at present. He assuredly felt much obliged to the House for the attention and kindness with which they had listened to him on a matter on which he was much less informed than those who had made the law their immediate study. He had not felt himself called upon to enter upon technical refinements on the subject, but had endeavoured, as shortly and simply as possible, to explain the enactment, which he trusted would have the effect of removing the conscientious objections of those who dissented from the Church, and at the same time relieving the ministers of the church from the publication of bans between parties who object to his performing the ceremony. If he succeeded in the object he had in view, he should rejoice at removing one of those causes which had tended to alienate the minds of those who dissented from the doctrines of the Church, from its ministers, much more than any thing connected with the ceremony could compensate to them. In conclusion, he did not propose the slightest change in the present law of marriage with respect to the members of the establishment; but with them the civil contract would still be subject to the religious sanction. He was sure that no one would object to the claim he put in for the members of the establishment, of the continuance of that law which best suited their habits and feelings, and which superadded the religious sanction to the civil contract. The right hon. gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in a bill for the relief of persons dissenting from the Church of England, in regard to the celebration of marriage.

Dr. Lushington wished to understand whether, when two persons were married in the manner proposed by the bill, questions as to their belonging to any sect of Dissenters, were to be put to them before, or subsequently to the performance of the contract?

Sir Robert Peel said, that the form of oath to be taken by the party ran thus:—“I, A. B., do swear that I am not a member of the united Church of England and Ireland, and that I have lived in the parish for so many days; that I am so many years old, a bachelor or widower (as the case might be), and that I know of no other impediment, kindred, or alliance, which is an obstacle to this engagement."

An animated debate ensued, in which several members took part, towards the close of which,—

Sir Robert Peel said, that his only object in rising was to notice briefly the few observations which had been made in reference to the intended bill, lest they might have the effect of prejudicing it, either with hon. members or with the great body of the Dissenters. He never felt more satisfied of any thing than that he could succeed in convincing any reasonable body of Dissenters that the tendency of the bill would not be to establish any invidious distinctions—that there was nothing in the bill which could prove in the least objectionable to Dissenters, excepting that which must, under all circumstances, be inseparable from dissent. From the fair and liberal spirit in which the whole proposition had been met, he felt he had little more to do than express his confident hope, that practical grievance was about to be met by a practical and effectual remedy. There were objections, he was aware, to almost any view of the subject, and he had attempted to meet them in such a manner as should not shock the feelings of either party. His impression was, that if members of the establishment were satisfied with the present state of the law, that they should not be interfered with. Some hon. gentlemen in that House might say, "put the law on another footing—put it on a civil footing." But for his own part he could say that he never had heard from anybody belonging to the Church of England, or from any of the leaders of the great bodies of Dissenters, a desire to dispense with the religious solemnity. If he were to be required to declare that this solemnity should or might be dispensed with for the members of the Established Church, he certainly did think it would savour of that intolerance which was condemned by the Dissenter; for it would seem that that Dissenter not only looked for relief for himself, but expected that the government should make an alteration in the ceremonies of others, and accommodate them to the relief granted to him. He could assure the hon. gentleman opposite, that, so far from having a wish to put the Dissenters on a different footing, his anxiety was, if possible, to have made the ceremony a religious one. But he found that there were great difficulties in the way of this arrangement. If all classes of Dissenters entertained the same feelings and opinions on the subject, the settlement would have been extremely easy; but was this the case? And, therefore, was he obliged to adopt a different rule of proceeding. No degradation was ever contemplated by him in the arrangement. Those of the establishment conformed to certain principles and rules—to a prescribed form of religious worship; it was consequently easy to deal with them. If there were only one class and form of dissent, it would be equally easy to deal with the body of Dissenters, and far more agreeable to him to propose a religious rather than a civil ceremony. But hon. gentlemen should consider that he was not placed under these favourable circumstances. He had to legislate for a great number of different sects, possessing different principles, and he had found it impossible to prescribe any particular form of religious ceremony which could possibly be acceptable to all these various classes of religionists. Some sects of Dissenters were not in the practice of using in their marriages any religious ceremonies at all—the quakers, for example. And he believed there were other classes of Dissenters, who were equally indifferent to a religious ceremony. Now, if this were the case, would it not, according to the feelings of hon. gentlemen opposite, have been the strongest proof of intolerance, on his part, if he had attempted to prescribe and enforce one religious ceremony for all these different classes? How was it possible, he asked, that he could embody in one act, an arrangement to which all could agree? While, therefore, he claimed for the members of the Church of England the right of persisting in their ceremony, he would not, although he might succeed in pleasing one or two classes of Dissenters, attempt to prescribe a religious discipline respecting the matrimonial contracts of the multitudinous sections of those differing from the Established Church, in so great a variety of degrees. He denied that any slight was intended, or could reasonably be presumed to be imputed, to the several denominations of Dissenting ministers, because he did not declare them to be, one and all, fit and proper persons to solemnize, and give a legal sanction to, the matrimonial rite. He felt no difficulty in allowing anybody who had such a vocation, to preach and to teach; but he doubted whether he could be held justifiable, even by the Dissenters themselves, in permitting a civil act of great importance—a contract of the most solemn nature—to be perfected by everybody and anybody, who might happen to have a congregation who were disposed to listen to him, and to acknowledge his ministry. Although he had no desire to interfere with the spiritual form which might be adopted, he had a right to ascertain that the civil contract had been duly made. He believed, that the learned and intelligent class of Dissenting ministers would feel themselves degraded, by being placed on the same footing with every illiterate parson, who might fancy himself inspired upon a particular occasion, and consequently competent to perform a religious ceremony, to teach and to preach, and to go through all the other functions of the Christian ministry. Hon. gentlemen who wished to have this conclusive right of performing the marriage ceremony conveyed to the Dissenting ministers, should show that it was safe to confide it to every man, who might claim and exercise the right of a preacher: if they did not do this, they would fall short in their argument, for how could the distinction be drawn between the teacher of one sect, however large, and of another, however small, of Dissenters? Therefore it was that he fell back upon the method which was likely to be most satisfactory to the general body of Dissenters, namely, that of encouraging the religious ceremony, and securing the accomplishment and the acknowledgment of the civil contract. He trusted that the Dissenters would be convinced, that there was not the slightest intention, on his part, to inflict any hardship or degradation upon them. Indeed it would appear, the hon. gentlemen had exercised some ingenuity in their opposition to the measure. It had been formerly contended that Dissenting parties would not be satisfied, so long as they were compelled to go before the clergyman of the Established Church: well, this was to be no longer necessary! But, surely, the fathers of families would require some security for the binding nature of the contract in which young females were to be engaged. Therefore, he said, to avoid any collusion between the person who might fancy himself inspired to act as a minister, and either of the parties—to avoid the many obvious calamities which might ensue, he said to the Dissenters—go before the magistrate, the only civil functionary he had at their service. Men might object to the constitution of the magistracy, and so forth, but was he to wait until the magistracy were reformed? Was he, until then, to delay the relief to the Dissenters which they so anxiously desired? He left, too, from a regard to the delicacy of the females, the privilege of going before any magistrate they might choose, lay or clerical. This he had done, instead of rendering it imperative upon them to appear at quarter sessions, or even appearing before more than a single magistrate. He might have erred, but it certainly was from no unkindly feeling towards the Dissenters. Next, as to what had been urged respecting the system of registration, he might have conceived that there might be some objection on the part of the clergymen. He could not conceive any upon that of the Dissenter. It was the most satisfactory mode of registration which now existed—he did not say that it might not be amended—he did not say that he should be averse to its amendment, but he was obliged to take it as it stood. Besides, it was that which was in use for the members of the Established Church. He did not ask the Dissenter to go before the clergyman, but only before the magistrate, who would transmit to the magistrate the certificate. Then, as to the amount of fees, he had to state, that in Mr. Smith's, and in Lord John Russell's bill, and in every other bill for the relief of the Dissenters, the rights of the clergyman had been respected. His object had been to bring in the bill in the most liberal spirit. He had desired less to make any thing like a speech in reply, than to set aside statements, which might have the effect of exciting prejudices which were perfectly unfounded.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

POOR LAWS FOR IRELAND.

MARCH 19, 1835.

Mr. Smith O'Brien moved, "That it is the opinion of this House, that a provision should, without delay, be made by assessment upon property in Ireland, for the relief of the aged, infirm, and helpless poor in that kingdom."

SIR ROBERT PEELE said, that in consistency with the views entertained by the hon. gentleman who had just sat down, he ought to have abstained from entering into the details which he had suggested to the consideration of the House, because in the greater part of his speech he had spoken against the principle altogether of a system of poor-laws. The hon. gentleman said, that it would be better to leave the industrious poor to rely solely on their own exertions, inasmuch as that course afforded much greater security for their industry and good conduct, than would exist if poor-laws were provided: but the hon. gentleman himself declared that some qualification was necessary of that broad principle. The hon. gentleman admitted that, under certain circumstances, the principle he had laid down ought to be departed from, and that it would be wise to provide, at the public charge, temporary relief. Now, if it were necessary, in laying down a general principle, to make so wide a qualification as that, he begged to put it to the House whether it was expedient, under the present circumstances, to affirm a resolution of the nature of the one that had been moved? The question never would be brought before the House in the shape which the hon. gentleman to whom he had referred imagined, viz. — whether the poor-laws of England, with the whole mass of abuse that had accumulated round them, should be applied to Ireland. Every one would be prepared at once to negative such a proposition. But the real question was, could they apply the original principle of the Act of Elizabeth to Ireland, and could they accompany that principle with a practical provision to secure against its abuse? That was a question to be hereafter discussed; and he must express his hope, that the hon. member for Limerick (Mr. O'Brien) did not mean to force them to the negation of that proposition. Had not the hon. gentleman better withdraw his resolution, than oblige the House to take a course which might imply a negative of his proposition? He thought it impossible for the House to consent to affirm that proposition. The hon. gentleman asked the House, in the present state of the question, to affirm that it was expedient, without delay, to make, by an assessment on property in Ireland, a provision for the relief of the aged, the helpless, and infirm poor of Ireland. If he did not believe that the hon. gentleman would withdraw his motion, he should think himself called on to move as an amendment a resolution, that leave be given to the member for Limerick to bring in a bill on the subject. Such a motion was not usual; but he certainly should have moved an amendment to that effect, and asked the hon. gentleman to bring in a bill embodying his own conception of what the details ought to be. Because, if it were right that without delay they should make a provision for the poor, the hon. gentleman ought to be prepared to follow up his resolution with a practical measure, and let the House see the provisions by which he proposed to execute his resolution. The hon. gentleman said, that it should be by an assessment on property in Ireland. Did he mean real property, and personal property also? Did he mean a parochial assessment, and that the relief should be distributed by commissioners, or by parochial authority, or by some authority in districts which he would point out? These were matters of importance, with respect to which the House ought to have some intimation of the views of the mover, before the hon. gentleman asked them to affirm his resolution. He should be sorry to take a course that might appear to be either adverse to the principle or to giving a fair consideration to the subject. The hon. member for Cork (Mr. Feargus O'Connor) who he certainly thought had been watching with a sort of parental anxiety over the fate of this motion—an anxiety of which further evidence was afforded by the warmth of the speech he made—had represented that when the proposal was made by Lord Althorp to appoint the commission, he (Sir Robert Peel) recommended that the commission should be extended to every country in Europe. Such was not the fact. It was, however, at his instance that the commission was appointed for Ireland. He had observed, that there were debates on the subject day after day, and yet nothing conclusive was done; therefore, he suggested that it would be better to appoint a commission which should go to Ireland, and procure that local and practical information which he thought they stood in need of, and which he must say, he expected the House would have possessed before this time. He certainly should have thought that there were some main and leading principles established which might have been reported before now. But instead of attempting to force the government by such a resolution as was proposed, if the House were dissatisfied with the delay in furnishing the report of the commissioners, he would suggest to them that the more logical course would be to move that the commissioners should report forthwith. He did not think that the best way of forcing the report was to force the House to affirm a proposition which that report might considerably qualify. Perhaps, the House would not object to leave it to the government to call on the commissioners to make a report of their progress; and, if it should turn out that the delay was occasioned by an enquiry into minute matters which did not bear particularly on any great principle, though they might be important in themselves—for example, he did not see that any great principle was involved in enquiries respecting infirmaries or other public charities—if this were the case, he did not think it necessary for the House to wait till the enquiry was complete. Should the enquiries of the commissioners as to the great branches of the subject be completed, there was no reason why they should not have a report on the leading principles laid on the Table of the House, which would allow of those principles being taken into consideration, and the consideration of the details might be postponed. The hon. and learned member for Tipperary said, that if they inserted the words “helpless poor,” he was not certain whether they would not affirm this proposition, that every child capable of earning its subsistence by labour should have a claim to support. Now, surely it was important to ascertain that. It was important to ascertain what construction was to be put on the words “helpless and infirm poor.” There was nothing so dangerous as to affirm a general proposition of that nature, without seeing the regulations by which it was to be carried into effect. The hon. gentleman said, he would not afford relief generally; he would give it only to those who were infirm; but how were they to draw the line between the infirmity of actual disease and the indisposition caused by scanty living in consequence of not having any employment. The hon. gentleman’s resolution appeared to imply a claim on the part of the whole poor—it would grow to that; it would lead to all the difficulties that had resulted from a departure from the original principle of the English poor-laws. At present, he could not judge of the practicability of the motion before the House. Until some specific mode should be placed before the House, which should honestly administer the proper kind of relief, he never would affirm the proposition now before them. If he did affirm such a proposition he might be establishing some measure which would absorb the whole of the landed property of the country; he might be constituting an agrarian law of the worst possible description; he might be sacrificing the industrious and moral habits of the people, unless a due regard were had to the wholesomeness of the measure proposed. The hon. member for Cork had mentioned a moral ground for supporting some such measure, namely, the necessity of teaching the Irish people to eat; but he would venture to say, that to allow them to provide food for themselves by their own industry, would be much better. He would then leave them to unassisted nature, as a better instructress. He hoped the hon. member (Mr. W. S. O’Brien) would not press his motion. A commission having been appointed for Ireland, he had every reason to believe that a report would shortly be made. Let them have facts sufficient before they affirmed the proposition. The present course was only calculated to prejudice the question, and for that reason the motion ought not to be pressed.

Mr. Smith O’Brien expressed his delight at the declaration of the right hon. baronet, and would be extremely glad if government would take up the question. He hoped a bill would be brought in at an early period, and fully discussed at the second reading.

The motion was withdrawn.

TITHES (IRELAND).

MARCH 20, 1835.

On the motion of Sir Henry Hardinge, that portion of the King’s Speech relating to the Tithe Question in Ireland was read, after which the right hon. baronet moved, “That the House resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House, upon the subject of tithes in Ireland.”

The House having gone into Committee, Sir Henry Hardinge moved the following resolution:—"That composition for tithes in Ireland should be abolished in consideration of an annual rent charge, to issue out of the lands heretofore subject to the payment of such composition, and to be payable to the owners of the first estate of inheritance, or other estate in the nature of a perpetual interest; that such rent-charge shall be in the proportion of £75 for every £100 of composition; that such rent-charge shall be redeemable, and that the redemption money shall be invested in land, or otherwise, for the benefit of the persons entitled to such composition. And that the arrears of tithe due in the year 1834, shall be made up from the £307,000 remaining out of £1,000,000 advanced by parliament to the clergy of Ireland in the year 1833."

SIR ROBERT PEEL trusted he could make an arrangement, that would preclude any difference of opinion. He confessed that the course which the noble lord, the member for Devonshire (Lord John Russell) had suggested, was the correct one, viz., to withhold all opposition to the present resolution—the right being reserved of discussing the whole question hereafter. He thought the House might consent to pass this resolution—the discussion being reserved till the bill was brought forward, which would render it intelligible. The House would probably agree with him in thinking the bill a necessary preliminary to the discussion. It was impossible to understand this measure from abstract resolutions; the whole ought to be before them in a comprehensive form. He thought this course would not be objected to—it being admitted that no man would be pledged by the preliminary proceeding to assent to any part of the measure to be hereafter introduced. That was the view, and he considered it a natural and just view, which was taken by the right hon. baronet. In order to prove to the House, that by assenting to these resolutions, it would not in the slightest degree lend itself to the measure that was to follow, he need only refer to the resolution which was moved in the early part of last year. That resolution was the foundation of a bill, and many assented to the resolution who intended to object to the bill. In the division, the numbers were 219 to 42, the resolution being carried. It was considered by the House, not that agreeing to the resolution was a prejudging of the question, but that in assenting to the resolution the means were afforded of obtaining the bill. The resolution was as follows:—"That it is the opinion of this committee, that composition for tithes in Ireland should be abolished, in consideration of an annual rent-charge, to issue out of the lands heretofore subject to the payment of such composition, and to be payable to the owner of the first estate of inheritance, or other estate in the nature of a perpetual interest; that such rent-charge shall be in the proportion of £75 for every £100 of composition; that such rent-charge shall be redeemable, and that the redemption money shall be invested in land, or otherwise, for the benefit of the persons entitled to such composition." That resolution was affirmed without opposition. He had always most anxiously endeavoured to avoid calling on the House to pledge itself irrevocably to any measure, without having given it the fullest consideration—more particularly if the motion related to the disposal of the public money; and if the House should be of opinion, that in assenting to the proposition which had been made, it in the slightest degree fettered itself, he certainly would not ask it to do so. He did not apprehend, however, that by assenting to the resolutions the House would at all preclude itself from objecting to the measure.

Mr. Warburton said, that at any stage of the bill they might go into committee, for the purpose of making this grant of money, if it were considered expedient.

Sir Robert Peel said, there would be no difficulty, at all events. He must admit that he did not think it would be fair, without having given notice, to call on the House to affirm to-night that portion of the resolutions excepted to, if doing so would have the effect apprehended; but having made this remark, he should like to have the opportunity of considering the point with reference to the precedents that existed. Perhaps he might find, that a separate bill might be brought in after the resolution was agreed to. He begged to ask, however, whether it would not be for the convenience of the House, that the whole measure, in as perfect a form as possible, should be before it prior to entering on the discussion. He wished now to address a few words to the House on the present condition of Ireland. Though many gentlemen, who were in the last parliament, were conversant with the details;

yet he thought it was an error which they often fell into to assume, that the information of hon. gentlemen was perfect on the subject. But there were many who were now listening to this dry discussion for the first time, and probably they were not very well aware of the present state of the question. If ever there was a question that was difficult of adjustment in a manner consistent with equitable principles, it was this question. In a great part of the south of Ireland, there was a practical suspension of the collection of tithes. Attempts had been made, in some instances, to collect them, but those attempts met with resistance; and such were the patient endurance and forbearance of the clergy, that they rather submitted to see their families subjected to the utmost privations, than avail themselves of their legal rights, and enforce their legal demands. About three years since, the sum of £60,000 was advanced to the Protestant clergy in Ireland; and it was provided, that those who chose to avail themselves of an advance out of that sum of £60,000 should be entitled to it, and the government should have a claim to the recovery of the tithe. Subsequently an attempt was made on the part of the government to levy that tithe; indeed repeated efforts were made, both by legal process, and by employing the military, to recover it; but it was found that the expense of the recovery was almost as great—he believed it was even greater—than the sum actually recovered from the occupying tenants. The consequence was, that the noble lord, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer issued a notice, stating that no further attempts to recover the tithe would be made. That might be a wise measure, or it might be unwise; but he begged the House to consider what was likely to be the effect produced on the occupying tenantry when the government, having the right and the power—having the whole force of the country at its disposal—intimated, that though the law had been violated, and was still set at defiance, no further attempts were to be made to vindicate it. The sum of one million was then granted for the purpose of providing for the arrears of tithes. The clergy were enabled to prefer their claim and receive a proportionate advance out of the million. Several did avail themselves of that grant, and received large sums, amounting on the whole to nearly £630,000. This amount was distributed amongst both the ecclesiastical and lay holders of tithes, and the provision made thereupon was this:—As they received advances of their tithes, they were to be liable to quinquennial repayments. The time had now arrived for the repayment of the instalment. In this state of affairs, what should the legislature do? The sum was had according to the letter of the law, but by the same law an equivalent at least was due from the occupying tenant to the clergy. Time pressed. If they required repayment, they must give the aid of a military force, if necessary, in aid of the civil power. [“No, no!”] What, then, would they give the civil power without the military? [“No, no!”] No—they would not give either the military or the civil power to enforce a legal claim, and how then could they be guilty of the gross injustice of saying to the clergy—“We, who were entitled to this sum of £60,000, and having attempted to recover it, failed in so doing—we, who know that you have not the power to recover what is due to you—we tell you that we will not give you the aid of a military force, nor even that of the civil power, but nevertheless demand of you, powerless and reduced to beggary as you are—we demand of you, without giving you any assistance in enforcing your legal claim, the repayment of the sum we have advanced.” Why was the whole evil of pursuing such a course limited to the injustice to the individuals? Was the executive government to stand by and see laws in the one case violated, and in the other strictly enforced, and this as regarded parties between whom no difference ought to be recognised? Was the government to stand by and see the laws trampled on, and then say it would not alter those laws? Was it to see the daily violation of them without even an attempt at improvement? They might postpone the resolution for a few days, but the question to which they must arrive was this—Would they relieve the clergy from the demand upon them, or enable them to recover an equivalent sum from the occupying tenant? Could they, with justice, impose the arrears as a rent-charge on the landlord? They could not charge on him not only an equivalent for the future payment of tithes, but for the arrears also. He doubted that they could pass any law that could, in justice, impose such a burden on the landed proprietor. Independent of the equity view, there would be such legal difficulties in the way of the application of the principle, that he doubted if they could enforce it. Then, would they remit the sum in question altogether, as a peace-offering to Ireland, as a boon, not to the clergy, but entirely to the occupying tenantry? Would they remit that instalment altogether, or take one of these courses—impose the obligation on the landlord, or on the tenant? The hon. gentleman was probably about to suggest, that there was another fund out of which it might be paid—namely, that fund in the hands of the Ecclesiastical corporation, and generally called the perpetuity purchase fund. The revenues of the Ecclesiastical corporation were derived from two sources; the first the holders of Bishops' leases, and the other was derived from the revenues of suppressed bishoprics, and the taxation of existing bishoprics. Before the House came to a decision on the subject, it would be necessary that it should call for an exact amount of the proceeds in the hands of the ecclesiastical corporation from the two sources he had mentioned. He believed it would be found, that more fallacious estimates than those they had heard of as to the amount of this property had never been framed. At present, all he knew was this, that sums had been borrowed from the treasury, and that the fund was at present greatly in debt. The annual charges on that fund it was here necessary to explain. Two years since the land of Ireland was relieved from the Church-rates. The charges of providing for the support of the fabric of the Church, and for making a provision for the decent performance of divine worship, then were transferred to the fund of which he was speaking. At the present moment the income was as follows:—revenues of sees of bishoprics suppressed, £41,000; tax on future prelates, £3,266. But it was not necessary, perhaps, for him to go into the detail. The result would be, that with a present income amounting to about £40,000 per annum, there would be charges to the amount of £70,000. Surely the first charge on that fund ought to be the provision for the performance of divine worship. The first motion, then, which ought to be made, was for an exact account of that fund; and the House would then find how impossible it was to charge that fund with any repayment on account of advances made to the Irish Protestant clergy. The result to which he came was, that it was wise, and that it was just also, to remit on the part of the public the claim on the clergy or repayment of their advances. The next question which would arise would be what course they were to pursue with respect to the arrears of the last year. As the right hon. gentleman had said, if they remitted their claim for the past arrears, that settled the question; if they established a rent-charge on the land, that settled the question as to the future; but what were they to do with the arrears of the intermediate time—of the year 1834? If they adopted the course proposed by his right hon. friend, there would be an end to tithe composition altogether; that was to say, the occupying tenant would be relieved. To that course they must, in his opinion, come; they must, for the sake of peace, relieve him; and the question was, would they leave him subject to a demand for arrears?—would they vitiate the whole proceeding, and render it incomplete, by imposing on the government the necessity of relying for the arrears on the civil power, or on military aid? He believed the House would not do that; it would not impose on the government the painful alternative of seeing the law violated, or having it enforced by the military. If they took that alternative, some provision must be made for the arrears of 1834. Could any better course be pursued, having under the million act a surplus of £360,000, than that of applying the surplus exactly on the principle on which it was applied in 1831, 1832, and 1833—that of making advances out of it to the clergy, not for their benefit but for the benefit of the occupying tenant? If they took that course, it would be intelligible, and the consequence would be the exemption of the occupying tenant from every thing in the form of a direct payment to the Protestant clergy. He believed, that whatever differences existed between hon. gentlemen on other matters, there were principles with respect to which there was no difference. One was, that the existing interests of the clergy ought to be protected, or at least some mode of equitable adjustment adopted, so that they did not suffer by the very forbearance they had exhibited, which ought only to give them an additional claim on the liberality of the House—that was one principle; and the other was, that the land of Ireland was subject by law to payments on account of tithe. No matter what diversity of opinion existed as to its ultimate appropriation, no reason whatever had been urged against an equitable adjustment of the claims of the clergy and the leaving of the land of Ireland subject to tithe. Even those who contended in favour of the powers of parliament to appropriate to secular purposes the property of the Church—even they claimed not for the landed proprietor the right of exemption from tithe. What his right hon. friend proposed was this, that whereas the whole land of Ireland was at present subject to tithe composition, by a law to be passed, the right to demand tithe should be at an end; and over the whole of Ireland, partly by arrangement, and partly by compulsion, composition should be established in lieu. He proposed further, that for every £100 of that tithe composition (excepting in cases of tenants at will, and in cases of leases fallen in since 1832) now payable by the occupying tenant, seventy-five per cent should be paid by the head landlord of Ireland, leaving him to recover from those who held under him. This was the proposition made by his right hon. friend. He proposed a compulsory composition on the part of the landed proprietor, on the principle that was recommended by the hon. and learned gentleman opposite (Mr. O'Connell), last year. The hon. and learned gentleman then gave it as his opinion, that they had no choice; that compulsory composition was their only alternative. This took place in the month of July; and it would probably be in the recollection of the House, that the ground on which he opposed the bill then introduced was, that at so advanced a period of the session, there was not a possibility of making the landed gentlemen of Ireland acquainted with its details. The hon. and learned gentleman seemed to doubt his statement. [Mr. O'Connell: The bill was not mine.] Although it might not be the hon. and learned gentleman's bill, yet it was a suggestion which fell from him when the subject was under debate. He recollected saying at that time, that if the Irish members present could undertake for the landlords to say, that it would be considered equitable by them, he should be greatly disposed to listen to it. It was impossible to make a settlement of this sort without meeting with a thousand difficulties. He knew it was a very difficult subject, but when he saw the manner in which it was treated in Ireland, particularly in the south of Ireland—when he recollected, that the population were Roman Catholics, he could not find any alternative. He hoped the hon. members from Ireland would agree to it, because without their consent he was quite sure there would be great difficulty in carrying the measure. A remission of twenty-five per cent, and relieving the tenantry from the obligation of paying tithes, ought in the present state of things to be favourably received; and he did hope, that the hon. Irish members of that House would lend their aid, not only as members of parliament, but as friends of the landlords, and as friends of Ireland, to this measure, which appeared to afford the only hope of a fair and equitable adjustment. Those, then, were the principles of his right hon. friend's proposal—to remit the sum due on account of past advances, to apply the balance of about £360,000 in part to meet the claims of the clergy, for it would only be in part—to put an end altogether to the demand of tithe composition, or any immediate demand on the part of the government or the clergy, on account of arrears of tithes—and for the future to impose an equivalent for tithes in the shape of a rent charge on the land, to be paid by the landed proprietor, and to be recovered by him in the shape of rent. That was the principle, and after the most mature consideration his opinion was, that no more preferable course could possibly be adopted. He admitted to the noble lord (Lord Howick) that no progress ought to be made with the measure until the question with respect to the appropriation of Church property was brought before the House. That he believed was to come on for discussion on Monday, the 30th; and, however pressing the necessity for some prompt step with respect to tithes, yet it could not be so pressing as to render it necessary to decide the question even upon the principle of the measure, until the other most important subject to which he had adverted had been brought forward, and he was quite confident that his right hon. friend would not press it before. He did also hope, that before the House involved itself in any precipitate resolution with respect to the appropriation of Church property in Ireland, it would ascertain whether or not there was any surplus after providing for the wants of the Protestant Church, and before it came to any speculative conclusion upon the subject; and that only an absolute necessity would prevent hon. members from coming to a conclusion favourable to the proposition now before them.

Mr. Charles Wood wished to know whether he understood the right hon. baronet rightly, that the second resolution would not be pressed, and that the first only would be put pro formâ, in order to enable the government to bring in the bill?

Sir Robert Peel said, he did not mean to call on the House without notice to affirm to-night the resolution, to the effect that the sum of £630,000 should be remitted, and the £340,000 remaining of the £1,000,000 should go to make up the arrears due to the clergy last year. Certainly he did not mean to abandon it, considering it, in fact, essential to the success of the whole measure, and therefore, although he should not press it now, he should take some other opportunity of calling on the House to affirm that proposition.

Mr. Hume could not conceive how men of honour could contend, in one year, for principles the most plain and intelligible, and in the next, without any change of circumstances, maintain the direct contrary. As, according to the forms of parliament, he could not move an adjournment, he begged leave to move that the chairman do report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Sir Robert Peel said, he should certainly take the sense of the House upon the first of the resolutions for the purpose of obtaining in that form permission to bring in the bill which his right hon. and gallant friend sought to introduce. By the affirmation of that resolution, the House would have an opportunity afforded it of comparing the measure of the last year and of the present, and of judging between them. By voting for that resolution, no hon. member would be in the least degree committed to the principle of the bill; and as to the second point to which attention had been so emphatically called, it was only necessary for him to observe, that if any gentleman complained of being taken by surprise, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) should feel no shame in giving way, in order to accommodate himself in that respect to the feelings of members, and to remove the slightest shadow of ground for disapprobation. Before he sat down, it was necessary that he should ask one question of the hon. member for Middlesex. "Does the hon. member (said the Chancellor of the Exchequer) mean to say, that my conduct in reference to this question was not that of a man of honour?"

Mr. Hume: I said, had I been in the situation of the right hon. baronet, I should not have acted as he has done. According to my idea of a man of honour, he should not take up and support a measure of which, in similar circumstances, he had been the strenuous opponent.

Sir Robert Peel: Does the hon. member mean to say that I have acted in a manner inconsistent with the character of a man of honour? He knows the nature of the question—he knows the course I took on the former occasion—that which I have pursued on the present, is of course before him. Does he mean to say, that I have acted in a manner inconsistent with the character of a man of honour? Does he mean to apply the language he has used to me?

Mr. Hume: I have no hesitation in saying that as a political man, I should not have adopted the same conduct as that of the right hon. baronet.

Sir Robert Peel: I do not want a hypothetical answer, I put a plain question to the hon. member for Middlesex.

Mr. Cutlar Fergusson rose to order. He was sure that no reflection was intended to be cast upon the character of the right hon. baronet.

In reply to Mr. Ward—

Sir Robert Peel replied: I have already distinctly stated that I cannot expect that any hon. gentleman should, by permitting the resolutions to pass, be deprived of the power of amending in any part, or altering altogether, the bill which my right hon. and gallant friend will introduce to the notice of the House. The resolutions merely embody the views of his Majesty's government with respect to the measure which it is our intention to submit to the consideration of parliament. I would beg to remind the House, that a resolution of an exactly similar nature to that now proposed was submitted to the House at the commencement of the last session, upon the division on which occasion the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Littleton) was teller. Surely, then, it is equally unfair to debar us from submitting these resolutions as the groundwork of the measure which it is our intention to bring forward, as it would be to deprive any hon. member of the power of considering and determining upon the bill when introduced, simply because he now assented to the passing of those resolutions.

Later in the evening, Sir R. Peel said, that if he felt that the course which he had proposed to pursue was inconsistent with the practice of the House, or with common sense, not all the taunts with which he had been met on former occasions, would prevent him from altering it; but, feeling, as he did, that the course which he had adopted was consistent with justice and with the usage of parliament, he cared not for the consequences, and would persevere in that course. All he would ask was, the indulgence of the House in that stage of the debate, while he stated the grounds on which he determined to pursue that course. He had always understood, that, in matters relating to religion, it was necessary that any measure should be first introduced in a committee of the whole House, and not in the shape of a bill. In the Journals, amongst the rules by which the House was bound, he found this:—"That no bill relating to religion, or to the altering of any matter relating to religion, shall be introduced into the House until it shall, in the first instance, have been introduced in the shape of a resolution to a committee of the whole House." Now, his right hon. friend (Sir H. Hardinge) had acted in strict conformity with that rule, and well he knew that if they (the government) had deviated from that rule—if they had avoided the details of their plan, and come forward in the more short way of a bill, well did he know that they would have been told of their deviation from the usual practice of the House, and told by none more loudly than by the right hon. gentleman (Mr. S. Rice) opposite. They would have been asked, "Why don't you go, in the first instance, to a committee of the whole House? Why don't you adhere to the usual form of giving the details of your intended measure in a committee of the whole House, and of embodying your principle in a resolution on which you may afterwards found your bill?" And if (continued the right hon. baronet) we should say we were afraid of introducing a resolution, the adoption of which might seem to pledge the House to some subsequent measure, the right hon. gentleman (Mr. S. Rice) would at once hold up this volume (one of the Journals) and say, "See how different the case was under the administration of Lord Grey. The government, then, did not content themselves with introducing a bill for an important measure in the first instance. They went to a committee of the whole House, and having detailed the nature of the measure which was ultimately intended to be brought before the House, they moved a resolution on which to found that bill, and that resolution was to this effect:—'Resolved, that it is the opinion of this House, that composition for tithes in Ireland be abolished on or after the 1st day of November, in the present year, in consideration of an annual land-tax to be granted to his Majesty, payable by the persons who would have been liable to such composition for tithes, and of equal amount. That such land-tax shall be redeemable, and that out of the produce provision be made, in land or money, for the indemnification of the persons entitled to such composition.'" The right hon. gentleman would have gone on, and told us how such a proposition was received in the House—that it was carried by an overwhelming majority, and that Mr. Spring Rice was one of the tellers for the "ayes" in that majority. But what said the right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. P. Thomson) as to a resolution of this kind? "Why," said he, "with my opinions of the Church in Ireland, with my convictions as to the appropriation of Church property, I cannot consent to such a preliminary resolution as you have proposed, because I cannot consent to have my hands tied up." Might he (Sir R. Peel) ask the right hon. gentleman when his views as to the Church were taken up? Surely it could not have been since the last session. His opinion must have been of some years' standing, when he must have anticipated that the time would come when appropriation would be considered in some shape. It must have been some time before last year. How, then, did the right hon. gentleman assent to the resolution brought by his friends in the last session? But if the right hon. gentleman did not then think that things would be so altered, and could, with a safe conscience, have given assent to such a proposition as he had read, to deal with the Church property, how did it happen that any conscientious scruple prevented him from giving a vote much more limited in its extent on the present occasion? If he felt no scruples on that occasion, why should he feel any on the present? "Oh, but," said the right hon. gentleman, "you had a money vote on this occasion, but you withdrew it." Well, his answer was, "You had no money vote last year, and, according to your own showing, no necessity for a committee of the whole House, and yet you voted and adopted the proposed resolution. The objection applies with equal force to the committee of last year and to that of the present." It had been suggested from a quarter for which he had the highest respect, that one part of the resolution which spoke of the investment of the rent-charge, or the produce of the rent-charge in land, or otherwise, might have well been omitted. He was sorry that his sense of duty did not admit of his adopting that suggestion; but the use of those words was meant only to detail to the House what were the views and intentions of government. If they (the government) had withdrawn that part, that the produce of the rent-charge was to be so invested, then they would have been open to the charge of having acted unfairly. He could have withdrawn it only as implying a pledge on that point; but would not the implication be fair that those parts which remained of the resolution were meant to be binding? Supposing the part objected to were withdrawn, they would have still left those words, "that composition of tithe be abolished, and that a rent-charge be substituted;" well, then, the committee, by affirming those words, would affirm—first, that the composition of tithes should be abolished—next, that in lieu of it there should be a rent-charge—next, that this rent-charge should be paid by the landowner—then, that it should be paid at the rate of £75 for every £100 of composition—and next, that it should be redeemable. Now, did any man believe, that he was bound to all these propositions by his assent to the resolutions of his right hon. and gallant friend? The House, however, by adopting these resolutions, would not want the future opportunity of altering the scale of redemption from seventy to eighty per cent, or to any immediate scale which, in its judgment, the House might think fit to adopt. These words had been inserted in order that the whole proposition of his Majesty's government might be fully before the House; if any of these terms had been omitted, it might have been said, that the resolutions were contrary to the manifest intentions of the House in respect to the remainder, and therefore would imply some pledge on the part of the House. On the whole, he must adhere to the resolutions, as they now stood indicative of the intentions and views of his Majesty's government. So far from binding the House to the measure to be introduced, he must state this fact; that a bill, referring to this same subject of tithes in Ireland, was introduced by the right hon. gentleman, the member for Staffordshire (Mr. Littleton)—a bill subsequently altered by himself—a bill which differed from that submitted to the House by the noble lord, the member for North Lancashire—a bill which had been subsequently altered by the hon. and learned member for Dublin—altered from the principle of the resolutions on which they were founded; and yet, so little did the then House of Commons feel itself bound by its acquiescence in those resolutions, that the very same House, which agreed to them in their original form, completely altered their tenor and effect, and assented, by a majority, to the change. Now, he would ask, with these facts before the House, whether or not, if he pursued a different course on the present occasion, he should stand in a very different position from that which he now held, supported as he was by precedents—precedents, as he would show, of no slight authority. If he had no other appeal to make, he would appeal to the authority evinced by the fact, that, as soon as his right hon. friend had sat down, the noble lord opposite, who acted as the leader of the party opposed to his Majesty's government, expressed an opinion entirely in concurrence with the view of the subject held by his (Sir R. Peel's) right hon. friend, the Secretary for Ireland; and so far was he from feeling himself bound by the resolutions now proposed, so little did he consider the obligation that they were binding, that the noble lord, the leader of the party to which he had alluded, did not hesitate to say, that he would not for a moment present the smallest obstacle to the introduction of the bill which was intended as the result of the present resolutions. Moreover, his right hon. friend, the late Secretary for Ireland, so entirely concurred in the terms of the resolution as to declare, that he should vote for the resolutions, under the protest that he was not to be bound by them. In this protestation he believed that many other hon. members would concur with the noble lord and the right hon. gentleman, and would feel that they were not bound by the resolutions, but would give their assent to them, combining, as they did, all the good sense, the precedents, and the practice, of former governments. With these authorities in his favour, he felt he should take a course inconsistent with the practice and precedents to which he had alluded, inconsistent with his duty as a member of the House and as a minister of the Crown, if he consented to any modification of the proposed resolutions.

Mr. Spring Rice entreated his hon. friend (Mr. Hume) to withdraw his amendment, and allow him to substitute an amendment containing these words:—"That it is expedient to alter and amend the laws respecting tithes in Ireland."

Mr. Hume said, he had no objection to withdraw his amendment, especially after what had occurred, and he therefore bowed to the suggestion of the right hon. member for Cambridge.

The committee divided on Mr. Rice's amendment:—Ayes, 198; Noes, 213; majority, 15.

MARCH 23, 1835.

Lord John Russell begged to put a question to the right hon. baronet, as to the course he meant to follow in bringing up the report on the resolution which had been agreed to the other night, on the subject of tithes in Ireland. He hoped that the right hon. baronet would not object, for the convenience of all parties, to its being brought forward as a substantive motion.

SIR ROBERT PEEL was very sorry to observe that the practice was increasing every week, to take the supply days for motions. The time of the House was absorbed with discussions, leaving no day for the transaction of the public business. Still he was very much indisposed to take any course which might be against the general feeling of the House. As far as the day was concerned on which the motion was to be brought forward, the noble lord having given notice of it very early in the session, and as he might insist on his right, an extreme right, which on public considerations might be productive of inconvenience, and especially as, in consequence of the order for the call of the House, many hon. members must have made their arrangements to meet it, he (Sir R. Peel) would oppose no obstacle to the noble lord in bringing forward his motion on Monday. With respect, however, to the mode of bringing it on, he should certainly reserve to himself any advantage which he possessed. But if there was an understanding on the part of the House, that the bill founded on the resolution should not be read a second time till the question of appropriation was disposed of, could there be any objection, not being committed by the resolution, to permit the bill now to be introduced? The bill was of the utmost importance. Under present circumstances it was the law of the land that the clergy should repay the instalments of the £1,000,000, and it was the duty of government to enforce the demand in conformity with the law. But the clergy replied, "Although you have a claim on me, I have a claim on another party—the occupying tenant—founded in law; enable me to enforce my claims and recover my rights, and then I will repay you." Now, it was a very inconvenient thing for government to take upon itself a discretionary power, and discharge those payments which they were called on by the law to enforce. He, therefore, hoped the House would not interpose any obstacle in the way of the introduction of the bill; the most convenient course would be to permit the resolution to be brought up now, and the bill, so far as it could be founded on it, to be introduced, on the understanding that they should not proceed to the second reading, when discussions on its principle might take place, till after Monday next.

Lord John Russell had no objection to that course. Many gentlemen, however, could not consent to the report without expressing their opinions with regard to it.

The report was brought up and read.

In reply to Mr. Gisborne,

Sir Robert Peel said, that if the House affirmed the resolutions his right hon. friend the Secretary for Ireland would be enabled to bring in the bill, with the clauses respecting the non-payment of the instalments due at present by the clergy to the treasury, and remission of that amount, together with the apportionment of the residue of the million, £370,000. If the resolutions were not passed, the bill would have no groundwork. The instalments were now due from the clergy, and the treasury would be obliged to enforce the payment if there was any suspension of the resolutions. He, therefore, thought the best course the House could take was to allow the resolution to pass. By the standing orders, no money could be granted out of committee, and to grant it in committee there was due and proper notice required. All the forms in the present instance had been complied with, and, therefore, he should suggest to the House to permit the resolution to pass. On Wednesday or Thursday the bill could be introduced in its complete shape, and printed for the use of hon. members.

Mr. Gisborne suggested that it would be better for the right hon. baronet to move for leave to bring in a bill, and withdraw his resolution, giving notice of a resolution relating to the money clauses.

Sir Robert Peel said, that if the objection adverted to by the last speaker were taken, he should not persevere in offering to it any opposition. He had only further to observe, that one of the reasons which determined him to proceed by resolution was, that he had not given notice of his intention to introduce a bill, and he thought the resolution would best serve the purposes of a notice. Besides that, there was nothing in the resolution which did not admit of being reconsidered, and there would be time enough for that purpose between that and the 30th of March. He was anxious, he confessed, to have the bill introduced, and in the hands of members, for it could not but be satisfactory to them, as it would be to him, that they should be made fully aware of its provisions. It was, he assured the House, by no means a matter of choice that led ministers to adopt that additional stage in the proceedings. There could be no natural love on the part of government to additional stages, but he was sure the House would agree with him, that looking to past precedents, and especially to that established in the case of the measure introduced by Lord Althorp—he meant the Irish Church Temporalities bill—it would have been impossible for him to have done otherwise than propose a resolution in a committee of the whole House. Lord Althorp's bill, as every hon. member must recollect, had its origin in a resolution of a committee of the whole House. Influenced, then, by such considerations, he felt that he could not depart from the course which he had originally prescribed to himself—a course perfectly in accordance with the usages of parliament, and as he conceived with the obvious convenience of the House, as well as of individual members.

In the discussion which followed, very strong and personal remarks were exchanged between Sir Henry Hardinge and Mr. Barron. The speaker having demanded and obtained the necessary apologies,—

Sir Robert Peel: After the course which this debate has taken, notwithstanding, at a previous period of the evening, questions were put to me to which I gave answers, not expecting that any discussion would ensue, but taking it for granted that we should come to an early decision on the subject, and that the public and political conduct of government would not be called in question, the House will probably not insist on the rigid rule of order, and preclude me, because I then spoke, from making a few observations on what has fallen from the hon. and gallant member for Westminster. I understood the hon. and gallant member in the latter part of his speech to declare, that while he asserted his right to condemn in as strong terms as he pleased the public conduct of ministers, he by no means intended to indulge in any personal or offensive allusions to them. Now, sir, although I think that if, in the heat of debate, expressions should be used reflecting on the honour of any individual member, it is highly proper, for the satisfaction of the persons using such expressions, as well as for the satisfaction of the persons towards whom they are used, and for the satisfaction of the House, that an opportunity should be given for disclaiming all intention of offence. I, at the same time, fully admit the right of any member of this House to question, to the fullest extent, the conduct of members of his Majesty's government as public men. I now speak, then, with reference to the construction which I believe the hon. and gallant member put upon his own words. I am sure that he would not—his character is too well established—go as close to the wind as possible for the purpose of indirectly conveying a personal imputation. I therefore do the hon. and gallant officer the justice of believing that, strong as his expressions were, they were directed against the public, and not against the personal character of those whom he assailed. Having stated this, I come to the point. It is certainly of great importance to a public man to have an opportunity of vindicating with calmness the course which his sense of public duty has prescribed to him. I do confidently assert, then, that I do not think that the charges which the hon. and gallant officer has brought against me as a public man, have the slightest shadow of foundation. Whether or not I undertook to discharge the duties of the office which I have the honour to hold from motives of ambition, from the love of power, or for the sake of anything that power can give, is a question which I will leave entirely untouched—it is a question which the House will decide as it may think fit. But I come to that much more important question, whether if, in the course which I have taken while I have been engaged in the discharge of those duties, I have done anything that should justly subject me to the charges which the hon. and gallant officer has advanced against me? But, first, I will advert to some of the observations which were made by the hon. member for Waterford. That hon. member referred to certain expressions which he said, I used last year, indicating my opinion of the danger and inexpediency of applying to the public purse to solve difficulties in the administration of government. Sir, I did use those expressions. For I felt, when it was first proposed to advance a million to the Protestant clergy of Ireland, that there was no probability that the money would ever be returned. The hon. member for Waterford says, that I advised the advance of that million. That was not the case. I advised the enforcing of the law. The enforcing of the law has been tried; and it has been found impracticable to collect the tithes. Under such circumstances, does the hon. member for Waterford think it inconsistent with our public duty to advise the giving up of the million, rather than the adoption of a course which would involve the certainty of many scenes such as that which recently occurred. I did not advise the advance, because I thought it would never be repaid. The advance was made; and now, when I find that it cannot be repaid, what shadow of inconsistency is there in my advising that the demand for the repayment should be remitted? I now come to the hon. and gallant member for Westminster. He says, our days are numbered. He says, that we have given so little satisfaction to the country, that we have shown so little a modicum of reform, that public opinion must declare against us. Now, how does the hon. and gallant officer reconcile this with his other charge, that we have adopted all the principles of our predecessors?

Colonel Evans said, that he had never charged this government with adopting every principle of the preceding government; quite the reverse. He had never thought that the Dissenters' Bill, even when brought in by the late government, was a measure of reform for which they could claim any great merit.

Sir Robert Peel: The charge, then, of the hon. and gallant member against me, amounts to this:—"The right hon. baronet always opposed the great measures of his predecessors, and he does so still." It is a strange way of charging me with inconsistency, to say, that I am pursuing the same course in office that I did when in opposition. "You oppose the liberal measures of your predecessors, you have brought in my modicum of reform," says the hon. and gallant member, "and the country therefore rejects you; your measures and politics are not sufficiently liberal for the spirit of the age, and your hours are numbered." This may be a perfectly good accusation; but how is it consistent with that other, earnestly insisted upon, that, for the sake of place, I have adopted the principles of my predecessors; that I have submitted extensive reforms to the House, for the purpose of retaining the emoluments or distinctions of office? So much for the general principles of the government. Now with respect to this particular measure, regarding tithes in Ireland. I have heard charges made against me with respect to the course I have pursued on the question of commutation of tithes in Ireland, which can only be founded in utter ignorance—for I should rather attribute them to ignorance than intentional misrepresentation—of what my conduct really has been on that question. How stand the facts? A bill was brought into this House at an early period of last session, by the late government, providing for the arrangement of the Tithe question. That bill imposed, in the first instance, a land-tax, which was to endure for five years, at the end of which period it was to be laid upon the landlord as a rent-charge: that rent-charge was redeemable, and the redemption money was to be invested in land. The amount, the payment of which by that bill was imposed upon the landlord, was, I believe, 77½ per cent. of the tithe. That bill I supported. The right hon. gentleman, the late Secretary for Ireland, will acknowledge that he had support in the passing of that bill. I come into power; I bring in a bill in my turn for the settlement of the Irish Tithe question; and what are its principles? It imposes the payment of 75 per cent. upon the landlord immediately; it provides for the redemption of the rent-charge so imposed; for the investment of the money thus realized in land; and that tithe-property shall be strictly reserved for ecclesiastical purposes. Now, I ask, whether it be possible, in the vicissitudes to which human affairs are subject, to suppose a case of less inconsistency, than my supporting the first measure I have described, and originating the second? The hon. gentleman may object to me if he pleases, that I do not consent to devote ecclesiastical property to secular purposes; that I place a rent-charge upon landlords, and other things; but if he looks to the bill brought in by the late government, to the principle of which I did not object, I defy him to show that there is any inconsistency in my submitting the present measure to parliament. But throughout the whole of this discussion, the original bill brought in by the late government has been confounded with the measure which subsequently received the assent of this House. It may be said that I opposed the latter; some hon. gentlemen may suppose that I was a party to some organized plan in the House of Lords to throw it out. Sir, the House of Lords determined on their own course, and I was no party to any combination in that House. I saw the bill modified by the hon. and learned member for Dublin; I saw the government oppose his modifications; but he was successful in making them, and the government afterwards permitted it to pass. What was the language I then held? I place full confidence in the declarations made of absence of intention to give me personal offence, but the charges against my political character are serious, and it is politically that I propose to select them. On the 30th of July, the day referred to by the hon. member for Waterford, I said that "I felt great objection to ever attempting to decide upon such an important question at that extremely late period of the session. It cannot be denied that the good-will of the landlords is most essential; and unless the legislature have their good-will, it will be impossible to make the alteration a benefit. For the change to be efficacious, too, the provision must be compulsory; and then comes the question, how can we, with justice or with propriety, impose such a responsibility on the landlord, without giving him any notice of our intentions? I do not believe that there are at present a sufficient number of Irish landlords in the metropolis to form a fair representation of the general feeling of that body. I throw out these remarks merely as suggestions; but if the proposition be resolved upon, something must, in justice to the landlords, be done by government with reference to the arrears. There has now been two years of intermission in the collection of tithes in Ireland; and, however the question may now be shrunk from, the time must come when the law must be vindicated." A little lower down comes the sentence referred to by the hon. member. I then said, "I decidedly think that it is for the benefit of all parties concerned, that the landlord should take upon himself the payment of tithe, to the release of the occupying tenant; but I would also take good care to encourage, as much as possible, the principle of redemption. That appears to me the just, and best, or only way, of really settling the question. I do not think, however, after the session we have had, we can hope to consider with any good effect, a bill for such an object in the month of August. At present, the vindication of the law ought to be the first object; and when we have taught persons who have refused a legal payment, that the law is paramount, then we may well call upon the landlord to take the post which would at once be beneficial to the community and himself. At the same time, I must say, that I despair of the question being settled satisfactorily, by any scheme in which redemption is not included; and still more do I despair of being able to come to any settlement of the question, while the great majority of Irish landlords are out of town." These were the expressions I made use of, not objecting to the original bill, but to the principle of the bill, as modified by the hon. and learned member for Dublin. Now, I appeal to the hon. and gallant gentleman to say, whether, in submitting to parliament a measure I like, that forms a valid ground for charging me with inconsistency. So much for the question of tithe. With respect to the other measures—but really, Sir, I do not think I ought now to trouble the House with any detail respecting other measures. I shall reserve what I have to say in my defence respecting them, when they come before us. I will only at present observe, with respect to the Dissenters' Marriage bill, that I did not object to the principle of the bill brought forward by the noble lord, the member for Devon. Its principle I therefore adopted; but was it not my duty, as a minister of the crown, to attempt to make the bill as satisfactory in its details as I could, consulting the feelings of the Dissenters, as far as was consistent with the interests of the Church. I ask hon. gentlemen not to deal in vague general charges, but to tell me what is the particular measure which I, as a member of the government, have introduced, or have given notice of my intention to bring in, that is inconsistent with the course I have pursued since the meeting of the Reformed Parliament. But, Sir, I do not think myself—being the responsible minister of the crown—bound to look out for every speech I have made, in order to accommodate my course to those speeches, and relieve myself from the charge of inconsistency. Having undertaken the task, I feel it to be a public duty to look to the circumstances of the country, and abandon all minor personal considerations, in considering the measures necessary to meet those circumstances. But rather than listen to vague charges of inconsistency, and dereliction of principle, I should like to hear some specific measure stated, which justifies the charges brought against me. I am conscious that in the task I have undertaken, I am not acting with the view of gratifying personal ambition, or from any desire for the advantages or emoluments of office. I did not seek the office I hold, by any factious attempts to thwart the late government. I did not enter into an alliance with those who entertained the extreme opinion of the side of the House on which I sat. I am stating merely a fact with respect to myself, and mean no insidious reflection on any man; for I can appeal to those who are now my political opponents, for the truth of what I say, that I did not attempt to gain power, or thwart their proceedings by factious combinations with men whose opinions went beyond mine. Opportunities for so doing did present themselves; but I never took advantage of them. Looking to the circumstances which accompanied my taking office, I was determined, feeling it my duty to accept it, and having accepted it, to make every constitutional effort for maintaining myself in it, and I shall continue to do so, in spite of the charges of inconsistency which may be brought against me. Sir, I rely upon the purity of my own motives. I shall attempt to shape my course upon principles which will be likely to give most satisfaction to the country; but I never will consent to hold office one hour beyond the period when I think I can hold it consistently with the interests of the crown, and with the honour of a public man.

The resolution was read a second time, and agreed to.

COMMUTATION OF TITHES, (ENGLAND).

MARCH 24, 1835.

On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that part of his Majesty's Speech, recommending the commutation of tithes in England and Wales, was read, and on his motion the House resolved itself into a Committee to take it into consideration.

SIR ROBERT PEELE then proceeded to state that he was about to call the attention of the committee to a matter of not mere party consideration, but involving considerations of much general importance, attended by great complexity of details, and affecting to a considerable extent the interests of the community at large. He was about to submit to the consideration of the committee, a measure for facilitating the settlement of the tithe question in this part of his Majesty's dominions, an object, the attainment of which was equally desired by both sides of the House. If he were not to approach this question with great diffidence—as to the merits of the plan which he had to propose, and great anxiety as to its results, it would argue the greatest indifference on his part to the opinion of the House and the public, or the greatest confidence in his own powers—a confidence quite unwarranted—when the magnitude, the delicacy, and the complication of the subject were considered. It had been felt, for years, that the settlement of this question was a subject of the highest importance to the country. He was not, however, going to enter into a long detail of the history of this question, or to weary the House by a pedantic display of learning; for, looking at the litigation caused by tithes—looking at the variety of interests the subject embraced—considering the effect the levying of tithe had on cultivation, and the manner in which it operated to the discouragement of agriculture—he should take it for granted that there was nearly an unanimous feeling in the House, that a change should be made in the mode of levying tithe. At different periods, there had been different plans proposed for the accomplishment of this object; and although it was not his intention to enter into any minute dissection of the various schemes which had been submitted to the House, still it was necessary that he should take a short review of some of the latter measures proposed for this purpose. If he found that the principle or provisions of any one of those measures were preferable to those embodied in his own plan, he should not hesitate to adopt them, and to engraft them at once on the bill he intended to bring in, since it was impossible to prepare a plan for such an object without great distrust in his own powers, and great anxiety as to the probable results of the measure. In some of the former plans which were submitted to parliament, with a view to the settlement of this great question, it had been proposed that the tithes should first be valued, and that, after a valuation had been taken, a commutation for the payment of the tithe should be made in land, or by a payment in the nature of a corn-rent. Without going into the details of those plans, he apprehended that a measure based on those principles would not at present give satisfaction. If, again, he were to bring forward a measure which would recognise any principle that excluded all consideration of the forbearance of the clergyman in levying the tithe—a measure which should be founded on the abstract value of the tithe taken, solely with reference to the crop—he apprehended that the great body of the tithe-payers would protest against that mode of settling the question, and would entreat to be left in the situation in which they had been found. He believed it was generally acknowledged that in any agreement made for the composition of tithe practically, the clergyman of the Church of England exhibited much greater forbearance than the lay impropiator. He said, then, that on account of the opposition which would be offered to this principle by the payer of tithes, the insertion of such a provision would at once obstruct the success of the measure. He would next advert to the propositions on this subject submitted to the House, in the years 1833 and 1834, by a noble lord, then a member of the House, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had paid great attention to the subject—was perfectly acquainted with its details, and was deeply interested in its successful and final settlement. He had deemed it his duty to attend carefully to the provisions embodied in those plans, and if, on a comparison with his own, he considered the principles they contained better adapted to the accomplishment of the object proposed, he should have felt no hesitation in adopting them; and if Lord Althorp were now a member of this House, he should hope for his concurrence and assistance in perfecting the measure he was about to introduce. That noble lord, in the year 1833, attempted to settle the question by proposing a voluntary arrangement for the payment of tithe between the parties interested. It was intended by that measure, to give them the liberty to enter into a voluntary and amicable arrangement, which was to last for a year; but after that year had elapsed, it gave either party the power to appoint a valuator for himself, and to call on the other party to appoint one on his own behalf, and then it provided that the tithes should be valued on the basis which these valuers, so appointed, might propose. The noble lord, however, felt the difficulty that would result from this arrangement; and it was subsequently proposed, that the average payment for tithes, of the last seven years, should form the basis of composition. The bill was so far compulsory in its enactments, that it made it necessary that the actual payment of tithes, taken on the average for the last seven years, should form the unvarying basis of the measure. But the objection raised against this plan was, that there were very different degrees of forbearance or discretion—call it what they pleased—exhibited in levying tithe. In some parts of the country, and under certain circumstances, great severity had been exercised in collecting it, while in other places, and from the operation of local circumstances, or from the lenity of particular clergymen, great indulgence had been shown to the tithe-payer. There was, consequently, a very great difference between the rates of tithe paid by the tithe-payers of different places in different parts of the country. The details of this bill came under the notice of the agricultural committee, and they appeared to that committee altogether most objectionable; and the noble lord, at a subsequent period of the session, declared that in consequence of the objections made, not on the part of the tithe-owners, but of the tithe-payers, he would withdraw the compulsory part of the measure; and, afterwards abandoning the rest of the bill, the law remained unaltered. In 1834, the noble lord proposed another bill for the settlement of the same question. He openly avowed, that so little did he feel any party-considerations to be involved in this measure, so little was he prejudiced in favour of the plan which he had devised, that though he thought his measure better than that of the noble lord, if any hon. member, on reflection, considered the noble lord's plan preferable, he should be foremost to express a hope that that member would give notice of his intention to bring that measure forward again, in order that the two bills might be compared together, and that the House might be enabled to adopt that which was, on the whole, best fitted to accomplish the professed object of both. The bill of 1834, brought forward by the noble lord, was drawn with great care and attention; and the object which it contemplated was the commutation of tithe for a money payment. The bill was rather complicated in its provisions; but though the details were numerous, and the subject exceedingly dry, he must entreat the attention of the House, while he attempted to explain in what respect the principles of that measure differed from the one he meant to propose. That bill included three objects—first, the substitution of a money payment in lieu of tithe, which money payment was to bear a fixed proportion to the rent payable on the land. The bill then gave a power of redemption to the owner of the land, after the money payment was determined upon, on paying a certain number of years' (he thought twenty-five) purchase. In case that redemption did not take place, there was then a power to convert the money payment into a rent-charge, which was to be permanently settled on the land. The mode in which that was to be effected was this:—The Secretary of State had a power to appoint valuers, in districts which he had a power to constitute. He was to authorize the division of the county into certain districts, and in each of those districts to appoint a valuer of tithes and a valuer of land. That valuer, so appointed, was to fix a value upon the land in each parish within the district to which he was appointed. He was to divide the whole of the land into two classes; first into arable land, and then into that which was not arable, and which, though not pasture, he should, for the sake of being understood, call pasture land. The arable land was to be that which had been under tillage for the five preceding years. The valuer was then to ascertain the amount of the tithes which had been paid on each description of titheable land in each parish. He was not to value, but to ascertain the actual amount of tithes which had been levied during the five preceding years, and to determine what amount of tithes, so ascertained, properly attached to the land which was arable, and that which was not. These awards from each parish of the district (the values and amounts to which he had adverted having been ascertained), were to be transmitted to the quarter-sessions. Then a mean was to be selected between the amount of tithes payable for each quality of land, and an average struck of what the rate of substituted tithe was subsequently to be. This tithe-rate was to be applicable to the whole of each sort of land in the district. Supposing the mean for arable land, upon ascertaining the amount in each parish of the district, and the mean for pasture, to be 5s. and 2s. 6d. in the pound, then the proportion of rate in proportion to the amount of rent, was to attach for a certain period. From the amount of tithe, however, which had been actually paid, the amount of rates and charges was to be deducted in each case, and the actual amount of tithes, after such deduction, was to be the basis of collection of tithe payments. It appeared to him, after the most mature consideration, that there would be great obstacles in satisfactorily executing such a measure. In the first place, there was that degree of complication attending it which would make it very difficult to work it satisfactorily. In the first place, there was to be a valuation of the annual profit of the land in each parish of every particular district. Now, unless in making that valuation great care were taken, there would be very uncertain results; because he apprehended that the value of a farm or land could not be ascertained with reference merely to the quality of the land, or its productiveness; the considerations that influenced a tenant in holding the land were of some importance,—an inquiry into the state of the buildings on the land, and into many other minute par-tienlars would be necessary; and this sort of information being to be collected with respect to every acre of titheable land throughout the country, it would be almost impossible to come at perfect accuracy. The consequence could hardly fail to be, that ground would exist for innumerable remonstrances and complaints. The second difficulty which he apprehended was this:—The tithe was not to be valued by the valuer; the valuer was to determine what was the amount of the tithe for the five preceding years, and to apportion that amount of tithe to the arable land and the land not arable. The valuer, then, was to apportion the total amount of the tithe collected to the arable and pasture land in each parish. Now, he believed that great difficulty would be practically found in making that apportionment. It might be easy to determine the amount of tithe received from any given farm, but it would be very difficult for any valuer—a stranger, perhaps, to that part of the country—to determine what was the amount of the tithe which had actually, for the last five years, been paid for the portion that was pasture land, and what the amount actually paid for the portion that was arable. It should be observed, that the valuer was not to determine what amount ought to have been paid, but what had been the actual payments on account of tithe, and what the payments on account of the arable land, and what those on account of the pasture land. This, however, it was necessary to ascertain before the tithe-rate could be determined. He came now to the third difficulty. From the amount of tithe so determined, the total amount of which was to constitute the tithe-rate in each parish, the poor-rates and charges were to be deducted. But the rates and charges varied so much in different parishes, that, after having so deducted, in the case of each parish, the rates and charges, when they came to apply the invariable rate in districts, they would find that in many parishes in which the rates were low, people would be complaining of the amount of tithe fixed on them, while those in which they were high, would comparatively be greatly benefited. It appeared to him, therefore, that these were serious difficulties in detail in the way of satisfactorily carrying into execution this plan. But, suppose those objections to be obviated—suppose that the payments on account of tithe for the last five years were precisely ascertained, there would even then remain considerable difficulty. The returns were to be made to the quarter-sessions, and the district to which the tithe rate was to be applied was not to be determined with reference to the value of the land, but was to be the county district—the division in which certain justices of the peace acted. Now, it was clear that that was a totally arbitrary assumption, or division without reference to the quality of the land; and these districts included land of different qualities. Under these circumstances suppose they had valued the land accurately, the tithe-rate might have given great dissatisfaction. It was possible, that, if they spread the total amount of the tithe over the whole district, the result might have been fair to the whole body of the land-owners and the whole body of the clergy; but that was not enough. If, in any one district, the result was, to aggravate the tithe, it would be no consolation to the particular parish whose burden was so aggravated, to tell them that the balance was fairly struck, and that they would find that in a corresponding parish the tithe was proportionately small. To refer them to the more fortunate state of their neighbours would, in all probability, increase their dissatisfaction. But he very much doubted if the House could assume the general principle with respect to a large district of a fixed population, between the amount of tithe and the amount of rent; that must depend upon two considerations, which were entirely distinct from each other. The amount of the tithe was determined by the produce of the land: the amount of the rent was not determined by the actual produce of the land, but by the expense of cultivation. Let them suppose the case of one farm of a certain extent, that produced, say 100 quarters of wheat, which would sell for £300; and let them suppose that the expense of cultivation on that farm was only £200, that would leave a clear profit of £100 to remunerate the farmer, out of which the rent would be paid. Let them next take another farm, exactly equal in its extent, and which produced exactly the same quantity of corn, but the expense of the cultivation of which was £250 instead of £200. The amount of the tithe being precisely the same in both instances, the proportion which the tithe would bear to the profit would be as twenty to a hundred in the one case, and twenty to fifty in the other. It was not necessary to calculate all the propositions; the principle applied universally. It appeared to him that the principle which assumed a fixed proportion between the rent and the tithe, and applied that universally, must be subject to the objection he had just stated, and must preclude the satisfactory operation of any bill founded upon it. Let them take what districts they would, and let the quarter sessions come to what decision they might, it would be found that the value of the land depended so much on the quality and expense of cultivation, that, though the difference might not in general be so great as in the example he had quoted, still the consequence of such a plan would be to reduce the amount of the tithe in some parishes, and raise it in others—injuring some farmers, perhaps ruining them, and conferring a corresponding advantage on others. He would take a district in Sussex by way of illustration, which included soil on the north side of the Downs, and soil on the south side. There was a great disparity between the value of the land in these two divisions of the county, and also between the amount of the rent and the tithes; notwithstanding this, however, the average must be struck from the estimate of the whole value of the land and the amount of the tithes. The consequence, therefore, would be to apply a rate which would reduce the amount of the tithe raised in the parish which had the rich land, and increase it in the parish which had the poor land. The result would be exactly the opposite to that which, on the whole, was desirable. Suppose that on the light land on the north side of the Downs, the rent of which was 9s. an acre, the value of the tithe was 3s.; and suppose that on the land on the south side of the Downs the value of which was 40s. an acre, the amount of the tithe was 4s.; if they supposed that these two parishes were a fair estimate of the parishes on each side of the Downs, and if they took the whole amount of the value of the land, and the amount of the tithe payable, and struck a mean between them—if the value of the tithe were 3s. an acre, and the land were worth only 9s.—the payment would be more than 1s. 8d. in the pound; but if the tithe were 4s. an acre, and the land were worth 40s., then the payment would be only 2s. in the pound. Thus it would be found that an attempt to strike an average between the two, and apply the principle uniform throughout the district, would be to increase the amount of tithe received by the owner of the tithes in the poor parish, and to diminish the amount received by the owner of tithes in the rich parish. The result would be, that in those very parishes in which the tithes were at present not sufficient, and required an increase, they would be reduced, while in the parishes most distressed, and in which they were most onerous, they would be increased. He believed that any measure which called on parties to pay an increased amount of tithe would create so much dissatisfaction, that nothing would reconcile them to it. In fact, if the result were to increase the burden of tithes, there would be a degree of dissatisfaction which no reasoning as to the general advantages of any measure would be sufficient to allay. On account, then, of the complication of the plan, of the difficulty of applying it universally, on account of a part of it being to raise the tithe in some parishes and diminish it in others, and the dissatisfaction which he believed would be the consequence, after mature reflection—for he begged to assure the House that he was in no way prejudiced against the measure on account of the quarter from which it emanated—taking all these circumstances into consideration, he retained the opinion he expressed when the measure was originally proposed to the House. He still thought it was possible that some other plan might be suggested less apparently extensive, and less complicated, which might on the whole give more satisfaction. He had stated his reasons why the plan which he had to propose was not founded—first, on the actual valuation of tithes—secondly, on a mere reference to the average receipts for the last seven years, and thirdly, on the principle of the noble lord, who assumed a fixed proportion between rent and tithes, and applied it universally over a given district. Having excluded these three principles, the question was, on what principle could any other measure be founded? He had no hesitation in saying, that the principle which he had always considered preferable to any other was that of giving the most perfect facility and the greatest possible encouragement to the voluntary commutation of tithes. In the first place, in favour of the voluntary commutation of tithes, he would refer to a document which had been presented to the House by his right hon. friend, the member for the University of Cambridge. It was an account of the several parishes in England and Wales in which the commutation of the great and small tithe had been authorized by any act of parliament, distinguishing those cases in which allotments had been given in lieu of tithes. Before hon. gentlemen formed an opinion on this subject, it was important that they should examine this document, in which they would find an account of the number of private acts passed from 1757 to 1830. The paper was drawn up with great care, and amongst other things, specified whether land was allotted, whether there had been corn-rents or money-payments, whether the commutation was for small or great tithes or for all tithes, and also whether or not the parish to which reference was made was a parish in which there had been any new enclosure. The House would, therefore, be able to judge of the extent to which commutation had taken place in the new enclosures. It appeared that in upwards of 1,000 parishes there had been voluntary agreements, under which a commutation of tithes had been effected. Now it might be recollected that such agreements were subject to the greatest difficulties, and to a very great expense. In each of the cases there was first the labour to be undertaken of procuring a private bill, and next there was the cost of such a measure. On some of those acts a sum of not less even than £2,000 had been expended. He proposed to remove that impediment of the labour, and to put an end to the expense; having done which, he could not help thinking that great inducements would exist for the establishment of voluntary commutation; and he believed that a great progress would speedily be made in carrying it into effect. Taking into consideration the facts, that in some parishes a modus had been adopted, that in some there were small tithes, and in others great tithes; that in some there were three or four parties entitled to the tithes, such as the vicar, the rector, and the lay impropriator, each entitled to his share—considering all these circumstances, he was afraid it would be difficult to lay down a general rule by which any party having to arbitrate between these different claimants, could decide at all satisfactorily what was due to each. Then what was the rule that he would lay down? He proposed to call in aid the principles of justice, he proposed to enable parties to determine the question for themselves; and the rule if universally applied might preclude the necessity of application to the law. The rule he would recommend was that of local knowledge, a sense of common interest, a desire to effect a settlement, a disposition to remove all difficulties, and to get rid of the expenses. Such a rule was applicable to all the different circumstances of various parishes, and he thought would succeed better than any other. It would give great encouragement to commutation; but would facilitate it on a new principle. He must, however, explain some of the means by which he proposed to assist in effecting this object. In the first place, he proposed, if the legislature would sanction it, a commission of persons, who should superintend the whole, and the smaller the number of persons who should compose the commission the better; and that the commissioners should have the power of appointing an assistant-commission. He would propose also, that every parish in this country, after due notice to the tithe-payer, should be entitled to meet for the purpose of considering the possibility of effecting an amicable settlement. Parties might be allowed to meet without such a notice; but he thought it would be better for a notice to be given in every case, for the purpose of inviting all interested—to whom the assistant commissioners would communicate their views—to attend. He believed, that one reason why commutations had not been more frequently made was this—though many might wish to have the advantages to be derived from them, and be desirous of seeing them effected, still what was everybody's business was noone's: others might be terrified by the tithe act—some were ignorant of the form of application to parliament for an act. Then there were parties whose interest would tempt them to make an effort with such a view, but the trouble, labour and difficulty of procuring the consent of individuals, as everybody must know who had been at all engaged in local business, were enough to deter from exertions for the public good. He would invite, therefore, after due notice, a meeting of the tithe-owners and the tithe-payers, and he would empower the commissioners to send down an assistant-commissioner, possessing a full knowledge of the law on the subject, to be present at the meeting to hear their complaints—to explain the law to the parties, and explain to them the principles on which they ought to act. He would not bind the assistant-commission to any particular terms, but to look at all the circumstances, to be in one sense merely amicus curiæ, to suggest what might appear to be right, and then to leave it entirely to the parties. He would provide, that in case two-thirds in point of value of the tithe-payers should agree with the tithe-owner, then that their consent should bind the other tithe-payers. If the tithe-owner, however, and two-thirds of the tithe-payers should consent, still he would not allow that to be valid until after it should have been submitted to the commissioners in London, who should review the circumstances in order to prevent fraud and collusion, and after giving their consent, that decision he would enact should be final. He would then propose that the money payment for substitution should be what was commonly called a corn-rent in lieu of tithes, which corn-rent should be subject, at the option of each party, to a periodical revision, and should vary only according to the price of corn. He was not disposed to take the price of wheat alone, for it had not of late borne a fixed proportionate value to the value of other corn, but would take the periodical variation of the money payment in the shape of corn-rent, to be determined by a reference to the price of all descriptions of grain, corn, wheat, and barley. He would not impose on any parish the necessity of the attendance of the assistant-commissioners; if the parishioners could, by an amicable arrangement, come to a settlement amongst themselves, there was no reason why they should not be allowed to do so; but he would not permit the agreement to be binding till it had received the assent of the commissioners. Where the living was not in the Crown, but in the hands of the dignitaries of the Church, it would be necessary to get the consent of the bishop; but that there might be uniformity, the whole must be under the control of the commissioners, and the bishops should be represented to a certain extent, by giving the appointment of one of the three commissioners to the Church, or by the application of some general principle of that law. Where the amount of corn-rent might be to be determined, of course it would be necessary that there should be an assessment, and that should be made by the authority of the assistant-commissioner. He also proposed, in the case of a modus, to allow the parties to refer the matter, by way of arbitration, and for the purpose of an amicable arrangement, to the commissioners in London; but if they required it, he would not debar them from the privilege of the ordinary proceeding. What he intended to offer was, that the parties might have their cases decided by the commissioners without incurring any expense. Seeing the number of cases in which, by the consent of both parties, land was granted in lieu of tithes, he would permit, with the consent of both parties, in any given time, a portion of land to be set aside in lieu of a money payment; but the substitution should wholly be in the first instance a money payment. The remedies he would give for the recovery of a rent-charge would be by action or distress, or a summary remedy by the magistrates, if the sum were below a certain amount. In the case of lands on lease, he would permit the tithe rent to be paid by the lessee, allowing him to deduct the amount so paid from the head landlord. The period he should propose for periodical revisions should be every seven years. In order to provide for changes in the value of corn, it should be allowable for either party to vary the amount of the corn-rent according to the average prices of corn for the preceding seven years. He intended to limit the operation of this bill to five years, giving it only such further continuance as was necessary for the purpose of completing any agreements that had been made under it. When he reflected that, by the measure he submitted to the House, each party, the tithe-owners and the tithe-payers in every parish, would be free from the expense and trouble of applying to parliament for a private act, he could not help thinking that the effect would be to afford such great facilities, that, general attention being once directed to the subject, the commutation of tithes would be adopted on the most satisfactory principle, he meant by mutual and voluntary agreement, in great numbers of instances. At first, he dared to say the progress made would not be considerable; there would probably be some angry discussion and some extravagant claims on either side; but the measure would at all events succeed in some few instances, and the advantages attending the arrangement becoming known, he had no doubt that it would be generally adopted. The assistant commissioner being able at his next visit to give a satisfactory account of the benefits derived from it in other quarters, the fair conclusion was, that such representations would have their effect. His expectation was, that long before the expiration of the tithe commutation commission, an amicable commutation of tithes would be effected in most parts of this country. He felt sure, at least, of this, that the arrangement would be found far more efficient than any plan for compulsory commutation. If it were only the actual experience to be gained by this measure, if it were only the knowledge to be acquired of what would satisfy each party, he thought that would be a sufficient inducement to the legislature to pass this bill. It would, at all events, enable them, in the case of parties who had declined to avail themselves of its powers, to determine what would be the most equitable principle on which to found a compulsory commutation. He thought it desirable to make this bill as simple and intelligible as possible. The object was to get a fixed money payment in lieu of tithe, and thus to put an end to the discouragement of agriculture—to that discouragement of improvement which arose from the uncertain payments, and the demand for increased tithe in proportion to those improvements. He did not propose, therefore, to burden the measure with the question of redemption. First let them get the commutation, hereafter they could determine as to the manner in which the redemption should be effected. He did not think it necessary to detain the House longer; the details would be best ascertained by a reference to the bill itself; if he went into them he feared that he would be rendering his statements too obscure. By consenting to this measure, the House would facilitate the commutation of tithe, leaving the matter to be decided by the common and voluntary consent of parties chiefly interested, while at the same time an effectual security would be provided, inasmuch as it would be subject always to the control of the commission, in the constitution of which he gave the church a voice, in order to prevent any injury to its interests. In adopting that course he hoped that a foundation would be laid in the safest and most satisfactory manner for the settlement of a question which had been the theme of discussion for ages, which had been productive of great expense in the shape of litigation, and had, he was afraid, been the cause of much local irritation, which he was convinced had only been prevented from breaking out into serious mischief, by the forbearance and temperate discretion of those who were interested in the levying of tithes. It was impossible, as he had already observed, to read the testimony of those who were most personally conversant with the operation of tithes in all their bearings, without feeling satisfied that the conduct of the clergy of this country as a body, in respect to the collection of tithe, entitled them to the character of the greatest liberality; having, in fact, sacrificed every personal and pecuniary interest to their desire and anxiety of maintaining a relation of friendly good-will among those over whose spiritual interests they were called to preside. It was because he felt that the landowner had a chief interest in the arrangement of this question, and because he felt convinced from past experience that the clergy were desirous of seeing it settled in a manner which, consistent with equitable principles, might be fruitless of litigation and unhappy collision with their parishioners, that he entertained a confident hope that the surest mode of laying the foundation, if not for an immediate, at least for a speedy and permanent settlement, was to be found in the amicable compromise and voluntary agreement of both parties immediately interested. The right hon. baronet concluded by moving the following resolution:—"That it is expedient to give facilities for the commutation of tithe in the several parishes of England and Wales, and for a payment in money in substitution thereof, to be charged on the titheable lands in each parish—such payment to be subject to variation at stated periods, according to the prices of corn; or for the allotment of land in lieu of tithe in parishes wherein the parties concerned may consent to such allotment."

Several members then took part in the debate, towards the close of which,—

Sir Robert Peel thought that he should best consult the convenience of the House if, before any further questions were put, he proceeded to answer those which had been already addressed to him. As the present was only the first stage of the bill, everybody would see that there were strong reasons why he should not pledge himself to the answers he might give upon the different points which had been raised during the discussion. He was certain of deriving great advantage from the discussion which he had already heard; and perhaps the best course which he could adopt would be, not to pledge himself in his reply to those points which had been pressed upon his attention. In reply to the hon. member for the city of London, he must observe that where tithe came in the shape of personal tithe, or the tithe upon houses, it was a subject of great difficulty. He had attended to that subject, but he could not say that it would form any part of the present bill. He believed that the bill of Lord Althorp did not attempt to settle the difficulty which always must exist in the commutation of tithe in town parishes. An hon. and gallant gentleman had asked him whether he would not compose his board of five commissioners. To this he replied that he preferred a board of three commissioners. It appeared to him as a practical man that the smaller a board of commissioners was, the greater was the responsibility resting on each commissioner, and that the greater the responsibility of each commissioner was, the more satisfactory was the exercise of the power with which they were intrusted. He proposed that two of the commissioners should be appointed by the Crown, and a third by the Archbishop of Canterbury. He placed the appointment of the third commissioner in the power of the Archbishop of Canterbury, in order to invest him with that power which was now exercised by the bishops in preventing incumbents from injuring the interests of their successors by improvident compositions. To give the Church a countervailing influence for this power in the commission, he vested the appointment of one commissioner in the Archbishop of Canterbury, to which he thought there could be no objection. Another hon. member had asked him whether the consent of two-thirds of the landowners in a parish to a composition would be compulsory on the remaining third. He was aware that there might be devices to saddle a third of the landowners with a burden that was unjust. It was to prevent any occurrences of that nature that he had appointed this commission; for he thought that there would be a great objection to making these voluntary compositions obligatory upon all parties without some superintending power. To prevent one-third of the landowners from being overborne by the remaining two-thirds, he had provided that no contract should be valid until it had been considered by the superintending board in London. That board would receive any remonstrance that might be sent to it from any parties who considered themselves aggrieved, and thus he trusted injustice would be prevented. Another hon. gentleman had asked him whether it would not be just to include other elements besides those which he had mentioned to determine the variations of the average. Now he could not concur in the propriety of taking in meat as one of those elements. Though of late years it had been assumed that the price of wheat bore a certain proportion to the price of other provisions, he was not inclined to admit the correctness of the assumption. He thought that the combined price of barley, oats, and meat would be a better, and a sufficient test. The commutation rent might be re-adjusted at the end of any given number of years, according to the then average price of wheat, barley, and oats. If the composition were to be septennial, it would be formed on the average of seven years. If it were decennial, it would be formed on the average of ten years. The fewer elements that were taken into consideration the better; for if more were taken, the bill would lose that simplicity which was, he thought, its chief recommendation. Another hon. gentleman had asked him this question—supposing that two-thirds of the landowners would not concur in the composition, would the remaining one-third have it in their power to make an amicable arrangement with the incumbent? The bill would not contain a provision of that kind; and in his opinion great caution should be exercised before any such provision were acceded to. The public advantage would not be advanced by it; for it would not be right in principle to grant to two or three individuals the power of making a private contract with the tithe-owner, and to leave to the clergyman the odium of collecting the remainder of his tithes in kind. It admitted of great doubt whether such an arrangement would not in practice prove most unsatisfactory. In reply to a question of another hon. member, he must observe, that when the tithe-owner had the consent of two-thirds of the landowners, and of the superintending board, the arrangement should be perpetual. In answer to a question put by Sir Robert Price, Sir Robert Peel said, that the bill would admit voluntary commutations. The commissioners would be at liberty to call the landowners together, and to suggest in cases of doubts and difficulties an amicable arrangement, and to facilitate an agreement between them and the tithe-owners. He might say to them—"You will be fighting a question of modus for ever—you will be removing one difficulty only to start another—let me propose an amicable arrangement, and so put an end to every legal difficulty in which you either are or may be involved." He thought that giving such a power to the commissioners would put a stop to much litigation. As to settling the difficulties in the way of composition which might arise in every parish, he could not pretend to any such thing; and if we were to attempt it, the points of difficulty under this new law would be as numerous as those now existing under the old law.

Mr. Parrott wished to know whether the burthen was to remain on the owner or the occupier of the land? Was any abatement to be made where the land was highly cultivated?

Sir Robert Peel said, that the tithe was to be levied on the occupying tenant, who would have the right to deduct the amount of it from the rent which he owed to his landlord. With respect to abatement there was a power given by Lord Althorp's bill to make an abatement; but if parties made a voluntary arrangement among themselves, his bill would give no power to the commissioners to make any abatement from it. One word with respect to compulsory arrangement. If he had prepared a bill to make a compulsory adjustment of tithe, he should not have hesitated to give the commissioners power to make an abatement. But he had not prepared any such bill, as he had seen various attempts made to attain that object, and all of them ineffectual. He did not believe that any one general plan for a compulsory arrangement could be adapted to districts differing so much in local circumstances as the county of Cumberland and the county of Kent. Indeed, he did not think that any general plan of that kind could be devised which would give satisfaction to the tithe-payers throughout the kingdom. The best mode, as it appeared to him, of getting ultimately at a compulsory arrangement, was to try first the voluntary plan, to see where it succeeded, and to note where it failed. Then when additional information was gained from various quarters, the House might steer its course through all the difficulties attending the compulsory plan. What he principally deprecated was, the making a compulsory arrangement as an experiment, and the failing in it. To fail in such an arrangement would throw the whole question back for years; but to fail in this voluntary plan, would lose no present advantage; the country would be just where it was—just as well off as before, and then the House might consider whether it would not take up with a compulsory arrangement. He would confess that he was more sanguine than many hon. gentlemen appeared to be with regard to the success of this voluntary plan. In the accounts relating to the property-tax, there was some information respecting the amount of tithe which was taken in kind in 1810. In that year the amount of tithes was £2,353,000, of which there was under composition £1,932,000. Therefore the amount of tithe not under composition, or in other words, taken in kind, was £421,000. Thus not more than one-fifth part, or speaking more accurately, only eighteen per cent of all tithes collected in England and Wales in 1810 was taken in kind. Now all tithe compositions existing at present were voluntary arrangements under private Acts of Parliament. There were some parishes in which a composition, on the principle of a corn-rent, under a voluntary arrangement, sanctioned afterwards by private Acts of Parliament, had perfectly succeeded. He would instance two parishes, the parish of Lancaster, and the parish of Cockermouth. In 1824, an arrangement of this kind took place in the parish of Lancaster. A commissioner was appointed by an act. The vacancy, when it occurred, was to be filled up by the justices at the Quarter Sessions. A corn-rent of £1,358 was to be payable in lieu of tithes. The expense was apportioned among certain townships in a manner specified in the act. There was to be a decennial re-adjustment, on the appeal of the vicar or one or more owners of houses and lands, at Quarter Sessions, but the amount was not to be reduced below £1,358. A new apportionment might be made decennially by appeal to Quarter Sessions of owners of the yearly value of £100. That act had worked well, and no objection had been taken, or indeed could be taken, to the principle on which it was founded. In the parish of Cockermouth a composition had taken place on the principle of a corn-rent, and there too the plan had worked well. Now, he did not see why, in a great number of parishes, where no great expense would be incurred in carrying the plan into execution, the same principle might not be applied. An hon. member had proposed, that land as well as money should be assigned to the incumbent in lieu of tithes. He proposed, that land should be given to the clergyman where spare land could be found in the parish. In the case of enclosures, where spare land could be found, such a plan might be advantageous; but he was afraid that the general adoption of it would only increase the difficulty of commutation. He did not exclude land from being given in lieu of tithe, but he would take a corn-rent as the rule, and land as the exception. The practice of Scotland proved, that there was nothing in the principle of this bill to prevent it from working well. He was glad to find that the House had received his plan so well. If, in the progress of the bill, any alterations should be suggested, calculated to improve it, he should be ready to give them the most careful consideration. He should proceed at present on the voluntary principle, for he thought that any compulsory arrangement would at present compromise the success of that commutation, which they were so anxious to accomplish.

The resolution was agreed to, and the House resumed.

LONDON UNIVERSITY.

MARCH 26, 1835.

Mr. Tooke, in a brief speech, proposed "That an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, beseeching him to grant his royal charter of incorporation to the University of London," as approved in the year 1831 by the then law officers of the Crown, and containing no other restriction than against conferring degrees in divinity and in medicine,"—

Mr. Goulburn moved as an amendment, "That his Majesty would be graciously pleased to order copies of the memorials which had been presented against this charter, together with an account of the proceedings before the Privy Council."

SIR ROBERT PEEL rose and said, I take it for granted, from the general demand that is made in the lower part of the House for an immediate division, that the gentlemen assembled there are perfectly acquainted with the nature of the motion on which they are going to divide, that they have maturely weighed the proposal upon which they are going to address the Crown, and, therefore, that they consider there no longer remains any necessity for further discussion; but, to those who are not exactly aware—to that portion of the House which, not having heard the argument [a number of members had just entered the House], cannot be acquainted with the nature of the proposal upon which we are going to pronounce an opinion, I take the liberty of reading the motion. It is in these words: "That the House do agree to an address to his Majesty, beseeching him to grant his royal charter of incorporation to the University of London, as approved in the year 1831 by the then law officers of the Crown, and containing no other restriction than against conferring degrees in divinity and in medicine." No man who has not read the report of the then law officers of the Crown, or does not know the contents of it, is very well qualified to press the restrictions specified in the motion upon the Crown. The address is to grant a charter of incorporation, but to grant it upon the principle approved of by the law officers of the Crown in 1831. Now, I ask the House of Commons whether it be decorous to proceed on a certain night to address the sovereign of this country to grant a charter to a certain body according to the mode approved of by the law officers of the Crown some years since, without having maturely weighed the scheme of which the law officers of the Crown so approved? Will hon. gentlemen consent that I should examine them severally upon the opinions expressed upon the report of the law officers of the Crown, in order that I may ascertain, out of the 300 or 400 members who are about to pronounce an opinion upon it, how many have maturely considered the recommendation of 1831? The law officers of the Crown, who were consulted in that year, proposed these restrictions upon the charter—that it should convey no power to the University to grant degrees in divinity and medicine. It may be very obvious and right, in the opinion of many gentlemen, to restrict the right of giving degrees in divinity, but why impose the restriction with respect to medicine? Why address the Crown to exercise its discretion in the grant of a charter, but limit the grant by the expression of some opinions to-night, and exclude the Crown from granting a charter for conferring degrees in medicine? I have an account in my hand of the state of the University of London in 1831. It had then 480 students, of whom 293 were students in medicine, 113 students in the arts, and 74 students in law. Am I to address the Crown to-night to give the privilege to the University of conferring degrees upon the 74 students in law, and upon the 113 students in the arts, but to exclude the 293 who are students in medicine? This question has been brought before the House on former occasions. No longer ago than last year it was submitted to parliament, and taken into consideration by the Crown, and by his Majesty it was referred to the privy council. Suppose the House should agree to address the Crown again on the present occasion, what course is the Crown to pursue? Is it again to refer the matter to the privy council? Or is the Crown, having once referred it to the privy council, and having received no report from it, to disparage the labours of the privy council, and to grant the charter without reference to it? That is the question which the Crown must determine if this address be presented. The matter was referred to the privy council because the King thought it was but right to give the parties who were adverse to the proposition, an opportunity of being heard. What course is now to be adopted? If the Crown is not to exclude the privy council, is it to refer the matter again to the privy council? The hon. member for Bridport says, he thinks that some better mode might be devised than granting a charter to the University of London. If the hon. gentleman is of opinion that some better course might be pursued than that which is proposed to-night, why should not the House of Commons take his advice, and at least pause before it agrees to such an address as that now proposed? The hon. gentleman says he thinks it would be better not to confer any exclusive charter upon the University of London, but to establish one general and common University for the metropolis, including the king's college and other schools, as well as the particular establishment now under consideration. Then, why am I to be called upon to-night to present an address to the Crown, praying that a charter may be conferred upon the University of London? The hon. member for Bridport says, that those who sit on this side of the House are not in the habit of adopting liberal opinions. [Mr. Warburton: Were not.] Does the hon. gentleman mean in the course of the last year? In the course of the discussions that have taken place upon this subject, the strongest opinions have been expressed against granting a charter to this University. I do not recollect ever having expressed a strong opinion upon the subject; but the strongest objection that presents itself to my mind to the proposition now before us, is to be found in the proceedings adopted last year at the instance of the hon. gentlemen then in the government, but who now sit on the opposite side of the House, and by whom this very question of granting a charter to the University of London was submitted to the Crown, and by the Crown referred, as I have before stated, to the privy council. A committee of the privy council was appointed—they received the petition of the parties adverse to the grant of the charter, or at least anxious that it should be accompanied with certain qualifications—they heard the evidence—they heard the speeches of counsel on both sides—they heard a very able speech from my learned friend Sir Charles Wetherell—they heard a speech from the hon. and learned gentleman opposite (Dr. Lushington)—they took the whole subject into their consideration, but to this hour they have never given any opinion upon it [“Hear, hear!”]. “Hear, hear!” says the hon. gentleman opposite with a sort of triumphant laugh. I am only answering the charge he has made upon the hon. gentlemen who sit on this side of the House, as to the great obstructions that they have ever been disposed to throw in the way of education. I presume, from what I have stated, that there must have appeared some good and valid ground for withholding the grant of the charter, especially as the late Lord Chancellor was one of the committee of the privy council which was appointed to enquire into the matter. I find, by a paper in my hand, that the members of that committee were the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Brougham, the Archbishop of York, Lord Lansdowne, Lord Ripon, the Duke of Richmond, Earl Grey, Lord Eldon [“Hear!”], the Earl of Carlisle [“Hear!”]. Surely if the hon. gentlemen opposite cheered the name of one of those noble lords, they ought to groan at the other. I continue: Lord John Russell, the Bishop of London, Lord Holland, Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Denman, Chief-Justice Tindal, Lord Melbourne, and Lord Stanley. This committee was constituted by the late government; it met, and gave the greatest attention to the subject. It sat upon the 26th of April and on the 3rd of May. The late administration did not quit office until the 13th of November. And why, having considered this matter fully, having heard the speeches of counsel on both sides—speeches which certainly did justice to the subject, in point of length as well as in ability—why, having heard all this, and closed their proceedings on the 3rd of May, they never took a single step upon the subject up to the 13th of November, I confess, I for one cannot understand, unless they felt that there was some serious difficulty, legal or constitutional, that stood in the way of granting the charter. If that were really the case, what course is the Crown now to pursue? Is it again to refer the matter to the privy council? [“No, no!”] It is not to do so; it is not to ask again for the opinion of Lord Brougham or Lord Denman? But I will not dwell upon the point. I proceed. Now, what is the proposal of my right hon. friend, the member for the University of Cambridge? He proposes an amendment, praying his Majesty to give directions that there be laid before the House, not merely the proceedings before the privy council, but copies of the memorials presented to, and the proceedings had before, the privy council, in the matter of the London University. I conceive that the House, being in possession of all those documents, will be better able to determine what course it will be proper to pursue, than it can be at the present moment. The hon. member for Bridport says, that he shall feel it to be his duty to press the question to a division, unless I will pledge myself to take the adoption of a particular plan which he has pointed out, into my serious consideration. I will not, for the purpose of evading the temporary difficulty, give any pledge of the kind required by the hon. member. If the House shall think it decorous to proceed to an address to the Crown, praying that a charter may be granted to the University, as settled by the law-officers in 1831—if it shall be prepared to say to-night, that the charter when granted shall include a restriction on medical degrees, let it pursue that course. I say openly, that, in my opinion, it will be an unwise and an improper course. I believe that the course pointed out by my right hon. friend would be much more safe and much more satisfactory. It precludes nothing—it prejudices no future proceeding—it only enables the House to form a better judgment upon the question. But feeling my objections to the motion of the hon. member for Truro to be well founded, I say on this occasion, as I say on every other, rather would I be found in a minority, and throw the responsibility of what I conceive to be an unjust and unwise proceeding upon the majority, than acquiesce in any proposition for the purpose of escaping an occasional or temporary difficulty. I feel, Sir, that it is not proper for the House to present this address to his Majesty. I feel that the presentation of such an address will not in any way facilitate the object which the hon. member has in view. My past experience convinces me of the justness of these feelings; and, therefore, upon these combined grounds, I cannot give my consent to the motion before the House. At the same time, Sir, while I say this, I do feel that the position of that portion of his Majesty's subjects who do not conform to the Church of England, and who in consequence of their not submitting to certain religious tests are excluded from the Universities, is deserving of attention. It is a ground of just complaint for them, and their claim to academical honours is not fairly and fully met. As to what may be the proper mode in which these honours should be conferred, I am not prepared to say, but I do not make this statement for the purpose of entrapping the House, nor will I give any pledge on the subject. Let the House take that course which it, in its wisdom, thinks fit, without my interposition. But, at the same time, it is right that I should not withhold the expression of my opinion; or refrain from declaring that I myself have no objection to some provision being made that should accord to Protestant Dissenters, who are excluded from the Universities, the power of acquiring academical distinctions. But that is a question which will demand very great consideration; and which, in my judgment, is very different from what is now proposed to be acceded to by the House. I do not apprehend, Sir, that the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, which now object to granting a charter to the London University, ever objected to that University granting degrees, and that the objection was narrowed to that charter conferring the power to grant honorary titles which might be confounded with the University honours of Oxford and Cambridge. I believe, Sir, there exists no objection to the London university granting degrees in the arts and in the law, specifying, in the diplomas, upon what authority those grants are made. At all events, this is a matter worthy of consideration. I hope, Sir, that I have dealt with the House perfectly fair. I repeat, I make no pledge, and give no assurance upon the subject; because I have not yet given the matter the consideration which it deserves. I think the motion of the hon. member for Truro an unreasonable one; and I prefer the amendment of my right hon. friend, because I conceive it to be the only course which the House can with propriety adopt in the present state of this question. I shall conclude by declaring, with great deference to the authority of the House, my respectful opinion that its decisions will acquire much greater authority if adopted after mature deliberation, and much greater weight will belong to them, if they are known to be the result of dispassionate discussion, and formed after the House shall have received the information that is within its reach. I hope the House will not come to a hasty resolve in favour of the terms in which the charter should be granted to the London University, especially when the hon. member for Bridport has stated, that those terms ought to be more extended, and when it is very doubtful whether medical degrees should be excluded from the charter or not.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

MARCH 27, 1835.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he thought that the House upon all similar occasions to the present, had always been in the habit, whatever might have been the feeling of hon. members, and however strong their objections to the political principles of the government, disposed to show that consideration which was due to the circumstances under which a government was called upon to administer the affairs of the public. And when the House recollected that the present government undertook the functions of the administration in December last, that they then found many questions remaining unsettled; the English tithe question was unsettled; the Irish tithe question was unsettled; the dissenters' marriage question was unsettled; the state of Canada was unsettled—he might say, untouched—the ministers having on all those questions to form a deliberate judgment, the House would not be surprised if there should be some matters which they had not taken into consideration. The ministers had applied themselves to the serious consideration of those matters which had appeared to them to be the most pressing, and it would be for the House to say, whether they approved of the measures or not which were the result of the deliberation of the ministers. He was sure they could not fairly say, that government had been remiss in submitting measures to parliament. The noble lord had, in effect, said it was the fault of government having dissolved parliament, that the business of the country had not been proceeded with; this he totally dissented from. He would ask whether, on the days that were appropriated for the committee of supply, they had not been constantly obstructed?—whether almost every day usually appropriated for that committee—whether there had not been some motion or other made as an amendment on the motion for a committee of supply? Two notices of motions as amendments had been given for that very day. The hon. member for St. Alban's (Mr. Ward) had given notice of a motion for to-day, for postponing the vote on the army estimates till after the vote on Monday night. He hoped the hon. member would persevere with that motion; he believed it stood for to-night. Was it to come on after the hon. member for Middlesex's motion had been disposed of? He would take for granted that it was; he hoped it was, because he thought that that would be a fair and legitimate course by which the House could signify, whether they would or would not permit the government to continue in the conduct of public affairs. He had never had greater anxiety than he had had with respect to these repeated notices. Notice was given on one day that the navy estimates should be postponed, on the express ground that the House had no confidence in the ministers; on the other, that the army estimates should be postponed for the same reason; and when last night he saw the notice of the motion that the army estimates should be postponed till a vote was taken on the noble lord's motion, he did not then entertain a doubt that at last a decision would be irrevocably come to, and that the House would come fairly to the question whether it would allow a vote to be taken for the number of men, or whether it would insist on the postponement of the business of the House, from want of confidence in government. He did hope that a motion so recently, so deliberately announced, as that of last night—announced, too, by one who had taken, as he was entitled to take, so prominent a part in connexion with the Irish Church—on the question whether or not they were prepared to postpone voting the number of men required, till after the decision of Monday next—he did hope that, considering the position in which they stood, that hon. member, having deliberately given notice of that motion, was prepared fairly to bring it under the consideration of the House. The conduct of government in calling parliament together on the 19th of February, instead of the 4th or 5th, as the noble lord (Lord John Russell) and his colleagues did in the preceding year, was not, as had been represented, the real cause of the delay which had taken place in the arrangement of the public business. It was owing to the exercise of that—that extreme right—which he was ready to admit hon. members possessed, of moving as amendments to the motion for going into Committees of Supply, resolutions which certainly had no immediate connexion with the supply vote. The time had at length arrived when it was necessary for the House to determine whether or no they would allow further obstructions to be thrown in the way of the public service. On the 25th of April, the Mutiny Act would expire. They had, therefore, the power either by direct motion, or by factious obstructions, to prevent the public business from being proceeded with. He hoped, from a regard to the character of the House of Commons, the course they would take would be a manly and straightforward course. If they brought forward irrelevant motions for the sake of postponing the necessary business of the country, it became them to consider how far that was compatible with the dignity of the House, and the advantage of the public service; and if they were determined to submit a motion of want of confidence, let the House know the grounds on which they proposed it. To waste the time of the House by long and tedious debates and frivolous motions, was not a fair and legitimate course of opposition. It was a fair and legitimate course of hostility for the House of Commons to declare, “We have no confidence in your government, and we will not intrust you with any vote or control of money;” and “never,” said the right hon. baronet, “did I pant for any motion as I do for that, and I am careless what the issue of it may be.” That was the fair and legitimate course of opposition for the House of Commons to take; but it was not fair to leave the ministers in doubt as to what were the intentions of the House, making it impossible for them to fulfil those intentions, by opposing obstructions, through causes which it was impossible adequately to meet, and the motives of which the public could not very well understand. The House was aware, that the financial year would close on the 1st of April; the ministers had proposed the estimates, and the Mutiny Act would expire on the 25th of April; if, then, a want of confidence in the executive government induced the House to withhold the supplies, let them say so; not by a factious opposition, but by a distinct vote. To postpone the supplies, was, perhaps, not a factious course; but the indirect course, giving notice of motions to withhold supplies, withdrawing them, and granting supplies, substantially implying confidence in the government, certainly appeared like faction. If, instead of adopting such a course, the House of Commons had applied itself to the consideration of the estimates on previous nights, although it did not meet till the 19th of February, instead of the 4th or 5th, there would have been sufficient time for the complete discussion of the subject. He was afraid the hon. gentleman was not going to divide on the motion, which was to this effect—that the army and ordnance estimates should be referred to a committee. A notice to that effect was given by the hon. gentleman, but he had now made a qualification. He did not mean to find fault with it. On the contrary, the hon. member had exercised a legitimate and sound discretion; but he now was willing to concede the number of men, the responsibility properly resting on the executive. He (Sir Robert Peel) had formerly contested that point with the hon. member, on the subject of the navy estimates, maintaining that government ought to determine and regulate the amount of naval force required; but the hon. member at that time did not agree to his proposition. On reflection, however, the hon. member had altered his motion, and that wisely. It was not a mere technical matter—the grand, plain, intelligible, rational ground, was this—the executive government commanded means of information which the House of Commons, and no Select Committee, could have access to; and, acting on their own proper responsibility, their constitutional province was to propose the amount of force which the exigencies of the public service required. That was the ground on which the force was proposed. They were not to acquiesce in it because the forms referred it to the privy council. He would not accept of the hon. gentleman's compromise, on that understanding. It did not rest with them, as an executive and responsible body, to propose the force; it rested with that body which was known to the strict letter of the constitution, was known to the House of Commons, forming the cabinet council called by his Majesty to render him the necessary assistance in the executive department of the state, and responsible for the manner in which they exercised their powers. The hon. gentleman, therefore, wisely and justly now said, that the proposal of that force should be left with the executive government. Not that their proposal should be conclusive on the House of Commons; for if it appeared larger than the necessities of the public service required, that House would only be performing its proper functions, not by delegating them to a Select Committee of twenty-five of its members, but by distinctly avowing to the executive government, that it was not satisfied with the estimate made, and the grounds on which the force was demanded. The hon. gentleman then proposed to forego enquiry into the amount of the force, and made a proposal to this effect, that the rest of the army estimates, and the whole of the ordnance estimates, should be referred to a Select Committee. But, notwithstanding the exception of the amount of military force from the enquiry of the committee, he could not adopt the suggestions of the hon. gentleman. He never could consent to refer the remainder of the army, and the whole of the ordnance estimates, to any Select Committee. If this were to be done in the present case, it ought to be done every year, and he, for one, would never consent to establish the precedent of withdrawing those estimates from the annual revision of the House of Commons, when every member was called on by his duty to his constituents to take a part in that revision, and transfer them to a committee up-stairs, where, as the right hon. baronet (Sir J. Graham) justly said, "If a government wanted to slur over an objectionable vote, or make an imperfect explanation, they would have a much better opportunity of doing it in a committee, where the public scrutiny was not let in, where there was no irregular perhaps, but still very coercive, report of their debates and proceedings." If a government, he said, wanted to screen objectionable votes from enquiry, let them send them up to a Select Committee, exercising an influence in its formation, and establish thereby the fatal precedent of withdrawing those votes for ever from the jurisdiction of the committee of the whole House.—He would not, therefore, consent to the amended motion of the hon. gentleman. But then came a third proposition, whether they would consent to the appointment of a committee for the purpose of enquiring into certain matters connected with the civil administration of the ordnance and army departments. It was exceedingly difficult to draw precisely the line where committees ought to be granted and where they should be resisted by the House, for it was easy to make a plausible proposition to the appointment of a committee upon every matter connected with the public interests. There was no office with respect to which it might not be said, Where is the objection to appoint a committee? Ten different gentlemen might appoint ten different committees with respect to ten different departments, declaring that "Two secretaries of state would do the business of three, and three Lords of the Admiralty do the business of five; reason will be heard in a committee, and they will determine whether or no it will not be better to make a reduction of the whole. If you establish a good case see what advantage you will have, because, reason being heard, and evidence adduced, you may be enabled greatly to reduce your establishments." They might say that of every possible department. But the real question was, whether there should not be made out a sufficient prima facie case; and he thought the House would agree with him, that the general arguments which they had heard in favour of all sorts of possible reductions did not establish a sufficient ground to induce him to consent in the present instance to the appointment of a committee. To illustrate this, he would observe that the noble lord, the member for Devonshire, proposed that a committee should be appointed to enquire, whether or not the office of commander-in-chief might not, in point of fact, be virtually abolished, and his power transferred to the secretary at war. Now, he would not consent to a committee for the purpose of considering that question;—he would not consent to transfer the military administration of the army to a civil officer;—he would not consent to abrogate the civil duties of the commander-in-chief.—[Lord John Russell. I did not refer to any civil duties performed by the commander-in-chief.] One of the noble lord's objections was, that the secretary-at-war interfered with the commander-in-chief, and that the commander-in-chief interfered with the secretary-at-war. Now this must be an interference with respect to civil duties. As to the duties of the secretary-at-war, then, who might be a civilian, and who had civil duties connected with his office, he was not prepared to say that a committee should be appointed, in order to dissociate those duties from those of the commander-in-chief. The remaining question was this—whether he (Sir R. Peel) would undertake, on the part of the Crown, to consent to a committee of the House of Commons to enquire into the amalgamation of the civil departments of the army and the ordnance, or to the appointment of a commission for the purpose. He believed that he might now refer to what he had hitherto not thought himself entitled to refer to—the communication which the noble lord (Russell) had been good enough to make with respect to the result of an enquiry instituted by the late government. He did not think that he should have been called on to discuss that question, and the reason why he had alluded to the multifarious duties which had been devolved on the present government was this—that considering the early meeting of parliament after their appointment, many matters must have escaped that serious and attentive consideration to which they were entitled. It was only last night that the noble lord (Russell) complained that he (Sir R. Peel) was not prepared, having opposed the admission of dissenters to the Universities, to propose a scheme by which, admitting the principle, admitting the reasonableness of their expectations, the one and the other could be carried practically into effect. He admitted the principle, he said, but could not pledge himself to a measure with respect to the details of which he had had no opportunity of deliberately making up his mind. Now, he had no hesitation or shame in admitting that he had not given to that subject that full consideration which it deserved. He was ready to give a similar answer to the proposition of the hon. member for Middlesex. At the same time, he must say that he did not see any necessary connection which that proposition had with the vote of supply. What ground could a refusal be for opposition? Allowing that it were right to grant a committee, or appoint a commission, what connexion had the doing so with the army and ordnance estimates? If he refused either or both, let the hon. gentleman take the fair course; let him give notice of a motion on the subject for a future day,—let it come fully and fairly before the House,—let the evidence of its necessity be made apparent,—but let him not raise an opposition to a question of public business, which was as foreign from the question as one thing could be from another. If, after reading all the evidence given before the late commission,—if, after considering the question in all its bearings, he stated to the House and the hon. gentleman, that he did not deem it necessary to assent to his proposition,—then let the hon. gentleman take the course he thought proper in reference to it. He had no other answer to give the hon. gentleman. He could not, until those conditions had been complied with, accede to his proposition. Whatever might occur, he would never, while he had the honour to be a minister of the crown, consent to establish a bad precedent to escape from a temporary difficulty. He would make no pledge—he would give no promise beyond this—that the subject should have his best consideration; and if, on a future day, the hon. member brought forward a motion on the subject, he should be prepared to meet it, in whatever way he might deem most advantageous for the service of the state.

CHURCH OF IRELAND.

APRIL 2, 1835.

In the fourth night's debate on Lord John Russell's motion, "That the House do resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House, to consider the Temporalities of the Church of Ireland."

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, it was because he took very much the same view of the intention and effect of the question now before the House with the hon. and learned member who had just addressed it (Mr. O'Connell), because he believed that the carrying it would be considered in Ireland as a proclamation of a future system of government—because he believed that false hopes would be excited in Roman Catholics, and terror inspired in Protestants, unless the House acted with peculiar circumspection,—it was because he felt these things, that he was induced to overcome the disinclination which every man must have, whatever might be his experience in addressing a public assembly, in obtruding himself upon the House when its attention was exhausted, and when every argument bearing on the case had been already urged with the greatest ability. Nothing but an imperative sense of public duty, imposed by the public situation which he held, could, under such circumstances, overcome his disinclination to appeal to the patience and indulgence of the House.

The right hon. baronet then continued as follows:—At this critical period, at a time when Ireland is convulsed by agitation respecting tithe, we are called upon to decide this great question,—what steps shall we take for the purpose of reasserting an almost abdicated right of property? Four years have passed away without the practical assertion of that right in many parts of Ireland—the time has arrived when parliament must interfere with the moral weight of its own inherent authority, and with the coercive obligations of positive law, for the purpose of enforcing rights which, if they remain longer in desuetude, will be lost for ever. I am so impressed with the extreme importance of this subject, that a great part of what has occurred in the course of the debate I will pass over without notice. All that consisted of personal sarcasm on members of the government, of allusion to my course on the Catholic question, of crimination and recrimination, I will entirely pass by. I have no extracts of speeches to read, by way of retaliation for the scraps extracted from my own. I have very little confidence in my own infallibility, and as little in the infallibility of others. It would therefore be no gratification to me to divert the attention of the House from this, the most important practical subject it has yet had to decide; it would be no gratification to me to snatch from some of my opponents the petty triumph which they think they have gained over me, and by proving in return, by quotations from Hansard's Debates, or the Mirror of Parliament, that in the course of last year they entertained opinions different from those which they now hold.

We are now called upon to decide a great question of public policy. There are four courses which are open to us to pursue; at least there are four only that suggest themselves to my mind. You may adhere to the general principle of the existing law, and determine to maintain the Established Church in Ireland in the possession of its property. That is one course. You may assert that the property of the Church of Ireland is excessive, and attempt a final settlement of the question by determining the amount of the excess, discouraging all false expectations, by defining expressly the amount which you have determined to take from the Church, and declaring that the rest shall remain secure in its undisturbed possession. That is the second course. The third course you may take is, to proclaim to the world,—“We have no preference for one religion over another—we will mete out that full measure of justice which the hon. and learned member did not in direct terms call for, but to which the whole of his argument was directed—we will destroy the predominance of any one favoured religion, and either withhold endowments from all, or grant them to all indiscriminately and without a preference.” That is the third course. What is the fourth? The course which the noble lord, the member for Devonshire, proposes, the fatal course of superadding to religious dissensions the dissensions of conflicting pecuniary interests—of leaving nothing settled—of establishing nothing with respect to the amount or an assumed surplus—of laying down no principle, by which either the amount of application of that surplus can be determined—of contenting yourselves (and this you call a permanent settlement of the question!) with asserting an unprofitable right to apply an imaginary surplus to an unexplained purpose. I should have thought the wit of man could have devised nothing more effectual than this for adding to the confusion which prevails in Ireland. But I was mistaken. You have not only adopted the mischievous course, but you have yourselves proved the folly of it. You have proposed one plan, and argued for another. You have attempted to prove that you ought to destroy the predominance of the Church, and you leave it with curtailed revenue indeed, but with predominance untouched. You shrink from acting on your own principles, you forget your own arguments, you invite us to take up a position which those arguments prove to be untenable. You tell the people of Ireland, not only that you will not determine the amount of the excess of the revenues of the Protestant Establishment in Ireland, but that you cannot indicate by what test it shall be decided. You leave it dependent on the will of any government—you leave it dependent on the discretion of any man; all you say is, that if there be a surplus, about which you are not certain, you will apply it to an object which you will not explain. Your attempts to modify your own resolution, and diminish its danger, only throw in new elements of confusion. If Protestantism increases, you reserve the right to make additional provision for the Protestant Establishment—that is to say, you tell the Roman Catholics that they shall have a direct pecuniary interest in preventing the increase of that party which has (in the words of hon. members opposite) exercised tyranny over them, that they shall have now an opportunity of revenging themselves for their past wrongs, by preventing the spread of that religion, through the extension of which their share in the public spoil will be diminished. Surely, Ireland is convulsed enough already—

“There hot and cold, and moist and dry, Contend alike for mastery.”

“But (turning towards Lord John Russell) you throw chaos in.” You, who professed yourself unable to determine this question until you got further information—you, who appointed commissioners, not to enquire into statistical details merely, but expressly into the bearings of the Church Establishment in Ireland upon the religious and moral welfare of the country, you would not wait till you received the report of your own commissioners—until you could arrange your own plan—until you could conduct the people of Ireland to the peaceable settlement of the question, by producing, not an indefinite principle, to be applied on a remote and uncertain contingency, but a matured plan, affixing limits to the application of your principle, and enforcing its just execution. And for what is this done? For the mere purpose of embarrassing a government, of throwing an impediment in the way, not of the final adoption—for that might be justifiable—but of the calm discussion of a measure proposed with the sanction of the Crown. What risk would you incur, what advantage would you lose, by placing your practical plan in competition with that of the government, and moving that plan in committee as an amendment upon ours?

I am prepared to assert the rights of the Church to the remnant of the revenue which is left to her. All that I now ask is, permission to state calmly the grounds upon which I come to that conclusion. In the first place, I entreat you to bear in mind that there are other parties who are looking to our decision with equal anxiety to that which the Roman Catholics take in the result of the question—I mean the Protestants of Ireland. I am not disposed to deny, that if you are clearly and decidedly of opinion that an imperative public interest requires the abandonment of a national compact, the violation of long prescription, the abrogation of laws affecting property,—I am not disposed to deny the abstract absolute right of the legislature to do all these things; but I do assert, that before you do them, before you violate a solemn compact, and falsify the expectations to which you have yourselves given rise, you ought to be convinced, by arguments approaching to demonstration, of that overpowering necessity which can alone be your vindication.

Within the last forty years, three great measures have been adopted affecting the relation of the Protestants of Ireland to their Roman Catholic fellow subjects. The first of these measures was the Act of Union, which differs in this respect from an ordinary law,—that it was a national compact, involving the conditions on which the Protestant parliament of Ireland resigned its independent existence. In that compact express provision is made, which, if any thing can have, has an obligation more binding than that of ordinary law. The hon. member for St. Alban's may endeavour to show, by reading resolutions and extracts from Mr. Pitt's speeches, that some right was reserved in the Act of Union of interfering with respect to the Church.

A right was reserved in that Act with respect to the removal of the civil disabilities of the Catholics, but no right was reserved to the united parliament to deal with the property of the Church in Ireland. Let any man read the act of Union, and if its meaning is to be decided by a reference to the plain ordinary sense of the terms, he cannot doubt what that meaning is. The act stipulates for the continuance and preservation of the Established Church as the Established Church of England and Ireland. There is, first, a stipulation that the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of the united Church shall remain in full force and for ever. Here you will say there is nothing specific as to Ireland; no mention of Church revenues. There is not; but superadded to this stipulation is another, as binding, as solemn, and which, being superadded, implies some new guarantee; the guarantee, I contend, of temporal rights and possessions. It is as follows:—the “continuation and preservation of the said united Church as the Established Church of England and Ireland, shall be deemed and taken to be an essential and fundamental part of the Union.” This is the first of the three measures to which I referred, as the outworks and defences of the Church in Ireland.

I come to the second. In 1829, the civil disabilities of the Roman Catholics were removed by the legislature, and the measure by which that object was effected partook also of the nature of a compact, as distinguished from an ordinary law. If that act is, as we feel it to be, irrevocable with respect to the privileges which it conferred upon Roman Catholics, it is also (unless some great and urgent necessity should arise to render a change necessary) irrevocable with respect to the assurances which it gave to Protestants. By that act, the Protestants of Ireland were led to believe that all intention to subvert the present Church Establishment settled by law within these realms was most solemnly disclaimed and utterly abandoned. They were assured, on the obligation of an oath, that no privilege which the act confers would be exercised to disturb or weaken the Protestant religion or the Protestant government within these realms. They were told that the removal of the civil disabilities of the Catholics would give new security to the Church in Ireland. They were told that the removal of those disabilities would fully redress the injustice of which the hon. and learned member for Dublin has just been complaining. They little thought that within five years from the passing of that act, the power which it conferred would be exercised to subvert the Church Establishment, so far as regards the property of the Church.

The third and last measure to which I have alluded as affecting the relation between Protestants and Roman Catholics in Ireland, and the immediate interests of the Established Church, was the act passed within the short period of two years, for the reduction of the number of bishops in Ireland, and the regulation of the temporalities of the Church. You determined, and in my opinion, wisely, to review the state of the Irish Church, and to remove every imperfection and abuse. You provided, and in my opinion wisely, that Ecclesiastical sinecures in Ireland should follow the fate of civil sinecures—that measures should be adopted to reduce the revenues of livings too amply provided for, and to apply the excess to the increase of livings, for which there was no adequate maintenance, and to the building of glebe houses. Those who introduced that act contended, at first, that the improved fund obtained by the conversion of bishops' leases into perpetuities might be applied to secular purposes; but the subsequent abandonment of that clause, and the whole remaining tenor of the act, clearly show that the principle of reserving ecclesiastical property for strictly ecclesiastical purposes was rigidly adhered to. Two years only have elapsed since the date of that act and now, notwithstanding the act of Union—notwithstanding the removal of the civil disabilities of the Catholics—notwithstanding the reform of the Irish Church—notwithstanding the extinction of ten bishoprics, the learned member for Dublin (Mr. O'Connell) tells you, that it is absolutely necessary that a proclamation should go forth to Ireland as the indication of a new system, and of the commencement of a new era.

The member for St. Alban's contends, that because we concurred in the propriety of removing abuses in the Church Establishment of Ireland, and consented to the entailment of livings too largely endowed, for the express purpose of supplying the deficiencies of others, we ourselves sanctioned the interference with the property of the Church, and are thereby now precluded from objecting to the application of that property to secular purposes. He sees no distinction between the correction of an abuse for the express benefit of the Church, and the diversion of its revenues to other objects. The noble lord who introduced this motion declined entering upon the question of the inviolability of Church-property, thinking it involved long disputes, and that it was a Serbonian bog, in which whole armies of unfortunate logicians had sunk. I think the noble lord acted wisely in determining to skirt the bog. The member for St. Alban's however, said boldly that, notwithstanding the warning of the noble lord, he would plunge into the bog, and endeavour to reach the other side; and it is the ill-success of the hon. member which has determined me not to follow his example. I watched the course of the hon. member, and saw him, with great pain to himself, oppressed, no doubt, with the weight of his own arguments, floundering with Bacon in one hand, and four or five equal authorities in the other, in the middle of that bog, from which he never emerged whilst I remained in the House. I have no doubt, as I said before, that the cause of the hon. member's mishap was his being encumbered by the armour of his own ponderous arguments. If gentlemen will come down to discuss questions in this House, loaded (as the member for Shaftesbury (Mr. Poulter) professed himself to be) with all the hoarded wisdom that has been accumulating from the time of Noah to the very moment by the clock when he himself rose to speak, they must expect to meet the fate which has befallen the hon. member for St. Alban's, and to be engulfed in the same bog. What can be more absurd than to assert, that because we consent to make some specific improvement in the distribution of ecclesiastical property, for the admitted benefit of the Church, we are thereby compelled to assent to a proposal for applying that property to secular purposes? The Church, it is said, is not a corporation, but an aggregate of separate corporations, and if you touch one of them, you sanction the principle of control over Church-property, and the right to divert it to other purposes. This may sound logically correct, but appears to me practically absurd. What has been the course of the law with respect to this subject? On what principle do the first-fruits proceed? On what principle does the curates' act rest? In each case, there is interference with the separate corporations, with the revenues of the individual preferment; but it is absurd from thence to attempt to establish the general right to apply ecclesiastical property to secular purposes. I contend, then, that nothing but the strongest conviction of absolute necessity can justify us, in defiance of the act of Union, in defiance of the Catholic relief bill, and in defiance of the Church temporalities' act (and the understanding which prevailed in parliament at the time it was passed), in appropriating ecclesiastical property to other than ecclesiastical objects. It is wholly unnecessary for me to discuss the question, what, on the supposition of there being an immense surplus, injurious to the Church itself, I would do with it. I will not discuss a hypothetical case. Why should I be called upon to discuss a contingent and hypothetical case, when in my opinion there is no surplus at all? Do not, however, infer that I entertain an opinion in concurrence with yours, because I decline to discuss a contingent and hypothetical case. The practical question is quite sufficient to occupy our attention at this stage of the debate, and therefore I will avoid all superfluous discussion. The noble lord, the member for Devonshire, says, that the whole annual revenue of the Irish Church is £791,000. I assert, as positively, on the other side, that so far from the Church in Ireland having a clear revenue of £791,000, it has not £450,000. There is, you see, a great difference between us. Now, I ask the House of Commons whether it is just or wise to pronounce a decision with respect to the disposition of an assumed surplus, when so great a difference of opinion prevails as to the amount of revenue? Is it fair, I ask, to create a prejudice against the Church by the assumption of unfounded data? We are told that the perpetuity purchase fund will realize a capital of £3,000,000: I say, that it has not realized £60,000, that it is now in debt to the amount of £100,000, and from the information which I have received, I believe it never can realize much more than the third of £3,000,000. We are told that the annual revenue of the Church is £791,000: I assert that it is not more than £450,000, and then I ask you whether you will this night adopt a resolution pledging you to an appropriation of a surplus which has no existence, except in the imagination of the noble lord? I will ask the noble lord a question:—Has he made an estimate of the sum required for the purposes of national education? I beg the House to observe that this is a very important point. Ought we to be called upon to lay down a rule with respect to the application of a surplus—ought we to bind ourselves to its application to one specific object in preference to, nay, in exclusion of, every other—without having some estimate of the sum which will be wanted for the purpose to which the appropriation is to be made? I wish the noble lord would endeavour to answer the following argument. The noble lord assumes that the revenue of the Church is £791,000, and proposes to appropriate a certain proportion of that sum to the purposes of education. I ask him what estimate he demands for those purposes? Does any man believe that £100,000 will be required annually for education? However, to prevent any cavilling, I will give the noble lord double that sum, namely, £200,000. I would, indeed, advise the House, before they encumber education in Ireland with an annual grant to such an amount, to acquire some information upon the subject; and well to consider what effect may result from such an application of money by discouraging local exertions, and drying up the sources of local contributions. But supposing the noble lord should require £200,000 annually for purposes of education, he would still leave the Church of Ireland, according to his own showing, in possession of a yearly revenue of £591,000. Now, observe, he claims no part of the Church revenue for any other object than education. His settlement, he says, is to be a final one. He excludes, therefore, every other object, and admits that the amount of revenue which he leaves to the Church is not too large. That amount is £591,000. But I will show that the Church has only a revenue of £450,000; that it has actually less by £140,000 than what the noble lord himself is willing to leave it, after his deductions for other objects. How can you then resist the conclusion, that, if my estimate of the future revenue of the Church be correct, you have a deficiency to supply, rather than a surplus to appropriate, and that you are wasting your time in an unprofitable and mischievous discussion? Still I do not ask you to decide against the question of Appropriation now; I only ask you to enquire before you decide, into a simple, surely an important, fact, whether the revenue with which you are about to deal, amounts to £791,000, or to £450,000. This matter is too important to be thus trifled with. You have a right to insist upon the noble lord's producing the grounds of his calculation and the details of his practical plan. That is the only course to prevent the exciting of extravagant hopes and subsequent disappointment. The noble lord's proposition will not give satisfaction to any party—neither to the people of this country, nor to the Protestants of Ireland, nor to the Roman Catholics. Why, then, should we, at this stage of the business, without waiting for the report of the commissioners appointed a few months since—a report to which I attach no importance, but which the noble lord must consider the foundation of his measure—why should we pledge the House of Commons to a resolution which is utterly unnecessary, and give a pledge which we may not be able to redeem?

You say, and you say with truth, that the Irish Church has not hitherto succeeded in effecting the great objects for which it was established. I wish to meet that question. I am prepared, I am anxious, to discuss it. I know there can be no advantage in concealing what constitutes the real stress and substance of the argument on which you mainly rely. I may fail in meeting that argument, but I have no wish to shrink from, or to misrepresent it. You say, then, that the Irish Protestant Establishment has failed in effecting the ends for which it was instituted; that there are not more than 1,000,000 of Protestants, while there are 6,000,000 of Roman Catholics; that the Protestants have not been on the increase; that the Roman Catholics still maintain the great ascendancy of numbers; and the Protestant establishment having thus failed in accomplishing its objects, you are now, therefore, at liberty to curtail its supposed excessive revenues. My answer is simply this:—if there have been causes in operation, up to a very recent period, which have prevented the growth and expansion of Protestantism, and if those causes have now ceased to exist, if they are no longer operative, you are not justified in arguing from the experience of the past; you are not justified in appropriating a surplus which might not be necessary for the wants of the establishment, if the past were to continue, but which, because that past is not to endure, may be now, or may become, necessary for the spiritual wants of the Irish people. We have, in the first place, removed all civil disabilities, and put Protestant and Catholic in circumstances of perfect equality as to the possession of civil rights. It was one of the most forcible arguments against the existence of those civil disabilities, that, while they continued, a prejudice was unavoidably fostered against the reformed religion, and that an impediment of pride was necessarily opposed to conversion and conformity. There appeared to be a worldly interest in conforming to Protestantism, of which it shocked the feelings of the Roman Catholic to incur the odium. But that impediment has now been removed. Conformity brings with it no temporal or civil advantage; there is no obstacle, therefore, of pride to be overcome. Again, there were abuses in the Church, and an irregularity in the distribution of its revenues, which had also impeded the progress of its doctrines. I say, again, those abuses have ceased to exist, or, if they still continue, they shall cease to exist. The time has come when all abuses must be corrected—the time has come when parliament must insist on their correction. No one will vindicate the exact distribution of the ecclesiastical revenues of Ireland according to the mode hitherto adopted, provided you can show that another distribution for the same objects will be more serviceable and advantageous; there is no other limit to the principle of correction than that of applying Church revenues to ecclesiastical purposes. It is said, again, that the superfluous wealth of the establishment had been another cause which has obstructed the progress of reformation. Superfluous wealth indeed! The superfluous wealth of the starving clergy in the south of Ireland! You have already taken effectual measures to remove the obstacle of superfluous wealth to the progress of reformation. What a mockery! To talk of the trappings of luxury and indolent enjoyment among those who have been robbed of their property for the last four years! Is it possible that, in the inscrutable dispensations of Providence, the miseries which the clergy have endured, the extreme suffering they have undergone, but, above all, the patience and meek forbearance with which many of them had borne their wrongs, manifesting a determination for themselves and—what is a harder trial—for their families, to submit to privations from which your own meanest servants would shrink with indignation; is it possible that this training in the school of affliction—this public exhibition of undeserved wrong, may conciliate towards the sufferers, and towards the faith which they profess, a feeling of respect which may predispose the public mind to receive the salutary influence of a pure and tolerant religion? If, then, such be the case, if some of the causes which have prevented the spread of Protestantism have been removed, what right have you to legislate on the assumption of a surplus?

You are not now about to determine whether it be expedient to found a new establishment in Ireland—you are not about to determine how you will appropriate an unapplied revenue to religious purposes. The establishment is in existence. The revenues belong to it. How will you deal, let me ask, with the churches that now exist? You have already 1,100 churches for Protestant worship. Is it part of the noble lord's plan to abandon them? You have 800 or 900 glebe-houses. Under the Temporalities' bill, you have made provision for the increase of small livings and the building of new churches. How do you mean to deal with the existing state of things? You say it is your intention to encourage the Protestant landlord to reside on his estate. Shall the first spectacle you place before his eyes be the dilapidation and ruin of that church which should afford a sanctuary for himself and family? I do call upon the hon. member for Weymouth (Mr. Buxton) to lend me his attention for a moment to this part of the case—and to the last report made by the Commissioners acting under the Church Temporalities' Bill, who were appointed by the late government, and some of whom now preside over the Board of Education. To that report I entreat the attention of the hon. member, and of every hon. gentleman who professes not to consider this a party question—whose mind is not yet made up—who is willing to pause—[interruption].—Oh, yes! you, who make that exclamation, well know that there are many who are dissatisfied with the progress of this debate. [Cheers.] I understand you—there are many who are uneasy, who are unconvinced, who are not yet quite prepared to give the irrevocable pledge. ["No, no!" and cheers.] I call, then, on those whose minds are not yet made up—not to decide to night on the principle, but to wait for the practical plan by which that principle shall be carried into execution. [Loud cheers, and some interruption from the hon. member for St. Alban's.] Oh! I am not addressing myself to you; I have no hope of your conformity. I am addressing myself to those who have not taken quite so prominent and conspicuous a part, and from whose position I infer that their minds may be less determined than yours. I call their attention to this last report, which was made to the government specifically on the subject of the demand for Protestant worship. The first name appended to it is that of the Archbishop of Dublin, and the report stated, "In connexion with the subject of churches, the commissioners cannot but express the satisfaction they feel in having to report to your excellency, that many applications have been made to them for aid towards the erection of additional churches, it appearing that the accommodation at present subsisting in those districts or parishes from which applications have been received, is quite insufficient for the congregations of the Established church. And while the commissioners have to mention that in many cases parishes have expressed their willingness to contribute, or cause to be contributed, certain proportions of the expenses required for building churches, in some cases amounting to one-fifth, in some to one-half, and in others to three-fourths of the sum required for the purpose—we cannot but regret to say, that our superfluous funds, which are only applicable to the objects under consideration, could hold out no prospect of the applications in question being favourably entertained." Now, it surely argues no indifference, no lukewarmness, on the part of the Protestant population, when parties are willing, after you have abolished the vestry-cess, to contribute one-half and even three-fourths of the expense required for the erection of additional places of Protestant worship.

Now, let me for a moment again address myself to the argument of the hon. member for Weymouth (Mr. Buxton), who disowned the question in the fair spirit in which it ought to be treated. Determined to maintain the Protestant Establishment, he thought that there was still an available surplus, and was prepared to appropriate it to some purpose of education, reserving a fund for the necessities of the Protestant religion, in case such necessities should hereafter arise. Now I differ from him in opinion with respect to this: I think that the necessity he contemplates now exists—that it is now necessary to appropriate the whole of the existing revenues of the Church to ecclesiastical purposes. The hon. gentleman says he would send through Ireland a number of Protestant clergymen, whose zeal should supply the place of wealth, and who, by the exercise of disinterestedness and exhibition of poverty, should conciliate towards themselves those feelings of kindness and respect which have been nearly extinguished by the noxious exhibitions of worldly wealth. It is because I totally differ from the hon. gentleman as to the policy of the course he recommends, and the probable effects of that policy, that I come to a different conclusion from him, as to our control over an available surplus, and that I hope, if I succeed in converting him to my views, I may even yet have the benefit of his vote. The plan suggested by the hon. member is that which has been unequivocally condemned in this debate by the noble lord (Lord John Russell), who maintained that nothing could be more fatal, in attempts to convert the Roman Catholic population than the exhibition of intemperate zeal. I entreat the hon. gentleman to remember also, that the policy of our establishment is essentially different from that of the Roman Catholic church. It may be possible for a man on whom celibacy is enjoined, to pass his hours in retirement, and, free from domestic cares, to devote his life to the unremitting discharge of the spiritual functions of his office: but we impose no restrictions of celibacy, we do not hold that the local influence of a religious and pious clergyman will be diminished, if he is also enabled to set the example of a strict performance of every domestic duty. I deny then, the justice of the hon. gentleman's argument; I think it is infinitely better to place a man of education in a fixed and permanent charge—to remove him from the temptation of poverty, to allot to him what may be sufficient for the decorous and independent maintenance of himself and family, and trust to the mild, beneficent, and assiduous discharge of his pastoral duties, and the exhibition of virtuous example in domestic life, as more likely to make an impression on hostile minds, than if we required, as part of our system, the possession of extraordinary virtues and extraordinary zeal—expecting, not in the case of a single individual, but, systematically, from all whom we may employ, that they should be able to resist all the temptations, and endure all the privations of poverty. The principle of our establishment is, in my opinion, a safer and a wiser one. When I look at the expensive course of education which must be pursued by a clergyman—when I look at the situation which he ought to sustain—the means he ought to possess of influencing those who stand in at least as much need of his ministrations as the humbler members of his flock, those I mean, in a corresponding station in life to his own—I should deprecate, above all things, the encouragement of an extravagant zeal, and the exhibition of poverty, as the instruments of conversion, and the guarantee of moral habits in Ireland. If you admit this principle—if, looking to the education that must be had, and the acquirements that must be attained—looking to the life which a clergyman must lead—the dangers to which he and his family may, perhaps, be exposed—the absence in many parts of Ireland of all society which can be gratifying to the feelings and habits of an educated and intellectual man—the demands upon his charity—what, I ask you, is the sum which you think it would be fair and sufficient to provide for the maintenance in such circumstances of a Protestant clergyman and his family? You have now 1400 benefices in Ireland, 1100 churches, 1400 clergymen, and, in addition, 600 curates, to whom hitherto no reference has been made—how many of these do you propose to reduce? Do you think you can propose, without shocking the feelings of the Protestant population in Ireland, to remove 200 or 300 clergymen from the benefices which they now hold in that country? After making any reductions which you may propose, what sum, I again ask, will you provide as sufficient for the maintenance, in decent independence, of a Protestant clergyman and his family? I should object to any principle of division for the purpose of effecting an equalization of incomes; but if the sum you were to allot does not exceed £300 a-year for each clergyman, suppose it were equally distributed, does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Buxton) think that we are claiming too much, if, in the present state of things, we demand the application of the Church revenues to strictly ecclesiastical purposes?

I will now examine the argument adduced by the right hon. member for the town of Cambridge (Mr. Spring Rice), which seemed to make considerable impression on the House. The argument was this—that by the original endowment of the Irish Church there was a pecuniary charge on account of religious education, and that therefore there could be no injustice to that Church in the appropriation of some part of its revenues to the purposes of national education. Now, I deny the validity and application of that argument. After two days' debate—after a marked difference of opinion on principle between those who had taken a part in it, some contending that the surplus endowments of the Church might be applied to secular purposes, others denying that they could, the right hon. gentleman came down, at the close of the third night's debate, and declared, “There is not the slightest necessity for any difference of opinion between us on the point; I will prove that education is an ecclesiastical purpose, and put an end at once to the whole question in dispute on the authority of King Henry VIII.” But I hold in my hand a report made on education by an authority to which the hon. members opposite will, I have no doubt, be inclined to pay the utmost deference; that authority being no less than the right hon. gentleman (Mr. S. Rice) himself. The report was made so lately as the year 1828. It reviewed the whole of the previous reports on education—it embraced some twenty-three resolutions—it contained a specific reference to the Act of Henry VIII; but not one word is said in the whole of that report, from beginning to end, with respect to education being a pecuniary charge on the Church of Ireland. The right hon. gentleman neither proposed the application of Church revenues to defray the charge of education, nor was he then an advocate for gratuitous education. Now, you are about to decide that question also by your vote; you are about to decide, that education shall be gratuitous in Ireland. I ask you seriously to consider the importance of this principle. I ask you to pause before you sanction it. There are in my mind, the gravest and most serious grounds of doubt with respect to its propriety and expediency. I utterly deny the possibility of applying any such sum as £200,000 annually to education in Ireland without doing much more harm than good. Here is the right hon. gentleman's own report in 1828. I will not refer to it at any length, but the purport of it is to recommend the plan of the noble Lord (Stanley), which was adopted by the House of Commons; but not one word does it contain of the pecuniary charge which he now asserts rests on the Irish Church revenues for purposes of education. On the contrary, here is one of his own resolutions:—“That it is the opinion of this Committee that Parliamentary aid for the establishment and support of schools in Ireland should be for the future restricted in granting aid to parishes to two-thirds of the sum required;" and then follow details of the manner in which the local assessment should be raised; the principal object being to invite individual contributions and assistance towards the erection and superintendence of the schools. This was a wise principle. It was not recommended by economy alone. It proclaimed the great truth, that those who hold property have duties attached to the possession of it, and are bound by local ties to attend to local interests. It established the best link between the rich and the poor. It gave to the rich an interest in the condition of the poor; it confirmed in the poor a feeling of respect and gratitude towards the rich. I do not hesitate to say, that even if you had the money to apply, you would do more harm than good, if you were to relieve the clergy and gentlemen of Ireland from the duty of paying that attention to local matters which those in England are accustomed to pay, from the necessity of local contributions, and local exertions in the cause of local education.

The right hon. gentleman asserts, that the Act of Henry VIII. established the principle, that the charge of education, the pecuniary charge, ought to be defrayed by taxation of the Church. Now I assert, as boldly as the right hon. gentleman asserted the contrary, that the object of the Act of Henry VIII. was, with regard to education, to recognise and confirm the principle of an Established church; and that the inference he has drawn from it, that confers a right to appropriate the surplus of Church revenue to general education, is directly at variance with the fact. The object of that Act was to confirm the progress of religious instruction by subjecting parochial schools to the superintendence of a resident clergyman. The Act expressly recites, that a knowledge of divine truths was essential to education; it was passed, after the declaration of the king's supremacy, after the annihilation, by law at least, of the power of the pope in Ireland. It required an oath to be administered to every clergyman to teach, or to cause to be taught, a school in each parish; thereby recognising and ratifying, in the strongest manner, the principle of an establishment, by stationing a minister in each parish, and placing the education of the parishioners under his charge. I assert, that the intention of the statute of Henry VIII. was not pecuniary contribution, but superintendence; and that is the point on which I am at issue with the right hon. gentleman. He maintained that the object of the act was contribution, and therefore he justified the application of ecclesiastical funds to the purposes of education. Now true it is, that, by subsequent practice, a yearly payment has been made by the clergymen of many parishes in which no school is kept. There is a pecuniary charge in lieu of the spiritual duty. But is there the slightest analogy between establishing, and now, if you please, enforcing that charge—between making each minister either keep a school within his benefice or contribute towards its maintenance, and transferring from the Church a large portion of its revenue, to be applied to a fund placed under other control than that of the Church, and applicable to some system of general education? My assertion, I repeat, is, that the object of the Act of Henry VIII. was superintendence, while the right hon. gentleman maintains that it was contribution. Now the right hon. gentleman had a great many small slips of paper, which he read with great effect in the course of his speech. He alluded to the Report of a Commission which we had appointed many years since, to which he attached the greatest importance, and which consisted of Mr. Frankland Lewis, Mr. Leslie Foster, Mr. Blake, a Roman Catholic gentleman, Mr. Glassford, and Mr. W. Grant, an English barrister; but amidst all the extracts which he adduced for the purpose of proving that the principle of contribution was established by the statute of Henry VIII. there was one, apparently a very material one, which somehow or other seems to have unluckily escaped his notice. Speaking of that very statute, and its bearing on this very subject, these commissioners, so deserving of all confidence, declare, "It is obvious to us that the intention of the statute of Henry VIII. was not pecuniary contribution, but superintendence; and that it did impose the latter duty. This Act, after reciting, among other things, 'the importance of a good instruction in the most blessed laws of Almighty God,' and further reciting his Majesty's disposition and zeal that 'a certain direction and order be had, that all we, his subjects, should the better know God, and do that thing that might in time be, and redound to our wealth, quiet, and commodity,' proceeds, after a variety of enactments tending to the suppression of the Irish and the introduction of the English language and customs, to require an oath to be administered to every clergyman at ordination, and another at institution, that, amongst other things, 'he should keep, or cause to be kept, within the place, territory, or parish where he shall have pre-eminence, rule, benefice, or promotion, a school for to learn English, if any children of his parish come to him to learn the same, taking for the keeping of the same school such convenient stipend or salary as in the said land is accustomed to be given.' What, then, becomes of the argument that the Act of Henry VIII. and the whole tenor of subsequent statutes, authorized the application of the ecclesiastical revenues in Ireland to general instruction unconnected with that Church? The argument is wholly without foundation; and the whole history and tenor of the statutes show that, so far from being at variance with the principle of an establishment, or authorizing the application of ecclesiastical revenues to the purposes of mere general instruction, unconnected with the Established Church, their object was to connect education with the Church, and fortify the principle of an establishment. I myself brought in an Act for the regulation of diocesan schools, which expressly provided for the support of a school in each diocese, to which school the clergy were bound to contribute. If I had sought for a pretext for supporting the noble lord's resolution, on account of that Act, so introduced by me, if I had contended that I was at liberty to carry into execution the principle of the resolution, because I had enforced by laws contributions towards a diocesan school, from the clergy of each diocese, with what a burst of laughter would such reasoning have been received? As to the application of the supposed surplus revenues, I entreat you, from the interest you take in education, not to decide that question at present. If you had the surplus you suppose, nothing could be so unwise as to pledge yourselves to-night on this point. It excludes all after consideration whether education shall be gratuitous or stipendiary. I bring you very great authorities against the principle of gratuitous education. This very commission, to which I have already alluded, whose opinions the right hon gentleman so highly values, and whose authority he ought to appreciate, this very commission states,—“We had in the course of our inspection, been much struck with the state of many schools in which the pupils paid for the instruction they received, and in which there appeared to be perfect harmony amongst children of all persuasions. These schools were carried on as objects of private speculation, and not supported either by public funds, or by the aid of societies. Each child was taught the religion which its parents wished it to learn.” You are assuming that no education at all exists in Ireland, while there never was a country in which there existed more superabundant means of education. This commission again states,—“As to the funds for the maintenance of the new parochial schools, we recommended that they shall be derived partly from the State, partly from parochial assessments, and partly from payment by the pupils. Looking to the results of our own personal examination into schools of all descriptions, to the practical effects of the system so long and so beneficially in operation in Scotland, we are satisfied, that the schools should be founded on the principle of pay-schools, and that the payment should go to the master and the usher. At what sum the rate of payment should be fixed, must depend upon local circumstances. By appointing in certain situations a higher rate of contribution, a most eligible class of schools may readily be provided, with instruction suitable to a better description of persons. Although in all cases, payment by each scholar should be the rule, we recommend that there should be lodged in certain individuals a power of dispensing with the payment, and of admitting, as an exception, certain free scholars. Payment, however, should be the rule, and gratuitous instruction, the exception.” Observe, these recommendations in favour of pay-schools are given, not to save public money, but because the principle of pay-schools is preferred to that of gratuitous education. Now, is it not prudent to inquire, before you affirm the principle that a portion of church revenue should be applied, should be limited also to a given object—What is the amount which that object will require? I complain that you can form no sort of estimate on that subject. You are in utter ignorance respecting it. You don't know the amount of the surplus; you don't know the extent of the demands on it. I charge you with the absurdity of coming to a resolution, without the shadow of a ground on which to form any thing like a rational opinion. The noble lord says, there is a revenue of £791,000;

I say you have not above £450,000, and if you apply the surplus on which the noble lord calculates, to the object to which he expressly confines it, you run great risk of defeating that object. Do I ask that you should abandon any principle? No; but that you should take time carefully to mature your opinion, and thereby prevent unreasonable expectations from being entertained, and pledges from being prematurely and unwisely given. If you will sanction that principle, to which I will not consent—the application of church revenues to other than ecclesiastical purposes—let it be sanctioned with due deliberation. Do not defeat your own public object, for the mere purpose of pressing a motion which you think may be inconvenient to government. The noble lord (Lord John Russell) proposes, if this proposition is acceded to, to move a certain resolution in the committee. The noble lord is not very clear as to the principle by which he is himself guided. On Friday he announced the resolution to this effect:—"That the House should resolve itself into a committee for the purpose of considering the expediency of applying any surplus revenue of the church of Ireland, not required for the erection and repair of churches, or for the maintenance of the clerical members of the church, to the religious and moral instruction of all classes of Christians." Now, I hold that this involves the principle of providing for the endowment of the Roman Catholic clergy. ["Hear, hear," and "No, no, no."] Then why have you altered it? Between Friday and Monday, it was altered to this form:—"That this House resolve itself into a committee of the whole House, in order to consider the present state of the church establishment in Ireland, with the view of applying any surplus of the revenues not required for the spiritual care of its members, to the general education of all classes of the people, without distinction of religious persuasion." I cannot, of course, dive into the noble lord's mind, and ascertain the motives by which he is influenced: I speak only of his acts. Those acts, and the whole course of the debate, show that my construction is the proper one. All your speeches and arguments contribute to that construction. You may attempt as you please to fill over the gulf which separates the noble lord and some of those by whom he is supported; but you are only deceiving yourselves. The people of Ireland will read your speeches and arguments, in which the Protestant Establishment is described as a nuisance and a badge of conquest, and they will laugh at your resolution, and your frivolous attempts to limit your new principle of appropriation, by reference to the acts of Henry VIII., and declarations that education, unconnected with the Church, is an Ecclesiastical purpose. Talk of this as the settlement of the question! What have been the arguments by which the resolution was supported? Let us shortly review them:—the noble lord, the member for Devonshire, said, on introducing the resolution,—"I am one of those fully concurring in the defence set up last year by one of our prelates, that an establishment tends to promote religion, to maintain good order; and I further agree with him as to the fact that it is agreeable to the sentiments of the majority of the people of this part of the empire. But, as a friend of the United Kingdom, I call upon you to consider whether, with respect to the Church of Ireland, you can set up the same defence? Does it tend to promote religion, or to maintain good order?" But that Church is still to be maintained in all its efficiency.—["No, no."]—What, is the efficiency of the Church to be impaired? I thought you affected the most pious care for its efficiency, and that you were anxious to curtail its superfluous wealth in order to promote the efficiency of the Church. The seconder of the noble lord's resolution (the hon. member for St. Alban's) asks this question:—"How, then, could a Church which was not submitted to, or joined through the force of reason and argument, be considered by the people as anything but a badge of conquest, forced on them by a superior power, which it was but natural they should determine to throw off at the first favourable opportunity?" and he adds,—take the Protestant states, take Catholic ones, take America, or France, or Scotland, or even the North of Ireland itself, and it would be found, in every instance, that the remuneration which the clergy received was always proportioned to the religious services which they performed for the people. In Ireland alone this relation was departed from; and never, until they established that relation upon its proper footing, until they reverted, in fact, to the principles of common sense, could they succeed in governing that country with credit or satisfaction." Yes; but if you appeal to this as a principle of common sense;

if common sense requires that the remuneration of the clergy should be in proportion to religious service, without reference to the doctrines inculcated, or the faith held; and if you then move a resolution in which a different practice is adhered to—in which you state that the Church of the minority shall be maintained—in which you recognise it as a favoured establishment, how can you insult our common sense by saying that you regard this as a permanent settlement? The noble lord opposite, of whose abilities I have a high opinion, and whose eminence in debate I have long since prophesied, has made some observations to which I will next advert. The Lord Howick said—but I am really so unfeignedly anxious to avoid exciting any animosities connected with religion in the course of my address, that I shall not read the extract now in my hand. It is not, indeed, material to my present argument: I will pass on to another defender of the resolution, Mr. Charles Wood. He asks,—“Where could they find any country, under any system of Church establishments, be they Catholic or Protestant, where a rich Church with a small congregation was maintained at the expense of an overwhelming majority belonging to a different persuasion? But their feelings were no less outraged than their property was taxed, in the maintenance of one Church established by law, and in support of another to which ministry they contributed through inclination. What, he would ask, would be their feelings if two such establishments were supported at the expense of the people of England? Would they not be filled with a just indignation at such an unwarrantable infliction upon their consciences and resources? and could they expect that when they, with all their superior notions of what was just and lawful, were unwilling to submit to the hardship, that the ignorant peasantry of Ireland should not give way to violence and outrage when such a system was attempted to be forced upon them?” The member for Shaftesbury (Mr. Poulter) says,—“No length of time, no lapse of ages, should prevent his hearty concurrence in an effort to redress a great national iniquity. No appeal to the rights of property, beyond existing laws, can ever be maintained where such rights were never united with the real and religious interests of a nation. In such a case no prescription can be urged against the cries of a people, and the voice of the people becomes the voice of God. It may be admitted that any change in long-established things is an evil, and that nothing can justify it but the most powerful necessity. If the peace and prosperity of Ireland be essential to the welfare of the empire, such a necessity has now arisen.” Now, then, I ask you whether, if this resolution, supported by those arguments, can possibly lay the foundation of a final settlement? But it is most important that such a settlement should be made. You impose this charge upon the landlord. Ay, but the amount is to be recovered from a Catholic peasantry! Do not suppose that you are blinding the eyes of the people. They are more clear-sighted than you imagine. They see, and feel, and know that your arguments do not correspond with your resolution. A stronger, a truer, an honest declaration would be better. This resolution may have the advantage of enabling you to act together for this night; but you act on different principles, and with different views, to the furtherance of which you severally look, though you are agreeing in common to-night on a vague and general resolution. You are well aware that this can be no final settlement; that this first deduction from church revenues will only be accepted as an instalment of that whole amount which is held in contemplation. You have laid to my charge, in the course of debate, that I have lagged behind public opinion, and kept in the rear of improvement. But your course is still more absurd; you lag behind your own arguments, and keep far in the rear of your own conclusions. You shoot an arrow, and do not seek for it in the place where you know it is to be found. A word on the charge of being in the rear of public opinion. It is the common accusation against those who value and adhere to ancient institutions. It presumes that it is the duty of a public man to be eternally unsettling the laws and usages under which his country is governed, to be speculating what change will next be required by public opinion; not to wait till the direction and intensity of that opinion be ascertained, but to anticipate it by voluntary and uncalled for innovation. This may sound very plausible and very philosophical; but the result will be, the entire unsettlement not only of the institutions, but of the mind of the country; the introduction of a vague, pru-riant love of change for the sake of change, precluding all rational and sober inquiry into the effects of such change. Surely, if an ancient principle must be abandoned, the new principle ought to be a secure one. If a new position must be taken, it ought to be capable of defence. But you take one which not only is indefensible, but which you prove to be so,—against which your own batteries are directed with a resistless fire. I see the applauding smile of the hon. member for Middlesex; he is too shrewd to be deluded by this resolution; he is not to be deceived or misled by the soft tale of the hon. gentlemen near him, who declare that, loving in their hearts the protestant establishment, they yet support this measure. He votes for this resolution knowing perfectly well the conclusion to which it must lead. He will soon find out, with me, that education would only be encumbered and impeded by this contemplated grant. A good pretext will not be wanting. Then will the hon. member once more triumphantly bring forward his resolutions of 1824. Why should the hon. member not force his propositions on you? I have no doubt that he will. I am now looking into the womb of futurity, and am as certain of what it will produce as I am of anything in the history of the past. I feel as certain as that I am now standing here, that the hon. member is too manly not to declare that he is not satisfied with this principle. He does not, in this measure, meditate a final settlement. You cannot meditate it either. I therefore will not consent to appropriate this property, which is ecclesiastical, and connected with the Protestant establishment, to other purposes than those of that establishment. I will not assent to your resolution, because I know how worthless and delusive it is; because I know that it is a measure which sends into Ireland, not peace, but a sword. It will excite in that unhappy country false hopes—hopes which you cannot realise, and yet hopes that you will shrink from disappointing. It will unsettle those foundations of property which are built upon prescription, and which are more secure than those on which you are erecting your new system of spoliation. I give the noble lord fair notice that I shall oppose his motion for going into committee, and that, in committee, I shall oppose his resolution; and, lastly, that I shall oppose with all my strength the communication of that resolution to his Majesty. I say I will oppose the communication of that resolution to the king, and I will oppose it on these grounds:—the course is novel and unprecedented, it is unnecessary for the purposes it professes. It wears all the appearance of an intention to pass by the House of Lords. If you think that course the most advisable, take it openly—take it honestly. Let us fight the battle manfully, on distinct and avowed grounds. But let us not first have a shallow, delusive resolution, and then as shallow and delusive an appearance of passing by the House of Lords. Every one who heard the noble lord's declaration, those, especially, who cheered it, thought the threatened address to the king was meant as a slight upon the House of Lords—as an intimation that the assent of the Lords to the resolution was not worth asking for. But the noble lord means no such thing in reality; he means, as a mere matter of preliminary form, to ask the king's consent, not to a legislative measure, but to the discussion and consideration of a subject in which certain rights of the Crown are concerned. But why is it that the noble lord and his friends have not brought in a bill? Are they uncertain of their plan? Are they ashamed of presenting, in the ordinary course, the result of their calm, and solemn, and mature deliberation? Do they shrink from producing that detailed plan which they have so deeply and anxiously considered? Is this a course worthy of the noble lord? The king will resign certain rights by this bill; and it is necessary for him to signify formally, some time in the course of the proceeding, his assent, which at all times was wont to be done by the minister in a modest manner, without any parade, and without the excitement of the least interest. But now the noble lord, without assigning any reason for a line of conduct so unprecedented and so inconvenient, insists on the immediate communication to his Majesty, and this, not for the purpose of avoiding the necessity of further measures of superseding a bill; but, simply, that a formal intimation of the king's pleasure respecting certain of his rights, affected by this motion, may be received with all possible publicity, and that some of the supporters of the noble lord may cherish the delusion that this course implies a slight to the House of Lords. I do not think the House will join the noble lord in this unbecoming enterprise. I, at least, for one will never be a party to it. But, suppose the resolution agreed to, by whom is it to be communicated to his Majesty? I hope there will be a nice and cautious selection. Instead of encumbering the Throne by the attendance of the whole House, or of any large part of it, why should you not send a deputation? It is the prevailing fashion. Why not send a deputation of three? I will name it for you. I beg to suggest that the noble lord, the hon. member for Middlesex, and the hon. and learned member for the city of Dublin, should be the three members to approach the Throne with this resolution. Surely the noble lord ought to thank me for the felicity, as they say, of this suggestion. Here we have the representatives of the three kingdoms—an Englishman, an Irishman, and a Scotelman. [hear, hear, and laughter]; and, moreover, the representatives of the three parties which follow the noble leader in this House. It is not for me to anticipate the answer of the Crown on the address so presented. A formal answer must necessarily be returned to any communication from this House to the Crown; but, if it were possible for his Majesty to speak the plain truth, I could suggest an answer which would be very appropriate, though, possibly, very unpalatable. His Majesty might say to the noble lord,—“You, last year, were one of my confidential advisers: on your advice, I issued a Commission of Inquiry, which was to collect information in Ireland. You told us that inquiry was an essential preliminary to any actual proceeding—that matters were not ripe for legislation—that you could not appropriate a surplus, without having first ascertained its existence—that pledges as to contingent appropriation were most unwise. How can you, who were a party to this advice, now ask me, in the absence of all information, the inquiry being yet incomplete, to give that pledge, which last year, you deprecated as precipitate and unwise?” So much for the answer to the noble lord. The member for Dublin, Mr. O’Connell, would then present himself; and to him it might be said by his Majesty,—“I have not forgotten the speech which I delivered from the Throne, on the advice of Lord John Russell, in the year 1834. On that solemn occasion, I observed, ‘that I had seen with feelings of deep regret and just indignation the continuance of attempts to excite the people of Ireland to demand a repeal of the Legislative Union. This bond of our national strength and safety I have already declared my fixed and unalterable resolution, under the blessing of Divine Providence, to maintain inviolate by all the means in my power. In support of this determination, I cannot doubt the zealous and effectual co-operation of my parliament and my people.’” His Majesty might then remark to the learned gentleman, that this passage, which so strenuously declares the determination to support the Union between the countries, guarantees the security of the Church; and the Protestant Church being guaranteed by the Act of Union, his Majesty would not be maintaining the Union inviolate, if he consented to violate that Protestant Established Church, which was an essential and fundamental part of it. I believe the prospect of such answers—not formal, perhaps, and according to precedent, but warranted by facts, and consistent with truth—would disincite the noble lord to form part of the deputation which should be charged with the duty of presenting the resolution to the king.

This House has yet the power, consistently with the full adherence to its principles, to refuse to enter into this resolution. I tell you beforehand, I will not be the party to give it effect. I will not be a party to any appropriation of the revenue of the Church to other than ecclesiastical purposes. You differ with me—I address myself to the hon. gentlemen on the other side;—but I say that, consistently with the exercise of that different opinion, you may refuse to enter into this discussion at this time, and under these peculiar circumstances. The noble lord has given us the opportunity of uniting in our vote, though we may differ as to the principle. If you agree with me in a desire to defer this important question, you sacrifice nothing—you only decline asserting a general principle, without having laid before you the particular plan by which it is proposed to calculate it. For myself, I vote against the committee on principle; but if you, differing with me on principle, vote against this motion, you may do it with a distinct reserve, that, at the proper time, you will enforce your own principle, and reject mine. You have confidence in that principle. If it be worthy of that confidence, it must be capable of execution. It can only be executed by detailed enactments, embodied into a bill. I will give every facility for this; I will, without opposition, let you bring in a bill, let it be read a first time, and postpone the discussion until after Easter. I was showing a mode by which, without any unworthy concession, you might have got rid of the difficulty under which I am convinced the majority of you must be labouring. I am suggesting that which is the natural and the ordinary course. It saves you from the risk of great eventual embarrassment. It enables you to dispense with the immediate decision on questions the most important, which you have very imperfectly considered. You will thus have an opportunity of deliberating and deciding whether your system of education in Ireland shall be gratuitous or stipendiary, or in what degree the two principles shall be combined. You will also have the opportunity of acquiring accurate information respecting the revenues of the Irish Church which, allow me to observe, respectfully but firmly, it is your duty to obtain before you attempt to legislate on the subject. There is a difference to the amount of £340,000 annually between the noble lord and myself. He positively asserts that the amount of church revenue is £791,000, and I as positively declare that I believe it to be under £450,000. I say, then, that it would be but justice to the Church to ascertain, beyond all possibility of dispute, which of us is correct in his calculation, or what is the extent of our respective errors. By postponing your resolutions until the committee on the bill, you will have the advantage of the report of the commissioners, to which great importance is attributed by the hon. members opposite. I ask you, then, to concur with me in relieving the noble lord himself from the great practical difficulty in which he is placed. No man will more rejoice than the noble lord if you will but be good enough to obey my voice and come to the rescue. He has been brought into his present unfortunate situation by the advice of indiscreet friends. He did not give notice of this motion. The hon. member for St. Alban's stood originally the sponsor to it. The noble lord was obliged to take it out of his hands, and yet was conscious of his own want of information. He asked, first, for the whole report of his own commission; then for a partial report; but could obtain neither, for neither was forthcoming. He courted delay; but time pressed: he was obliged to go on. He saw the expediency and the good policy of waiting for information; but he was compelled to yield to the pressure not "from without," but from behind. I am convinced that you will be conferring a favour upon the noble lord by entreating him to withdraw his motion. I have no objection that he should withdraw it—to withdraw it until he can produce some practical plan for our consideration, some plan in which you can concur. Let us, then, unite in endeavouring to rescue the noble lord from the situation in which he is placed, and refrain from interrupting that approaching happiness which his opponents wish him as cordially as his friends. The hon. member for Weymouth, in the course of his speech, told you that where there were differences of opinion there should be inquiry. Are you, then, prepared, in defiance of his authority, to proceed without inquiry? Will you not wait until you receive that information which you are led to believe will enable you to act consistently with your present views, and to act without the shadow of an imputation on your conduct? Let us not, then, enter into any hasty decision, which may preclude us from the possibility of a satisfactory final settlement.

You may insist on your present resolution—you may succeed in forcing it upon us: I shall not have to wish you joy of your triumph. It may, probably enable you to embarrass the future progress of the administration; it may be the token of approaching victory: but still do not be too confident. Let me, in the moment of your pride, in the buoyancy of your exultations, usurp the functions of that unpalatable but not unfriendly office which, in former times, was assigned to a slave, but which may be assumed by a freeman without derogation from his character. You boast that you exercise complete control over the executive government of the country: but let me whisper in your ear, that, though triumphant here, the power that you exercise does not act without these walls with that intensity with which it operates within. The duty I have voluntarily assumed compels me to place before a triumphant conqueror the vanity of human wishes, and the instability of mortal triumphs, but yet I must not shrink from it; and I tell you, that, notwithstanding your vaunted majorities, you do not control public opinion. Yes, there is a public opinion, which exists independently of elective franchises, which votes cannot inspire, which majorities cannot control, but which is an essential instrument of executive government. It will yield obedience to law; but, if there be not confidence in the decisions of this House, law itself will lose half its authority. That public opinion will impose on you the necessity of taking a direct and open course. The people of England will not sanction attempts to throw unfair obstacles in the way of the executive government. They would sanction a direct vote of want of confidence, so far, at least, as to consider it a legitimate and constitutional act of hostility. Why have you not the manliness to propose it? Why do you implore me to undertake the settlement of this question on your principles? You are confident in your strength: let me ask you, are you competent to undertake the government? If you are, undertake it. If you are not, why do you embarrass us? I will not enforce your resolution. I will give you notice of the course that I mean to pursue. I shall oppose your motion for a committee. I shall oppose your resolution in committee, and, above all things, and most strenuously, I shall oppose your communication of that resolution to his Majesty. I shall adhere to the principles of my own measure. Such is the necessity for the settlement of the tithe question, that it will admit of no further delay. I shall press it forward; and if you signify an intention of continuous opposition,—if your determination to throw unusual impediments in the way of the government be plainly indicated,—if I find I shall not be able to proceed with the immediate settlement of this question,—I shall then acknowledge that the time has arrived when it will not be possible for me, consistently with my sense of the duty and the honour of a public man, to remain in the situation which I at present hold.

* Lord John Russell having replied, the House divided, and the motion was carried by 322 to 289; majority, 33.

APRIL 3, 1835.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Irish Church—

Lord John Russell moved, “That it is the opinion of this committee that any surplus which may remain, after fully providing for the spiritual instruction of the members of the Established Church in Ireland, ought to be applied, locally, to the general education of all classes of Christians.”

After a long and stormy debate, Colonel Sibthorp moved, that the chairman do leave the chair.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, it may appear to some desirable to come to a decision on this important subject to-night; but there are others who wished to be heard before the question now under consideration is finally disposed of. An immediate decision may, I admit, be approved of by a majority of those now present; but I must put it to the House whether it is not due to the constituencies of the hon. members who still wish to speak, to allow them an opportunity of obtaining a hearing? I have no doubt that it is the anxious desire of many of the constituent bodies throughout the country, that their representatives should express their sentiments on this important occasion; and I can answer that it is the wish of an hon. friend of mine, who is not now in his place, to have an opportunity of delivering his opinions before this debate closes. As far as I am personally concerned, I could wish that the proceedings on this resolution should terminate to-night, but, seeing that there are not now present more than half the number of members who voted last night, I think it would not be quite fair to come to a decision in their absence, especially as many of them have gone away under the impression that they would be allowed an opportunity of declaring their sentiments. Considering, however, that this debate has lasted five nights, I must acknowledge—and in this I think the House will agree with me—that we have heard quite enough upon the subject; but still, as it is desirable that we should, if possible, attach confidence in our decision, I think it only right that every one who may wish to speak should be allowed a fair hearing. I do not mean by this to express any opinion, but merely to offer my advice; and although I am free to admit that it would be more convenient to come to a decision at once, I still think, upon the whole, we will best consult the general wish by allowing all parties fair play.

In reply to a remark by Mr. O'Dwyer—

Sir Robert Peel would leave it to the candour of the hon. member whether, after what he had then said, he should not vote with him for the adjournment. The hon. member asked if he (Sir R. Peel) had ever known an instance, where a debate had been protracted to four nights, in which a debate was adjourned in consequence of a wish expressed by members to deliver their opinions. [Mr. O'Dwyer: After the majority had been fully ascertained.] There was a motion brought forward last year for the repeal of the Legislative Union, in which the number on the one side was 43 ; and on the other side 400 odd (he forgot the exact number) ; but it was in consequence of the wish of that small minority to deliver their sentiments, that the House consented again to adjourn the motion. In that case he believed, too, that the majority was pretty well ascertained when the motion was agreed to. After this instance, he hoped that the hon. gentleman would justify the confidence he had in him, by voting for the motion of adjournment.

Lord John Russell was understood to say, that if the right hon. baronet would agree to permit the debate to be resumed before the Orders of the Day were taken on Monday, he would not any longer oppose the adjournment.

Sir Robert Peel reminded the noble lord, that he (Sir R. Peel) had said, at the commencement of the evening, that he hoped the debate would close to-night, and, as far as he was personally concerned, he should be satisfied if it were so. Although he thought that the postponement of the Orders of the Day fixed for Monday, might be attended with public inconvenience, he had no objection to acquiesce in the proposal of the noble lord.

The House resumed, the chairman reported progress, and the committee to sit again on Monday.

APRIL 7, 1835.

Mr. Bernal brought up the Report of the Committee of the whole House on the Established Church of Ireland, which was read. On the question that it be read a second time,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said: This, I apprehend, is the main resolution which we shall be called upon to vote; it is, in fact, exactly the same that was adopted last night. As there is no rational ground to suppose that the change from a committee where it was carried, to the whole House where it is to be confirmed, will make any difference in the view taken of the question, the noble lord will not infer the slightest alteration of opinion in those who resisted the resolution last night, if we do not now think it necessary to press the question to a division. The reason why we do not, is because the noble lord has given notice of another motion, the purport of which, we have been informed, will be that this House will not consent to any Tithe Bill, of which the principle of the resolution does not form a part. Upon that I shall certainly take the sense of the House, which will preclude the necessity of wasting time upon the resolution just read.

Report read a second time.

Lord John Russell then proposed, “That it is the opinion of this House, that no measure upon the subject of tithes in Ireland, can lead to a satisfactory and final adjustment, which does not embody the principle contained in the foregoing resolution.”

Sir Robert Peel did not know that he should have felt it necessary to say a word upon this occasion, if, during almost the whole of the debate which had taken place that evening, it had not been assumed that the House was again discussing precisely the same question that had formed the subject of six previous nights' debate. He, however, apprehended that the question which had formed the subject of discussion during those six nights, was, at an early period of the present evening, disposed of. The House having last night affirmed the resolution of the noble lord in committee, he, that evening, on the resolution being reported, considering that there was no probability that any variance of opinion would be expressed by the House from that which it had expressed in committee, permitted the report to pass without discussion and without a division. But the resolution which the House was now called upon to affirm was this:—“That no measure upon the subject of tithes in Ireland can lead to a satisfactory and final adjustment which does not embody the foregoing resolution.” He had great objection to the form of the present resolution, and to the precedent which it would establish—a precedent perfectly novel, and with respect to which the noble lord himself must have entertained great doubts, since it was an entire departure from the course which he originally gave notice it was his intention to pursue. [Cheers.] The noble lord, in the first instance, said, that if the House of Commons affirmed his resolution, he would notify that fact to the Crown by address, in order to enable him to proceed with a bill. What did he now propose to do? He had passed his resolution: he proposed to make no communication to the Crown, he proposed to make no communication to the House of Lords, but he did propose that the House of Commons should inform itself that it had passed the resolution, and that it would hereafter be irrevocably bound by it. [Cheers.] The noble lord now called upon the House to declare, that no measure which should not embody the principle of a certain resolution could lead to a satisfactory settlement of the tithe question. He objected to that proposition. He thought it would be most unwise in the House to declare beforehand, that one single measure could alone lead to a final and satisfactory result. [Hear, hear.] Those who approved of the resolution originally moved by the noble lord, were perfectly at liberty to object to his present proposition. [Hear, hear.] A majority of the House—a majority of 25—had affirmed a certain resolution, against which a minority of 289 protested, independently of those who paired off, making altogether a minority of about 300 members. The noble lord now called upon the House again to affirm the principle of that resolution in a still more binding manner—to declare that all further discussion was unnecessary—that no proceedings in committee on the Tithe Bill needed to be listened to—that there was but one measure which could effect a final and satisfactory settlement of the tithe question, and that was the measure to which a small majority of the House had agreed. He (Sir Robert Peel) did not hesitate to denounce this proceeding as the tyrannical act of a majority [vehement cheering for some minutes]; the tyrannical act of a majority, by a proceeding of a perfectly novel nature—a proceeding for which no precedent could be found, precluding the necessity of further discussion, closing the opportunities of new arguments; resolving that they would not be convinced, binding themselves by an unnecessary pledge to maintain, under all circumstances, a certain opinion. This course of proceeding was unwise in itself, besides establishing a dangerous precedent. [Hear.] What was the resolution which the noble lord called upon the House to affirm? It was, that if there should be a surplus of church revenue, it should be appropriated to one single specific purpose, to the exclusion of all other objects. The House had already recorded its opinion—it had had it in its power to wait for the report of the Committee on Public Instruction, and it would be perfectly consistent even in those who thought that the surplus ought to be appropriated in the manner proposed in the noble lord's resolution, to wait until this House could avail themselves of information which would be contained in the report of the Commissioners, and thus avoid making the precipitate pledge which was now demanded from them. [Hear, hear.] The noble lord himself had that night, with singular candour, told the House, that he could not bring forward any detailed plan for the enforcement of his own principle, until he had seen and considered the report of the Commissioners. [Loud cheers.] Would the House of Commons, then, adopt a course of proceeding by which it would preclude itself from profiting by the information which must be contained in the report of the Commissioners? Would they adopt the novel course of pledging themselves irrevocably to a principle—of prophesying that one thing, and one thing only, could lead to a final and satisfactory settlement? The adoption of the resolution now before the House would cut off all chance of that which was sometimes absolutely necessary for the wisest and most infallible in the conduct of human affairs—namely, all possibility of compromise. Occasions sometimes occurred in which it was necessary for one branch of the legislature to modify its opinions, for the purpose of effecting an amicable agreement with another branch on some great public question; but now it was proposed, that one of the three branches of the legislature should, without waiting for the result of inquiries, which are acknowledged to be essential to the formation of any plan, declare, that they would adhere to a principle which they had laid down, and listen to no compromise whatever. [Hear, hear!] If that course were adopted, the public men who were parties to it would be bound up from acting on the possible necessities of the future—the House of Commons would be cut off from the exercise of a free judgment—from the means of wise and honourable compromise, and would establish a precedent for insisting on the execution of its own designs, even before those designs had been moulded into the shape of a legislative enactment. [Hear, hear!] What was the object of all this precipitation? If there was a majority sufficient to carry the resolution, it must be sufficient to enforce the principle of that resolution hereafter. Why, then, not wait for the committee on the Tithe Bill? Was not the conduct of the Opposition, in fact, a practical declaration to the people of England to this effect:—"We have confidence in our resolution, but we have no confidence in ourselves?" [Loud and continued cheering.] It seemed necessary for the parties to this proceeding to swear eternal friendship upon their resolution. For two months, they had been attempting to discover a common bond, by which they could unite themselves in opposition to the king's government; at length they discovered one, and so anxious were they in all times of future difficulty and embarrassment, to adhere to it with desperate fidelity, that they were afraid to trust their own discretion—they were afraid to trust in the permanence of their new alliance—they were afraid to trust their own perseverance in their own opinion, but they proposed, by a novel course, to bind themselves to each other, not to dissolve their only tie. [Great cheering.] He objected to the precedent it was proposed to establish, which was one which any majority hereafter might follow. Henceforth, it would be merely necessary to gain a majority upon some preliminary point, and then to declare that no compromise would be admitted. By agreeing to the present resolution, the House would not only adopt the noble lord's principle, but would proclaim to the people of England and Ireland, that the only satisfactory arrangement of the Tithe Question must be founded upon the basis of a principle, from which 300 members of the Commons dissented. [Hear].

The sentiments which he had heard in the course of the discussion, had not tended in any degree to diminish the apprehensions which the former debate excited in his mind. [Hear, hear!] In whatever respect new ground had been taken that night, it was still more dangerous than the ground occupied before. The noble lord was asked, how he meant to ascertain the surplus? He was asked to give some explanation of his principle; and in the course of that very short speech, in which he professed his inability to produce any plan until he had seen the report of the commissioners, he ventured on an explanation of his principle, and it was to this effect: "If there be in the south of Ireland, in Kerry or Limerick, for instance, livings superfluously endowed, in that case it would give no satisfaction to the payers of tithe in the parishes to which those livings belong, to transfer the surplus to supply deficit endowments in the north, in Down or in Derry; but the surplus ought to be applied to the purposes of education in the parish from which such surplus is derived." If that principle were followed out, it would establish a separate, peculiar, local, parochial interest in the amount of tithes; it would constitute each parish into a separate territorial division, and proclaim to the people of Ireland, that henceforth each parish should have a separate and peculiar interest in the amount of tithe levied within it. ["Hear," from the Opposition.] The hon. members who cheered affirmed that proposition. Then, he asked, in answer to their cheers, on what pretence will you limit the appropriation of the surplus to purposes of education? (Cheers.) After having established a separate, peculiar, and parochial interest in the surplus, will you declare, that to no one purpose shall it be applied excepting that of education in each particular parish. (Hear, hear!) Supposing a parish should answer, "We have education enough already—we have several endowments for the purposes of education—the Protestant landlords have established schools—our children are all amply instructed, there are no demands in our parish for further education; at our own desire, and with a view to maintain our independence, we voluntarily make a small payment for each child, and we require no more funds for the purpose of instruction;" in such a case, how would the noble lord's limitation of his principle satisfy public opinion in the parish of which I am speaking as an example? Supposing the noble lord were to assign the surplus to a neighbouring parish, less amply provided with the means of instruction, did he think that that application of it would create more satisfaction than if he transferred it to a distant one? Did he, who objected to the transfer to Down or to Derry, believe that after the establishment of his principle, the providing for the wants of an adjoining parish from the tithes of its neighbour would give satisfaction to the payer of those tithes? From what he (Sir Robert Peel) knew of local funds in Ireland, he was sure that the application of surplus parochial funds to the necessities of a neighbouring parish was not likely to be received with greater favour than their transference to the north of Ireland.

Thus, after disturbing all existing notions with respect to property, the noble lord would fail to give satisfaction to the people of Ireland, which was the only object which he professed to have in view. But did the noble lord recollect that he himself was a party to a measure which made an important change with respect to large and overpaid livings in the south of Ireland—he alluded to the Church 'Temporalities' Bill, which was passed only two years ago? The preamble of that bill was utterly at variance with the noble lord's resolution. That bill was the last legislative declaration on the subject of the Established Church; and it was a declaration made on the advice, and at the instance of the noble lord; it distinctly laid down the principle of a different distribution of church property; it distinctly laid down the principle, that overpaid livings might be curtailed, that tithes might be detached from arch-bishopries and bishoprics; it laid down the principle that sinecures in the church should be abolished, and the proceeds appropriated to certain purposes; but then, there was this express limitation, that those purposes should be ecclesiastical, such as the building, rebuilding, and repairing of churches, the augmentation of small livings, and such other purposes as might conduce to the advancement of religion, and the efficiency, permanency, and stability of the United Church of England and Ireland. (Cheers.) Thus, the ecclesiastical funds were limited to purposes strictly ecclesiastical, and the object of the noble lord's act was declared to be, to give permanence and stability to the United Church of England and Ireland. What confidence could the people place in the intentions or resolutions of that House, when it saw them exhibiting such utter disregard to the enactments, to the main principles of bills brought in—not last century—not forty years ago—not by a Tory government—not by the devoted friends of the church—but by the government of which the noble lord was a member? (Cheers.) The noble lord had forgotten not only the preamble, but the enactments of that bill. These overpaid livings in the south of Ireland, which caused such scandal, and were so offensive in the eyes of the noble lord. ["Hear, hear!" from the Opposition.] He could assure the hon. gentlemen who cheered that he was going to prove, that the noble lord was a greater reformer than he had given himself credit for being; that the noble lord had already made provision for the correction of those very abuses in the church of which he was now so grievously complaining. Such, however, was the modesty of the noble lord, so oblivious was he of his own good deeds, that he had actually forgotten the enactments of the bill, of which he was one of the most powerful supporters, which provided a most effectual remedy for the very evils which now appeared to shock him so much; for by one of the clauses of the bill it was expressly provided, that if any livings should be found in the south, or in any other part of Ireland, with incomes exceeding £800 a-year, it should be competent to commissioners to detach the tithes of certain townlands from them, and assign them to neighbouring livings, for the purpose of securing a resident minister. The limitation placed by the bill on the extent of the deductions from these livings, was this, that no living should be cut down below £300 per annum. If, therefore, the noble lord would apply the principle of his own bill, through the agency of his own commissioners, he would destroy all the enormous livings in the south of Ireland, whose funds he now wished to apply to purposes of education. (Hear, hear.)

Let the House now look practically to the consequences which must follow from the adoption of the noble lord's proposition. After the resolution had gone forth, a resolution adopted after much parade—after a call of the House—after a debate, protracted to seven nights—the people in every parish in the south of Ireland would naturally scan it with a keenness proportionate to all this preliminary parade, and attempt to ascertain its real meaning. The noble lord proposed that any surplus which might be obtained should be applied exclusively to education, on the express ground that education is an ecclesiastical purpose; but how those hon. gentlemen on the other side, who maintain that the surplus could, and ought to, be applied to secular purposes, could consent to bind themselves by the terms of the noble lord's resolution, he (Sir R. Peel) could not understand. However, that was a point for them to settle. He (Sir R. Peel) was glad of the limitation, because, if spoliation was to be committed, it was gratifying to know that it was proposed to confine it within certain definite bounds; but how could such limitation meet the approval of those who declared that the noble lord's resolution was only valuable on account of the principle which it contained? The hon. member for Derbyshire, who had, by his own confession, been searching for precedents, had been able to quote only two authorities in justification of the principle of spoliation, one an ancient, the other a modern one. His authorities were Henry VIII. and Captain Macheath. (Laughter.) The hon. member, after giving him (Sir R. Peel) credit for his historical knowledge as regarded Henry VIII., was kind enough to assume that he was equally cognizant of the principles and practices of Captain Macheath. He knew this at least of the character and exploits of the captain—that he was a wiser man than the hon. member; for he never appropriated a surplus till he had ascertained its existence. (Great cheering and laughter.) True; the captain applied his surplus to secular purposes. (Laughter.) So far his example was a precedent, but he differed from those who appealed to his authority in this respect, that his surplus was never an imaginary one. But, to return to the noble lord: when the noble lord's resolution should arrive in Ireland, accompanied by the speeches of the noble lord, and all the hon. members who had supported it, the people would find it distinctly explained, that their interest in tithes was a local and parochial interest—that tithes belonged, not to the church, not to the state, but to each parish from which they were derived. They were further forewarned, that, in case the Protestant interest should hereafter revive in a parish in which the surplus had been appropriated according to the noble lord's principle, the new interests which might have accrued in the mean time were liable to be set aside, and the fund re-applied to its original purpose. (Hear, hear!) Suppose a vacancy should take place in a living of £1,000 a-year, who was to determine what would be a fitting provision for the Protestant clergyman? This question would arise upon every vacancy. There would be a public meeting. The number of souls then in existence would be counted; the Roman Catholic clergyman would be at work; the expectant Protestant clergyman would urge his claim; the whole parish would be aroused from its slumber; for there would be a manifest interest in diminishing as far as possible the stipend set apart for the Protestant minister. That stipend, be its amount what it might, would be regarded with an evil eye as a superfluous charge on the parish purse—as a diminution from the amount applicable to parochial purposes of public utility. See how many conflicting interests would be called into life by this new principle of appropriation; to how many new elements of social discord it would give birth. The Protestant landlord would have a direct interest in collecting round him as numerous a Protestant tenantry as possible, in order to establish a claim—an eventual claim, at least—to a part of the surplus. The more strong his sense of religion, the greater would be his interest in the establishment of this claim on behalf of the faith which he professed. You thus gave him a new interest, an interest recommended to him by the highest and purest principles, to surround himself with a Protestant tenantry, that is to say, to dispossess Roman Catholic tenants of their land on the expiring of leases, and supply their places by Protestants. On the other hand, the Catholic population would have a direct interest in intimidating and driving away Protestants; and thus religious jealousies would be added to the other causes which at present rendered the letting and the holding of land in Ireland sources of excitement and disturbance. Again, supposing the case to which he had already referred—namely, that a surplus should be found in a parish in which the means of education were already abundant, would not the Catholics say, “You have established the principle, that we have an interest in the surplus; we shall derive no advantage from the application of that surplus to instruction, and, therefore, we insist that it shall be applied to some other local purpose, and not diverted to another parish.” How could the noble lord answer that argument? (Hear, hear!) How could he, with his principles, divert the tithes—the parochial fund, which must not be transferred to Derry or to Down—how could he divert it to another parish? What endless discord there would be! The other parish might be tithe free. “Are we,” the tithe-paying parishioners will say—“are we to pay tithe for the benefit of those who are exempt? We had a resident clergyman under the old system. He did spend the produce of our tithe among those who paid it; but now the tithe is to be paid, as before, but it will be applied to the benefit of others.” (Hear, hear!)

and learned member, he would add, that, strange as it might seem to some hon. members opposite, there was very little difference between them (Sir R. Peel and Mr. Perrin). The hon. and learned gentleman did not advocate the doctrine of the hon. member for Derbyshire, that the legislature might be indifferent with respect to gospel truth. The hon. member for Derbyshire was evidently an enemy to all establishments. Why, on his principles, would he allow the establishment to exist in England? It was no answer to say, that it was supported by the majority of the people; because, according to the hon. member, there should be no endowment of any one form of worship. Endowments, according to him, obstructed the progress of truth; and each religion, whether pure or corrupt, should be allowed to make its own way. If this argument was good for any thing, it clearly applied, not to the church in Ireland exclusively, but to the establishment in this country. The hon. member for Cashel, however, was an advocate for religious establishments. Said the hon. member, "I find a certain parish in Monaghan which contains but four Protestant families—the amount now allotted to their spiritual guide I will reduce—but I will provide the four families with the means of religious instruction."

Why, the noble lord, the member for Lancashire (Lord Stanley), had not gone one step farther than this. He said if there were ten Protestants in a parish, he would secure to them the means of religious instruction, and the opportunities of divine worship according to the rites of the Established Church. Or rather, what he said was this. If they have now such means, I will not consent to deprive them of what they possess. And what said the hon. gentleman? Not only that he would not deprive them of them, but that there should be—not, indeed, an overpaid absentee rector, with an income of £700 a-year—but a resident Protestant pastor to administer the offices of religion to those who required them—not with the paltry stipend of £75 a-year, which the curate now receives for his services, but with an income of £250. Here, then, would be £250 a-year allotted with a wise liberality, not only for the spiritual instruction of four Protestant families, but for the purpose of recognising the great principle interwoven with the existence of a Church Establishment, that for those members of it who lived, or might live in that parish, there shall be the means of publicly worshipping their God according to the principles of their faith. Now, he (Sir Robert Peel) would ask the hon. gentleman this question. If he were to divide the revenues of the church equally among every parish, taking his own standard as the standard of clerical remuneration, was he quite sure that there would be a surplus of church revenue? The sum of £250 was assumed by the hon. gentleman to be the minimum at which the proper performance of a clergyman's duties ought to be remunerated; he would assign this as the stipend of a clergyman in that parish in which there were only four Protestant families; but if he (Sir Robert Peel) took the case of a clergyman in a large parish, in a populous city, who was obliged to move in a certain station of life, and to maintain his family in decent and moderate independence, was it not clear that £250 per annum would be a most inadequate provision? Give me £250 as the minimum for the country parish—give me, what is manifestly not more than sufficient, where the Protestant congregation is numerous, where the parish is situate in an extensive town, and I meet the learned gentleman with perfect confidence on his own grounds, and I tell him that, on his own principles, and his own reasoning, he has not one farthing of surplus.—See, too, what his admission is, his just and liberal admission, that £250 is not too large a provision for the clergyman who has charge of his parish with the smallest possible number of Protestants. See what it implies beyond the allotment of the stipend. It implies the necessity of a place of Protestant worship—it implies the necessity of a residence for the minister. The charge for these if not built—the repairs of them if built—fall now upon the revenues of the church. Where is the surplus when all these essential requisites to Protestant worship shall have been provided for, limiting the provision to those parishes alone in which there is a Protestant population? (Hear, hear!)

He agreed fully with what had been said relative to the propriety of enforcing residence among the clergy. He would not limit that principle to the removal of the abuses caused by the absence of an incumbent, who, spending his money at some distant watering-place, neglected the performance of his clerical duties. He would be contented to destroy pluralities. (Cheers.) He would not hesitate to declare that the ministers of the church who were spending their incomes in places of mere amusement, and were neglecting the personal discharge of spiritual duties, were not fulfilling the condition on which the endowments of their benefices were given to them—(loud cheers)—and a law should pass to remove those unsightly defects, if they existed, in the constitution of the church in Ireland. And with his full consent, that law should apply, not merely to future, but to every existing incumbent. There was no vested interest that could be pleaded against the performance of that high trust for which alone that interest was vested. ((Cheers.))

He did not wish to enter upon a consideration of the Acts of Richard II., which had no application to the question before the House—which related to the impropriation of tithes. If the tithes did not belong to the rector, they certainly did to the church—(hear, hear!)—and should be applied to the purposes for which the church was consecrated. (Cheers.) If the learned gentleman's argument was valid; if the parishioners, in their personal capacities, and not the church, had a right to the tithes—how did he propose to deal with the lay-impropriator of tithes? Could the alleged right of the parishioners to tithes be defeated by their transfer to a layman.

An hon. member on the Opposition side.—Length of time has sanctioned the abuse.

Sir Robert Peel: Length of time! there is no right which prescription has given laymen to their property, which it has not given in at least an equal degree to the church. [Cheers.]

He had another objection against this resolution. Its object was to obstruct by unfair means the passing of the Tithe Bill. [Hear, hear!] It was a way of notifying to the government, in a dangerous and unprecedented manner, "We will not permit you to introduce your measure; we will not allow you to pass any preliminary stage in which after discussion any point could be agreed to; we will not consider the bill in committee, unless you agree to this resolution as a preliminary condition." He could not agree to it. He objected to it on the ground, that the principle of the resolution was dangerous and unjust; he objected to it on account of the manner in which it had been brought forward—he objected to it because those by whom it was prepared admitted a total want of information upon the subject on which they were legislating. Acting upon erroneous data—not having determined the amount of the property of the church—not knowing how much they wanted for the purposes of education, they proclaimed their object to be a final settlement, a satisfactory settlement, and yet they established no principle by which their future course was to be guided; or, if they did establish a principle, it was one of much more extensive and dangerous application than they professed it to be. After their debates of seven nights, there were many important points that had totally escaped observation. They had not taken into account how many livings there were in Ireland, the right of presentation to which belonged to laymen, and was held as private property. If they were to deduct these advowsons, they would find a large sum must be subtracted from their estimate of the church property; for he apprehended that they would distinguish between the rights of the private and the public patron. In the Church Temporalities' Bill this distinction was made, and he supposed it would be made again; for the noble lord would probably respect the rights of private property belonging to individuals. There were 300 livings in the hands of individual patrons. He did not pretend to know the exact amount of their value; but if it corresponded in a proportionate degree with the ordinary value of Crown livings in Ireland, and if they were to be treated as private property, about one-fourth of the whole revenues of the church was at once placed beyond the control of the noble lord. Here was one case, in which a great deduction must be made from this alleged surplus. But how could they determine, how could they approximate to the estimate of the surplus, without having decided on the principles of the new Tithe Bill, on the amount of the abatement which was to be made from the present legal demand of the church? This was a most important point. [Hear, hear!] The right hon. gentleman who lately held the office of Secretary for Ireland, had declared that the landlords were not treated too favourably in the bill sent up last year to the House of Lords, and had stated his determination, when the Tithe Bill came before the House, to insist on terms as favourable to the landlords of Ireland, as those contained in last year's bill. Now, if the right hon. gentleman acted on this principle, and was successful in enforcing it; he would make a very material reduction in the future revenues of the church. [Cheers.] If, as in the last year's bill, two-fifths of the tithes were to be given to the landlords, the tithes being valued at £545,000, and one-fifth of £545,000 being £109,000, the sum of £218,000 must be deducted from the value of the tithes. There would then be left £327,000 as the future annual value of tithes in Ireland. And here he would beg the noble lord to observe, that they were rapidly reducing his estimate of £800,000. [Cheers from the ministerial side of the House.] If the noble lord agreed with the right hon. gentleman, so recently his colleague in office—the colleague intrusted with Irish affairs, the author of the Tithe Bill of last year—it was clear that the tithe property of the church was reduced by one blow to the annual sum of £327,000. But were the compositions for tithes to be re-opened, as they were by the bill of last year? If they were, here was a fresh deduction even from the sum of £327,000. Consider these three separate causes of reduction of the assumed surplus—reductions of which you yourselves are the advocates. First, there is the private patronage of livings, which is not within your control. Secondly, two-fifths taken from the present amount of tithe. Thirdly, compositions of tithe re-opened; and then inquire calmly whether the remainder be more than sufficient for the decent maintenance of the church. Now, was it just towards the church, was it likely to conciliate the good feeling and good-will of those for whom they legislated, to proceed to pass this resolution with such false assumptions of the real amount of the revenues of the Irish Church. [Hear, hear!] There was no excuse whatever for this course. Returns had been called for, and in three days they would be before the House. [Hear, hear!] Hon. members opposite had eagerly sought for that information, but they now refused to be governed by it, and pledged themselves to listen to nothing but the resolution. [Cheers from the ministerial benches.] They might act upon that determination, but, happen what might, he would not adopt the principle of that resolution. [Loud and prolonged cheering from the ministerial benches.] He would not give effect to it. When he considered the hopes they had raised, and the expectations they had excited, which he knew must be disappointed, he might well say that the boldest man would be justified in shrinking from the responsibility of that resolution. [Cheers.] Even if the resolution was passed, its principle would not apply, until vacancies in livings should occur. The result of this debate, now continued for seven days, would only affirm a principle whose practical effects must necessarily be suspended, until existing interests had ceased. And what was the condition of these clergymen in the south of Ireland, who, the House thought, were loaded with superfluous wealth? They had been deprived of their tithe for the last four years. If he had interfered with the noble lord's resolution, for the purpose of amending it (which he had no intention of doing), the first claim he should assert, would be to provide compensation for those who had suffered under, but patiently acquiesced in, the wrong which had been inflicted on them. Surely, the justest claim on a surplus, if there were a surplus, would be that of those who had been robbed of their property. [Hear, hear.] If they found clergymen with wives and families resident amongst their parishioners, deprived of their rights because they had been temperate in the enforcement of them—because they had shrunk from extreme measures—because they had submitted to severe personal privations rather than come into collision with their flocks, were their demands for retribution to be disregarded? [Cheers.] He held in his hand one of many letters which he had received on this subject, and he was resolved to bring an individual case before the House as an example, in order that they might see the extent of pecuniary loss to which the clergy had been already subjected. It was written with great simplicity, and on that account was the more affecting. The right hon. baronet then read an extract from the letter: "I entreat you," said the writer, "if practicable, to create a fund to provide for the widows and orphans of clergymen, which the contemplated reduction of their incomes would render peculiarly well-timed, as many must now be disabled from partially attaining that object by effecting insurances on their lives. And lastly, to relieve them from future instalments (together with arrears now due) to the Board of First-Fruits, for loans advanced them to build their glebe-houses. I sincerely wish mine was an isolated case, but if many are similarly circumstanced with myself, they have great difficulties to encounter. I effected the composition in my parish (in 1832) at a sacrifice of £150 per annum of the income I was for years in receipt of—namely, £580; thus voluntarily reduced by me to £430. By the proposed bill, this will be further reduced to £322, 10s.; out of which I shall pay £50 insurance, £43 rent, £29 first-fruits; leaving a balance of £200, 10s. to support my beloved wife, ten children, and myself, after being above forty years an unworthy labourer in the Christian vineyard. [Cheers.] A murmur, however, shall not escape my lips; for I feel convinced the welfare of the Established Church is the object you and the government are most anxious to promote. Were the second measure, the provision for widows and orphans adopted (as I have humbly suggested), I should regard as trivial every pecuniary difficulty I might be destined to encounter; for it would console me under them all, and pluck from the pillow of death the only thorn this world could plant there. [Great cheering.] As a small atonement for thus presuming to trespass on you, permit me to offer the accompanying poem, for which my eldest son obtained a Vice-Chancellor's prize. He was equally successful with two other poems, but the enclosed is the only one published." [The pathos with which the right hon. baronet read this short extract, produced a great effect upon the House.] Here was a clergyman supporting his wife and ten children on an income reduced by acts of the legislature from £580 to £322 a-year, (the latter sum probably recovered with extreme difficulty,) not murmuring at his loss, thanking those who inflicted it for their wish to promote the interests of the Church, and ready to make any personal sacrifice which would conduce to those interests. Surely it is affecting to contemplate such a man cheerfully devoting, from the pittance which was left to him, some portion of it for the education of a son who was cheering the poverty and suffering of his home by the glad tidings of academical distinction. This is no singular instance—it is one of a hundred similar cases—and shall we, without inquiry, pledge ourselves irrevocably to transfer from the Church to which these ministers belong, a portion of her property; and if we do transfer it, can we with any semblance of justice appropriate it to any object, before we have provided compensation for those who have been defrauded and robbed of their rights?

I will no longer interpose between that decision of this House which, if adopted, is to exclude all compromise, all hope of reconsideration; to pledge this House, in spite of further argument, in spite of additional information, in spite of its own conviction, to adhere obstinately to one unalterable Resolution. Against the principle of that Resolution, there stands recorded the deliberate protest of men whose opinions are entitled to the highest deference, from their high character and acquirements, from their experience in the affairs of Ireland, above all, from their political relations, and the active part they have taken in the adjustment of Irish questions of the deepest interest and importance. I quote not the opinions of men prejudiced in favour of Protestant ascendancy, bound by the ties, or stimulated by the excitement of party, to uphold the predominance of the Church; I quote the authority of those who were the most powerful, the most uncompromising, the most effectual advocates for the removal of Roman Catholic disabilities, and the establishment of perfect civil equality among all classes of the king's subjects. I quote the authority of Burke, of Plunkett, of Newport, and of Grattan. Of Burke, who, speaking of the Established Church in Ireland, considers "it a great link towards holding fast the connection of religion with the state, and for keeping these two islands in a close connection of opinion and affection;" who wished it well—"as the religion of the greater number of the primary land-proprietors of the kingdom, with whom all Establishments of Church and State, for strong political reasons, ought to be firmly connected." I quote the authority of Plunkett, who declared "the Protestant Establishment in Ireland to be necessary for the security of all sects, to be the great bond of union between the two countries," and who emphatically declared, that "to lay our hands on the property of the Church, or to rob it of its rights, would be to seal the doom, and to terminate the connection, between the two countries." I quote the authority of Newport, who protested against the enactments of the Church Temporalities' Bill, who dissented from the policy of reducing the number of bishoprics, who, while he advised a different distribution of Church property, for the promotion of the interests of the Church, insisted on the strictest application of that property to ecclesiastical purposes. Lastly, I appeal to the solemn, the dying declarations of Grattan—of him who fought to the last hour of his existence with “desperate fidelity,” in the cause of his Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen. In his last moments he had strength sufficient to dictate a paper, of which the following is a faithful extract.

“Resolved, that a Committee be appointed with a view to Repeal the Civil and Political Disabilities which affect His Majesty’s Roman Catholic subjects on account of their religion.

“Resolved, that such Repeal be made with due regard to the inviolability of the Protestant religion and establishments.

“Resolved, that these Resolutions do stand the sense of the Commons of the Imperial Parliament on the subject of Civil and Religious Liberty, and as such be laid before His Majesty. These Resolutions contain my sentiments; this is my testamentary disposition, and I die with a love of liberty in my heart, and this declaration in favour of my country in my hand.”

Supported by these authorities, I adhere with the greater confidence to that course which my own judgment and my own conscience dictates. Backed by the prescient sagacity of Burke, by the powerful reasoning and prophetic warnings of Plunkett, by the local knowledge and long experience of Newport, by the dying injunctions and testamentary declarations of Grattan, I give an unhesitating vote against principles tending to shake the foundations of all property, and to subvert the Protestant Church in Ireland.

The House divided on the Resolution, when there appeared—Ayes, 285; Noes, 258; majority 27. Resolution agreed to.

RESIGNATION OF MINISTERS.

APRIL 8, 1835.

SIR ROBERT PEEL stated that it was his intention to move that the Mutiny Bill should be read a third time, and, in making that motion, he wished to avail himself of the opportunity which it afforded him of notifying to the House that he, in conjunction with all his colleagues in his Majesty’s government, and in conformity with their unanimous opinion, had felt it incumbent upon them, upon a combined consideration of the vote to which the House of Commons had come last night, and of their position as a government in that House, to signify to His Majesty, that they felt it to be their duty to place the offices which they held at the disposal of the king. He did not hesitate to say, that they had taken this course with the utmost reluctance, and not without the deepest conviction of its necessity. They felt, that being in possession of the entire confidence of the king, and having received from his Majesty the most cordial and unremitting support—looking to the present position of public affairs, to the present state of political parties—looking to the strength, not only the numerical, but the moral strength, of that great party by which they had had the honour of being supported, they felt it was their duty, under existing circumstances, to continue the attempt of administering public affairs, as the responsible advisers of the crown, to the latest moment that was consistent with the interests of the public service, and with the honour and character of public men. [Cheers.] When he did not hesitate to avow the reluctance with which they had tendered their resignation, he believed he should have credit with a great majority of the House of Commons [much cheering from both sides of the House], that that reluctance arose from public considerations alone [renewed cheering], and was wholly unconnected with every thing of a personal nature. [Hear, hear! and much cheering, particularly from the Opposition.] He had a strong impression, that when a public man at a crisis of great importance undertook the public trust of administering the affairs of this country, he incurred an obligation to persevere in the administration of those affairs as long as it was possible for him to do so consistently with his honour. [Hear, hear!] No indifference to public life, no disgust with the labours which it imposed, no personal mortifications, no deference to private feeling, could sanction a public man in withdrawing on light grounds from the post in which the confidence of his sovereign had placed him. [Much cheering.] But at the same time, there was an evil in exhibiting to the country a want, on the part of the government, of that support in the House of Commons which could enable it satisfactorily to conduct the public affairs—which could enable it to exercise a control over the proceedings of the House—a legitimate and necessary control conferred upon it by the possession of confidence. [Hear, hear!] There was an evil in such an exhibition of weakness to which limits must be placed; and he must say, reviewing all that had occurred since the commencement of the present session—looking to the little progress the government had been able to make in the public business of the country—looking at what had occurred on each of the last four nights—to the fact that ministers had had the misfortune, on each of four successive nights, to be left in a minority—on Thursday last, on Friday last, on Monday last, and last night—considering that that minority was smaller in relation to the majority than the minorities in which they had been at the commencement of the session—adverting also to the fact that they had received the support of those who, not having a general and unlimited confidence in the government, yet had given to the government a cordial and honourable support [cheers] on every occasion on which it was consistent with their public principles to give it—adverting to all these considerations, he must say, that, in his opinion, the time was come when it was incumbent on the ministers of the crown to withdraw from the responsibility which office, under such circumstances, imposed upon them. In addition to these considerations were the nature and consequences of the vote of last night. That vote, he conceived, implied a want of confidence in his Majesty's government, because, in his opinion, it was not necessary for any public purpose to come to that vote. [Hear, hear!] It was tantamount to a declaration on the part of the House, that it had not that confidence in his Majesty's government which entitled that government to submit to the consideration of the House the measures of which they had given notice. The noble lord had signified his intention, if the vote to which the House came last night did not lead to the result to which it had now led, to follow it up with an address to the crown, conveying to his Majesty the resolution respecting the Irish Church, which the House had affirmed. As he conceived that embarrassment to the public interests would arise from the presentation of that address, and as he had no right to assume that the House would take a view with respect to the policy of that address different from the view which it had taken with respect to the resolution, it did appear to him and to his colleagues, (whose views were in exact conformity with his own,) that a public duty was imposed upon them, particularly since they felt that the time was fast approaching when resignation was inevitable—not to persevere in a fruitless struggle, which might involve his Majesty, public men, and the country, in additional and unnecessary embarrassment. [Much cheering.] The vote of last night was not only tantamount to a declaration of a want of confidence in the government; but implying, as it did, the necessity of a total change of system in Ireland, so far as the Church revenues were concerned, it would impose such difficulties in the practical administration of government in Ireland, by parties opposed to the principle of the vote, that they were fairly entitled to decline a responsibility which others were bound to incur. The vote of last night was not an abstract resolution; the vote of last night was not one the practical execution of which could lie dormant. There might occasionally be points on which the House of Commons might express a different opinion from that of the government: there might be cases in which it would be possible for government to continue the conduct of public affairs, even in opposition to the House of Commons, upon questions involving mere abstract principles, admitting of delay in their practical application; but the House of Commons could not leave the tithe question in its present state. [Hear, hear!] At present laws were nominally in force, but were actually disregarded. Nothing could be more dangerous than to leave the law in its present state,—to habituate the people to the daily violation of it,—to exhibit to them a state of things in which those who were charged with the enforcement of law connived at its non-execution. It was not merely that the particular law would lose its authority; but the fatal example would extend to all laws, particularly to laws confirming and enforcing the rights of property. [Cheers.] Under these circumstances, it would have been the duty of the members of his Majesty's government, if they had continued in the administration, to have pressed for an immediate decision with respect to the law as to the recovery of tithes in Ireland. The Tithe bill of which they had given notice, they could not have proceeded with, without previously proposing the resolution for the remission of the claims upon the Irish clergy, on account of the repayment of the advances under the Million Act. He had no right to anticipate a different conclusion from that to which the House had already come—he could not anticipate that they would sanction the grant of a million without a distinct understanding that the Irish Tithe bill was to be framed upon the principle of the vote of last night; and under these circumstances, having no reason to apprehend that a delay of a few days would make any material difference in the position of the government—considering that it was impossible to permit the vote of last night to lie dormant—that the government must proceed with the Tithe bill, being firmly resolved to adhere to the principle of their own bill [hear, hear!] being firmly resolved, not to adopt the principle of the vote of last night [hear, hear!]<sup>1</sup>—under all these combined considerations, they had, as he had said before, felt it to be their duty, as public men invested with a public trust, respectfully to request his Majesty to permit them to restore that trust into the hands of his Majesty. They, therefore, now only held their offices provisionally, and for the temporary execution of public business, until his Majesty shall have made other arrangements for the conduct of the government. Under these circumstances, he should submit to the House, that perhaps the best course he could propose would be, that there should be a short adjournment. It would not be necessary that the adjournment should extend beyond Monday; and he should make the motion for an adjournment at once, had it not been that there was an election committee for which a ballot was appointed for to-morrow. Perhaps the House would feel that any discussion on public matters, in the present state of affairs, could not be proceeded with to any advantage. He had not the slightest hesitation in supposing, from the forbearance which the House had always shown on similar occasions, that the motion would be unanimously agreed to; but lest any inconvenience should arise with respect to the election committee, the ballot for which stood for to-morrow, the House would perhaps meet to-morrow for the single purpose of that ballot, and, when it was completed, adjourn till Monday. [Hear, hear! from both sides of the House.] The motion also which he had now to make, and which he made merely in consideration of public interests—namely, the motion for the third reading of the Mutiny bill—he was quite sure would be cheerfully acquiesced in. [Hear, hear!]

He had been anxious to give this explanation as briefly as he could, and in a manner the least calculated to give offence, or to excite angry feelings. [Great cheering from all parts of the House.] For himself, the whole of his political life had been spent in the House of Commons—the remainder of it would be spent in the House of Commons; and, whatever might be the conflicts of parties, he, for one, should always wish, whether in a majority or in a minority, to stand well with the House of Commons. [Immense cheering throughout the House, which continued for some minutes.] Under no circumstances whatever, under the pressure of no difficulties, under the influence of no temptation, would he ever advise the crown to resign that great source of moral strength which consisted in a strict adherence to the practice of the principles, to the spirit, to the letter of the constitution. [Hear, hear!] He was confident that in that adherence would be found the surest safeguard against any impending or eventual danger; and it was because he entertained that belief that he, in conformity with the opinions of his colleagues, considered that a government ought not to persist in carrying on public affairs, after the sense of the House had been fully and deliberately expressed in opposition to the decided opinion of a majority of the House of Commons. It was because he had that conviction deeply rooted in his mind, that regretting, as he most deeply did regret, the necessity which had compelled him to abandon his Majesty's service at the present moment; yet upon the balance of public considerations, he felt that the course which he had now taken was more likely to sustain the character of public men, and to promote the permanent interests of the country, than if he had longer persevered in what he believed would have proved a fruitless attempt, to conduct as a minister the king's service, in defiance of that opposition which had hitherto obstructed the satisfactory progress of public business. [The right hon. baronet, at the conclusion

OBSERVANCE OF THE SABBATH.

MAY 20, 1835.

On the question that the House do resolve itself into a Committee on the Lord's Day Observance Bill,—

Mr. Hawes moved, "That the bill be referred to a Select Committee upstairs."

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, I confess that I always listen to discussions on this subject with great concern. There is no man in the House who attaches greater importance than I do to the proper keeping of the Sabbath-day. I think no one has a right to shock the public feeling by desecrating the Sabbath-day; but at the same time, I entertain very serious doubts as to whether we shall promote that object by legislation, and whether it will not be better to trust to the influence of manners and the increase of morality, for the purpose of checking, by public opinion, the attempt at profanation of the Sabbath, than to have recourse to new laws which I fear in themselves would be difficult of execution; and which, as they might be perverted to purposes of annoyance to individuals, would tend to bring the law itself into disrespect. I confess, judging from my own experience, I should say that you might safely trust to the influence of manners. I should say, that comparing, even within my own short experience, the observance of the Sabbath with what I have witnessed, and certainly with what I have read, making this comparison, I should say, that without the interference of any new law, the Sabbath-day is now much better observed than was the case formerly. If that effect has taken place, nothing would be more easy than to show that you owe that consequence, that good effect of the influence of manners, to the influence of public opinion, and not to legislation. Because I will undertake to prove, to the satisfaction of any man, that the enactments now on the Statute-book are not, and have not been, observed. Of this I am perfectly satisfied, that you have only one of two alternatives—either to leave the law in its present state, and not to touch it, or, if you do touch it, to simplify and consolidate it, and to let the public know what the law really is with respect to the desecration of the Sabbath. Now, the hon. gentleman, the member for Shaftesbury, is about to take a third course, which I think very unnecessary. The law of Charles II. is now in operation; it is on the Statute-book, but practically it is not observed; but the hon. gentleman is about to pass a bill which assumes the existence and operative effect of that law. The hon. gentleman's bill is entitled, 'A Bill to amend and render more effectual the statute 29th Charles II.;" but the provisions of the bill are totally at variance with its title, for the hon. gentleman does not attempt to enforce the statute of Charles. He does not attempt to make the statute of Charles more effectual, but he selects one particular offence contemplated by that statute, and makes that one particular offence more penal. The hon. gentleman says nothing of the other offences specified in the statute of Charles; and consequently, when you have this bill passed, you must still refer to the statute of Charles, to explain to you what the law really is. The hon. gentleman says, there is no occasion to consider the bill with any great anxiety, or to discuss it at any great length, because all the enacting part of it is comprised within six lines. That may be very true; the bill itself may not exceed six lines, and yet it may be very important. For instance, you may say that there shall be no drinking on the Sabbath-day, and that provision, if you like, may be comprised within a single line; but still every one would be aware that the provision though short was of a most sweeping and comprehensive nature, and that it would be necessary to look with great jealousy and apprehension to the practical consequences that might ensue from it. I will prove to the hon. gentleman, that in carrying his bill into effect, it will be constantly necessary to refer to the statute of Charles II. One of the offences under the statute of Charles is the letting out a boat for hire on Sunday. [Mr. Poulter: That clause has been repealed.] But how are the people to know that? The hon. gentleman founds his measure upon the statute of Charles—calls it a measure for enforcing and rendering more effectual the statute of Charles; and then, when one of the very first offences specified in the statute of Charles is mentioned, he gets up and tells us that other bills have since passed by which the penalties upon several offences enumerated and provided for in the statute of Charles have been repealed. How, then, is the hon. gentleman's bill to be understood? The statute of Charles, in the next place, provides that no "drover, waggoner, butcher, &c., shall travel or come into any inn or lodging on the Sabbath-day, under the penalty of 20s." Is that a part of the hon. gentleman's bill? [Mr. Poulter: No.] But is not the dealing with these persons part of the bill? I was at first inclined to support the proposition of the hon. member for Lambeth, for referring the bill to a Select Committee; but, upon further consideration, I think it would be infinitely better for the House of Commons to meet the report fairly, and to defeat it upon principle. If it should be the opinion of the House that it is dangerous, that we may defeat our own objects by legislating on the report, surely it would be better, rather than to create a vexatious delay by referring it to a Select Committee, when a report may be made at such a late period in the session as to prevent the possibility of any effectual progress being afterwards made—rather than to adopt that course, surely it would be better to act upon the suggestion I now make. I am opposed to the proposition for referring the bill to a Select Committee, because some gentlemen might think that an indirect mode of defeat. I am therefore prepared to go into committee this evening, and to allow the hon. gentleman to make the bill as perfect as he can; and when he has taken that course, I shall call upon him either to drop the bill altogether, or to leave the law as he found it, and to trust to the continued operation of manners to enforce the observance of the Sabbath. That I confess is the bearing of my own mind. I confess I do see enormous difficulties in trying to carry this bill into effect. The statute of Charles II. attempted to prevent travelling of all descriptions on the Sabbath, as well by the ordinary means of land carriage as by boats? Why is that abandoned in the present bill? If it be wrong for the humbler classes to travel by steam to Richmond on Sunday, surely it must be equally wrong for us to be travelling in our carriages on the same day. I do believe that the rich are the greater offenders, but we ought not to make laws which practically inflict very unequal restrictions on different classes. If we interfere with the innocent recreations of the poor, such as mere locomotion, we shall do much harm. Enactments of such a description tend only to create disunion between the richer and the lower classes, because the restrictions which they provide apply principally to the latter. To any law proceeding upon that principle, I must decidedly object. If you legislate upon the subject at all, it ought to be impartially: the restrictions you provide should apply equally to all classes. The hon. gentleman, the member for Shaftesbury, de-pairing to make the statute of Charles II. efficient upon the two points I have enumerated, takes another point, and endeavours to make it more stringent than it was originally intended to be. Then I say he ought to repeal all the rest of the statute. He should either leave the law as it is, or else make it more simple and plain. That is not the hon. gentleman's object. But considering the pains and trouble to which the hon. gentleman has gone, no doubt with the best motives, I shall not throw any impediments in his way on the present occasion; but I shall reserve to myself the right—when the hon. gentleman has reduced the bill to as perfect a shape as he can—either of calling upon the House to reject the bill altogether, or, if the House be determined to legislate upon the subject, then to require that we should so consolidate the laws, as that the public may understand what is an offence against the law and what is not.

Mr. Hawes having withdrawn his amendment, the House went into committee, and Mr. Poulter proposed to introduce the words "in an open shop," in order to obviate the objections which had been made to the bill by Sir R. Peel.

Sir R. Peel wished to know what was meant by the words "in an open shop?" Did it mean selling at a stall, or not? It was material to be very definite upon this point; because the people would regard this bill as the latest legislative declaration on the subject; and if selling at a stall was not to be included under the terms "open shop," then, instead of putting an end to trading on the Sabbath-day, the effect of the bill would be to make that trading be carried on more publicly than ever, inasmuch as a stall was more open than a shop. The hon. member excluded the sale of animals on the Sabbath; but if the words "open shop" did not mean a stall, there would be an inconsistency in the bill, for animals were always sold openly, and not in shops. If, therefore, it were legal to sell at a stall, it would also be legal to sell cattle on the Sabbath-day.

Various amendments were agreed to, and the House resumed.

CHURCH RATES—MR. CHILD'S CASE.

MAY 25, 1835.

In the debate arising out of the presentation of several petitions from Lynn, Wells, and other places, complaining of the conduct observed towards Mr. Child of Bungay, by the Ecclesiastical Court, on the subject of demand for Church rates:—

SIR ROBERT PELL, rising after Lord John Russell, said he had nothing to find fault with in respect to the principle which the noble lord had announced on the subject of Church-rates, since the noble lord had plainly said, that it was an essential condition of the existence of an Established Church that the state should provide for the maintenance and repair of the fabric of the Church. [Mr. Hume: "No, no." Lord John Russell: "Yes."] He hoped that the noble lord might be allowed to be the interpreter of his own opinions: he certainly so understood the noble lord, and at the moment when the noble lord was assenting to his construction of the noble lord's own words, he thought he might take that assent to be the correct indication of the noble lord's opinion, notwithstanding the peremptory contradiction which some one behind him gave to the representation. The noble lord, in the conclusion of his speech, as if to remove all doubt on the matter, had explicitly declared that "his opinions on the subject of Church-rates were well known; and from that he inferred, that the noble lord still maintained the opinions which he had publicly announced on the occasion when the present Earl Spencer brought forward the question of Church-rates. Even if the noble lord had not made the declaration that his opinions continued unchanged, he felt no disposition, as he had no reason or motive, to impute any change of sentiment to the noble lord. In regard to the principle, that the state was bound to maintain and repair the fabric of the Church—it is the same with that maintained by Lord Althorp when he announced his intention to relieve Dissenters from as much as possible of the burden complained of. Lord Althorp stated that he found the total amount annually expended on the repairs, and for the services of churches and chapels in England and Wales, and raised by church-rates, to have been between £500,000 and £600,000. The noble lord said, that with respect to a large portion of this sum he made no provision, throwing the necessity of providing for the expenses incidental to the performance of divine service and other similar matters upon members of the church itself. The noble lord's observations were to this effect, "The members of the establishment had a right also to say, that their interests should receive all due attention, and that their principles should be respected; one of those principles certainly was, that means should be provided by the legislature for the support of the fabric of the church:"—the noble lord added, "Another point, not immediately relevant to the question, but which the committee would not fail to take in view, was, that the effect of the new plan would be, not only to relieve Dissenters from their scruples, but the people of England from a considerable amount of taxation. It was proposed to apply £250,000 from the land-tax, but the sum hitherto annually expended upon churches and chapels in England and Wales, and raised by church-rate, was between £500,000 and £600,000 by the latest return upon the table. The relief from taxation, pressing upon the body of the people, would thus be important, and would amount to the difference, or nearly so, between £250,000 and £560,000. The expenditure had no doubt been extravagant in many instances; for sometimes the churchwardens and vestry, who ought to have guarded the interests of the parish, were benefited by the expenditure." Such were the principles on which the then Chancellor of the Exchequer made his proposition, a principle to which the noble lord (Lord J. Russell) and the rest of his colleagues gave their full assent. The noble lord opposite supported the plan of Lord Althorp, in a speech, to the sentiments of which, no doubt, the noble lord still adhered. The resolution moved by Lord Althorp, abolishing church-rates, and granting £250,000 for the repair of churches, was met by a counter-proposition from the hon. member for Middlesex, providing that after a time to be fixed, the payment of church-rates in England and Wales should cease and determine. This proposition was declared by Lord Althorp to differ in principle from his, and on that ground the noble lord and his colleagues resisted it. Church-rates were to be absolutely abolished, and no substitute provided. Upon this question the House divided. He had the satisfaction of dividing in company with the noble lord opposite, and with the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, when, by a majority of 256 against 140, they negatived the proposition of the hon. member for Middlesex, that the repair of the fabric of the church was a public charge, and maintained the grant of £250,000 from the public funds for that express purpose. He had thus shown that the noble lord's principle differed from that opposed to it by the hon. member for Middlesex, and he now heard with great satisfaction that the noble lord still adhered to that opinion, which he had maintained with great ability on the occasion in question; and although he now proposed delay in the settlement of the great question of church-rates, on the principle on which the settlement should be made, the noble lord had not changed his mind. He would not attempt to gain popularity, at the expense of the noble lord, by concealing what he had himself intended to do; and therefore he now declared, that, although in the course of the present session he should have attempted, had he remained in office, to effect an immediate settlement of church-rates, yet it was his intention to adopt the principle of the noble lord—to extinguish all equivocal and objectionable charges, but to provide for the repair of the fabric of the church out of the general revenue of the country, by an annual provision, to the extent and for the objects contemplated by the noble lord. It was right that the noble lord should have the benefit of this declaration. He must add, however, that he should not have proposed to impose the charge substituted for church-rate, especially upon the land-tax. In fact, that was a mere delusion, which meant neither more nor less than a contribution from the general revenues of the state, although it sounded plausibly at first. His proposition would not have been to take the necessary funds for the maintenance and repair of churches in England and Wales directly out of the revenues of the state. It would have been connected with propositions for the relief of the occupying tenant in Ireland from arrears of tithes, and for the grant of money to Scotland, for the purpose of providing permanent endowments in certain cases in that country, for the ministers of the Established Church, these being the equivalent advantages intended for other parts of the empire, in order to compensate for the relief given to England in the shape of an abolition of church-rates. The satisfaction with which he had heard the expression of the noble lord's unchanged opinion, was greatly qualified by the noble lord's declaration that he intended to leave this question of church-rates in its present state during the course of another year. This was a great practical question requiring adjustment, and he must say, that the noble lord was under peculiar obligations to settle it as speedily as possible. The noble lord had referred to the conduct of churchwardens in compelling individuals to pay church-rates by harsh methods; but the churchwardens might and would refer the noble lord to his own act of 1834, in which he and his then colleagues had asserted the principle of abolishing church-rates, and providing a substitute for their payment out of the revenues of the state. And could the noble lord be surprised at difficulty arising in the collection of the rate, and at the manifestation of an indisposition to pay it, when government brought in a measure for the abolition of church-rates in April, 1834; and when, in June, 1835, the noble lord said, although his opinions and principles remained unchanged, yet he was not now prepared to bring his principles to a practical conclusion? He could see no grounds on which, since the noble lord did still adhere to his principles, he could decline to bring forward without delay the subject of church-rates with a view to its immediate settlement. He had on more than one occasion remarked, that it was unfortunate that the late government brought measures under discussion without that full previous consideration which was essential to their satisfactory adjustment, that they agitated the public mind by renouncing certain principles, and did not afterwards calm the disquiet they had caused, by any practical settlement of the question at issue. The noble lord now confirmed the general correctness of such a statement, for the noble lord now admitted that attempts had been made at legislation by himself and his friends, in this case and in others, which had proved very unsuccessful. He was always pleased when he could offer a practical proof in the support of the statement of a minister of the crown, and he undertook to say, that never was a truer statement made by man than that the noble lord and his colleagues had sometimes proposed measures with an inconsiderate zeal and precipitation, which left matters worse than they found them. The attempt at legislation with regard to church-rates, was a signal proof of the justice of the noble lord's remark. Lord Althorp, in proposing a grant in lieu of church-rates, had said, that in addition to the £250,000 annually to be provided for, he believed there was a debt of about £80,000 (the church-rates having been mortgaged in certain instances), and some other small sums, but that those incumbrances could be easily provided for. Having heard this statement from the noble lord, he determined to ascertain what those small sums were, and he therefore called for returns as to the amount of church-rates mortgaged, outstanding debts for building churches, &c., and he found that, instead of an incumbrance on the rates of £80,000, as stated by Lord Althorp, £827,000 was actually the amount of debt due, and concurring with the noble lord on the principle of church-rates, and being desirous of carrying that principle into effect, he had to inform the noble lord that all the information which he had collected, in respect to church-rates, and the amount of existing debts for which those rates were a security, was entirely at the service of the noble lord. With respect to municipal corporations, he was not about to say a word on that question; but, without undervaluing its importance, he must observe that the subject of church-rates did not yield to it in urgency. So far as any question could be important to the maintenance of social harmony, to the promotion of satisfaction among the great body of the Dissenters, there was not a single question, excepting that of the Irish Church, which so much pressed for an immediate practical settlement as this of church-rates. He had understood that one of the main grounds on which he had been dispossessed of office, was, because gentlemen opposite thought that his accession to office had a tendency to interrupt several practical measures of improvement, which had been under mature consideration in the preceding cabinet, and which had been only nipped in the bud by the untimely frost that set in about the 15th of November last. Was not the following proposed and carried as part of an amendment on the address to the Crown on the opening of parliament? "To represent to his Majesty, that his Majesty's faithful Commons beg leave submissively to add, that they cannot but lament that the progress of these and other reforms should have been endangered by the unnecessary dissolution of a parliament, earnestly intent upon the vigorous prosecution of measures to which the wishes of the people were most anxiously and justly directed." If any one had asked him, what were the particular measures, in addition to corporation reform, to which this amendment referred, as having been interrupted and endangered by his accession to office, he should at once have answered, "A settlement of the tithe question in England, as well as in Ireland, the abolition of church-rates, and relief to Dissenters in respect to the ceremony of marriage." These were the three measures which the late parliament had under consideration; they had indeed done little towards a settlement of them, but they appeared "earnestly intent upon them." What might happen with respect to tithes in this country, he could not tell; the House had heard the noble lord say, that he contemplated no other measures than corporation reform, and an Irish Church bill, and all hope of commutation of tithes in England, he apprehended, was over for the present; and in like manner the Dissenters' marriage bill, and a substitution for church-rates, were to be postponed also. He had heard a novel reason for delay from a high authority on such subjects, one on which the noble lord exceedingly relied—namely, the hon. and learned member for the Tower Hamlets. His opinion now was, that you must not touch any single subject—that you must not indulge in partial views, or take up individual questions, but must consider the bearings of the questions of marriage, church-rates, tithes, registrations, and church reform, connectedly, and as parts of a great and entire whole; and having done so, you must bring in large and philosophical measures, harmoniously combined, and calculated to ensure universal content and satisfaction. Now, if he had said to the House, "Don't legislate on single subjects, do nothing till you can provide for the complete arrangement of every thing, and settle all questions together, including tithes, church-rates, marriage, registration, and church reform—don't venture to touch one question till you are prepared to deal with all;" then, indeed, they might have justly inferred, that the dissolution of the last parliament had interrupted and endangered the progress of reform, then indeed there would have been some foundation for their alarm, some justification for their amendment to the address. If the government of Lord Melbourne had, as far back as November last, directed their attention to the subject of tithes and church-rates, and had made up their minds on those questions, they must be now prepared to bring them forward. They probably had done nothing more in these matters than they had done in many others; they were prepared to condemn what they found established, to declare that the existing law ought to be abolished, to make it, by virtue of such a declaration proceeding from such an authority, very difficult of execution, and to trust to chance for the future discovery of a substitute.

A government had other duties to perform, than that of merely joining in an outcry against an unpopular law. They ought, at least, to follow up the condemnation of that which existed, with the immediate proposal of a substitute. To take any other course was to weaken the authority of all law, to habituate the public mind to the absence of salutary restraint, and to diminish the hope of a satisfactory adjustment of that which might require reformation. And on this subject of church-rates, surely the noble lord, adhering, as he professed, to his former principle, and being in possession of all the facts of the case—surely the noble lord himself, one of the parties to the bill of Lord Althorp, and being now perfectly able to accomplish his object—surely he was bound to proceed, and not to leave unsettled for another year, a subject so pregnant with the seeds of discord and collision. In consideration of the interests of the Church Establishment, for the satisfaction of a large body of the people—for the accomplishment of their own pledges—to promote subordination and obedience to the law—to suppress individual complaints of grievance—surely, to accomplish all these objects, a government fit to be intrusted with the management of public affairs would, without delay, take this matter into their own hands, and not suffer the law respecting church-rates to be made a theme of discussion in public meetings, and a subject of resistance by parochial martyrs for another twelvemonth.

After a long debate, Lord John Russell was understood to say, that government would take the matter into consideration, and the subject then dropped.

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS.

MAY 25, 1835.

The Marquis of Chandos having moved an address to the Throne, relative to the distressed state of the agricultural districts, and Lord John Russell having replied—

SIR ROBERT PEEL (rising after Lord Arthur Lennox) could not regret that he had given the noble lord an opportunity of venting his feelings, which were very natural, and reflected honour upon him. He was perfectly convinced that the hon. member for Oldham (Mr. Cobbett) must have laboured under some misapprehension of what he had heard with respect to the noble duke alluded to, and the motives by which he was actuated; for he (Sir Robert Peel) felt himself bound to say, that the extensive experience which he had had of the noble duke in his parliamentary career, had completely satisfied him that his character was of that nature that the imputation which had been cast upon it must be totally unfounded. The noble duke might differ from the hon. member for Oldham with respect to the policy of the poor-laws, but as to the motives of the difference, the noble duke was above all suspicion. He would, however, proceed to the question that was before the House, and he was sorry to say that many subjects had been introduced into it which, although bearing on the condition of the poor (and, if the question was upon the general state of the agriculturist, proper to be introduced), yet could not, when their importance was considered, with any advantage to the question under debate, be introduced into a desultory discussion. The most prominent of these irrelative topics was the operation of the poor-laws, and the probable effects of the poor-law amendment act of last session. Another of the topics that had been introduced was the state of the currency, another was the commutation of tithes; each had been interwoven with the state of agricultural distress—each was a subject in itself of immense importance, and requiring a separate discussion, and no advantage could arise to any one of them in having it mixed up with the question now before the House. With reference to the currency question, it was admitted on all sides that the subject was one of immense importance, and that it ought to be the object of a separate discussion, and accordingly notice had been given of a distinct and regular motion upon the question of the currency. He hoped that whatever hon. member brought the subject forward for discussion, would at the same time bring forward his plan for relieving the country from the evils that were said to arise from the law as it then stood. That House had heard many declamations on the evil state of the currency. One hon. member had said, “something must be done on the subject.” Then came some other hon. member, and said, “the matter never can be allowed to rest where it was.” Now he hoped that all such gentlemen would in future go one step further, and at once tell the House what specific alterations they would wish to have introduced. Would these hon. members propose to introduce a paper currency, an unlimited paper currency, not convertible into gold? Would they, on the other hand, wish to introduce a debasement of the standard? Would they wish to propose a re-adjustment of contracts? And if they did, then would he ask, of what contracts? Of contracts made within what periods? These were the matters which hon. members ought fairly to bring forward, nor ought they to discuss the evils arising from the alteration of the currency without, at the same time, discussing the different measures of relief. The hon. member for Oldham had that night stood forward as the advocate of the agricultural interests. In that, at least, the hon. member was consistent, for throughout all his life he had supported the same cause. But how did he purpose to benefit the cause? He had looked back into the paper of notices of motions, and he there found that the hon. member for Oldham had a motion on the books no longer ago than last July, the principle of which was that they do what they like with the currency, but the whole charge of the national debt ought to be transferred to the land. Yes, the hon. member for Oldham had said, that personal property was subject to very unfair burthens in being subject to the interest of the national debt; and his relief from this evil was, to subject land to the exclusive burthen. With respect to the poor-laws amendment act, he had gone into that question when the bill was before the House, and he had voted for the bill. He had never expected that the new system would be carried into effect without exciting local dissatisfaction; but he was bound to say that the dissatisfaction which had been excited had been much less than he had anticipated, and at all events it had not been sufficient to convince him of the impolicy of that important measure. Another question was the commutation of tithes. He trusted the noble lord would not persevere in his intention to transfer the question to a committee. He would most undoubtedly prefer that the noble lord should take time, and let the executive government consider it. Whether any of the three plans that had been proposed were to be pursued; whether the principles of the bill introduced in 1833; whether Lord Althorp’s plan of having the tithes converted into rents applicable to certain districts; or whether the House were to proceed upon the principle of a voluntary commutation, the plan which he had proposed, he would rather that the noble lord opposite should say that the executive government was determined to apply its mind to the measure than that it should be transferred to a select committee. He hoped that the noble lord would think the subject deserved to occupy the attention of government; for government had more means of inquiry into it than a committee, and he was convinced, whatever measure might be proposed, that ought to be proposed on the responsibility of government. He would now come to the object of his noble friend’s motion. His noble friend proposed that the House should agree to address the Crown to direct his Majesty’s ministers to consider the state of the agricultural interests, with reference to a view to its relief from general and from local taxation. With respect to general taxation, he could not but observe that the House was discussing the question at a time at which, if no change had been effected in the financial prospects of the country, they had a surplus revenue so very small that no reduction of taxation could be ventured upon without causing more injury than benefit, and in the situation in which he stood he could not excite hopes in the agricultural interests which, as a minister of the Crown, he should never have thought of realizing. As Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he had anticipated that what was called the budget of the year would have to be proposed to the House by himself, he had assumed that the net available surplus, after providing for all that was chargeable for the debt and for the public services, which the general interests of the country compelled a minister to attend to, would be only £250,000. Under such circumstances, then, he could not now be a party to a resolution which would lead the agriculturists to believe that he contemplated any great reduction in the burthens of the country. He should always hold the opinions which he ever had held as to the great advantages of strictly maintaining public credit. A greater ultimate chance of relief would exist from the maintenance of public credit, by looking to a legitimate means of reducing the interest of the public debt, than by acting precipitately, and by relieving public burthens at the expense of endangering public credit. He believed that it would not be easy for any man to point out any one particular tax that fell exclusively upon the agriculturists. If the exception were the malt-tax, he must say that in the course of that session he had thought it his duty to dissent from the proposition to reduce that tax. He would for a moment suppose that there existed a greater surplus of revenue over expenditure than was contemplated, then, he asked, what tax ought he to remove? He need not discuss the amount of the surplus; but, supposing it to be of an amount that would authorize government to contemplate a greater reduction of taxes than was intended—supposing that government intended to make a greater reduction of taxes than the existing surplus of £250,000, and trust to a chance improvement of the revenue to fill up any deficiency—still should he find it difficult to select a tax to reduce or take off which fell exclusively on the landed interests. If it were conceded that a certain tax fell exclusively on the landed interests, still he should require time to consider whether he should benefit the landed interest more by taking off that direct tax than by removing some other that pressed injuriously, though indirectly, upon productive industry. He was not prepared to say, that there was not a tax or taxes in the whole system of taxation, the diminution of which might not benefit the landed interests, and he should take an opportunity of throwing this out for the consideration of the right hon. gentleman opposite, (the Chancellor of the Exchequer.) He would advise the right hon. gentleman to consider the operation of the auction duty. Whether there would be a superfluous revenue sufficient to enable the right hon. gentleman to make any reduction of that duty he could not say; but he was sure that the landed interests would derive great benefit from such a measure, nor could the revenue suffer much, for little of the auction duty was derived from the sale of landed estates, as it was the practice, in order to avoid the duty, to put up lands to sale by auction merely in order to ascertain their value, and afterwards to dispose of them by private contract. He would likewise advise the right hon. gentleman to take into consideration the state of the land-tax, with a view to making changes in the collecting of it. Then would come the question on the increase of the duty on spirit licences. He believed that the effect of the duty had been unjust in the extreme. This duty, as it then stood, had been imposed very late in the last session, when the parties interested in it had not had an opportunity of presenting their remonstrances against it. The tax upon the manufacture of glass he considered as peculiarly deserving of a favourable consideration; and there were many other taxes which he thought were also worthy of the attention of the government, with a view to reduce them with as little delay as the state of the finances of the country would permit. He entertained very strong doubts if a substantial relief afforded to those interests would not aid the landed interests more than any direct removal of agricultural duties. Under all the considerations in which he viewed this question, he confessed he did not feel justified in exciting expectations in the agricultural body, which he feared it would not be possible safely to realize. The last part of the subject to which he should refer was the local taxation. This, certainly, did bear heavily on the landed interests. At the same time that he was willing to afford every practical relief, he did not consider it fair to excite in the minds of the landed interest any expectation that there was likely to be any material alleviation of their burdens. He looked upon it that a greater relief would be derived from a new valuation than from any transfer of taxation. The chief objection to a new valuation was the expense that it was supposed would attend it, which had been stated as high as forty or fifty thousand pounds for some counties; but in the county of Lancaster, where the expense was likely to be greater than in other counties, on account of the number of large towns, the valuation had been conducted with perfect satisfaction to all interests, and at a comparative small expense. The operation was simple, and appeared to have been conducted without exciting any great dissatisfaction, or leading to many appeals; so that in two counties,—one, most important for its manufactures—the other, for its agricultural produce—a new apportionment of the public burdens, in this particular, was made without dissatisfaction. He would, therefore, advise those interested in the county expenditure, to weigh maturely the evidence which had been given upon this subject—to ascertain whether such new valuation could be made through local means—and, if not, if it should be necessary to obtain an act of parliament for such a purpose, whether it might not be expedient to take that course, the object being to provide a new valuation of lands, with a view to ensure a more equal apportionment of the rates levied upon them, than was now made. The relief he should have proposed to extend to agriculture, in the course of the present session, had he remained in office, would have been of very material benefit to it. He should have proposed to exempt the land altogether from the burden of the church-rates; for it appeared to him that, though land might be a proper subject of contribution, yet that the same circumstance which, as he apprehended, made the county-rate and the poor-rate fall with greater severity on the land than applied to the case of church-rates, also—namely, that personal property did not contribute its fair proportion to this tax. The amount of the church-rate, as calculated by Lord Althorp, was £550,000. Now, if the land were relieved of £300,000 of this amount, by doing away with charges which ought never to have been borne by the church-rate, and if the remaining £250,000 were transferred to the revenue of the country, there would be a relief to agriculture of not less than £550,000 on account of the church-rate; a relief, however, not exclusively to the land, but shared by all property now subject to the church-rate; because some proportion of the £550,000 was raised upon houses and other property, as well as the land. The noble lord had alluded to the recommendation of the committee as respected local taxation for bridges, roads, and other local improvements. There was a difficulty, he apprehended, in transferring from the county-rates any charges connected with the ordinary public local interests. He would not advise, for example, that charges for bridges, for roads, for the maintenance of the poor, or for any of those objects which might be better administered under local supervision, should be paid out of any other funds; for he thought, even apart from any considerations of public economy, that it would be wrong to transfer such supervision from the hands of county magistrates and gentlemen, who, being directly interested in these services, were more likely than other officers to carry them into complete effect. There ought to be limits assigned to the system of centralization. It was very well to say that government would employ men of high reputation, who would do the several descriptions of work at a less expense; but he believed that the ultimate effect of these central boards would be to withdraw the local expenditure from the honest supervision of the local authorities, to the great disadvantage of the public; and that the country would be thus involved in great additional expense for the management of local affairs. But there was one purpose to which local taxation was now applied, which stood distinct from all the rest, and one which might be undertaken by the government to the profit of the whole community—he meant the administration of the criminal justice of the country. The noble lord truly stated, that it was proposed by the committee of last year, to relieve the county-rates from the charges on account of criminal trials at the assizes; and to leave them subject only to the charges for criminal trials at the quarter-sessions. But the noble lord added—and justly—that there would be great caution required in the adoption of such a measure, in order to prevent the county magistrates (who, of course, would be interested in diminishing the local expenditure) from transferring a more than due share of this expense from the county funds, by making committals for trial at the assizes, which ought properly to take place at the quarter-sessions. In order to remedy this, the noble lord proposed to take the aggregate of the expense of the two descriptions of trial, and make a division of it, so that one moiety shall be borne by the county and the other by the public. But, considering that the whole cost of trials at the quarter-sessions did not amount to more than £78,000, he trusted that the noble lord would conclude with him, that it was better to make no distinction between the two items, but to transfer the whole expense of the administration of criminal justice to the public. That expense would amount to not more than £150,000 in the aggregate a-year; and this expense should be kept down by introducing every economical arrangement possible, consistently with the exigencies of justice, such as in the allowance to witnesses, and the number of counsel to be employed; and by placing the whole system upon one intelligible plan. It was extremely difficult to draw a line between cases which properly belonged to the assizes, or properly belonging to quarter-sessions. The principle was the same, however, as to such arrangements with regard to both; and he believed there would be a greater inducement to economy by taking the whole of the charge upon the state, than if they left one part of it to be defrayed by the state, and another by the county. The removal of offenders, after conviction, certainly could be conducted at a less expense by these means, and thus the county would be relieved of a considerable burden, without subjecting the public to an equivalent charge. Government would act, in short, as to these matters, upon a combined plan; whereas each county adopted a different course—one conveying them by boats, and another by public carriages, to the annoyance of all other passengers. He was sure that any one who had happened to share a coach with convicts under sentence, would be ready to agree with him, that this practice ought to be done away with. By contracting upon a large scale, this business of conveyance would not only be conducted at a less expense, but such a scandal as that would be altogether avoided. The motives of economy and discipline, as well as the proper enforcement of the law, should operate with the government to induce them to adopt this course of proceeding. He was inclined strongly to advise that the whole of the charges connected with the administration of criminal justice, should be undertaken by the government, not merely with a view to relieve the county of its local expenditure on that account, but with a view of giving government the whole control of it. There was, at present, no part of our judicial system over which the government had so little, and ought to have so strict, a control. It would be better to make a gradual trial of this plan, in order that the government might feel its way before finally embarking upon it. There were more powerful reasons for its adoption than the prospect of relieving the country from the charge. It would have a tendency to prevent compromises on the part of the prosecutors, as well as frivolous and vexatious prosecutions. This, therefore, was the extent of the remission of taxation he was disposed to advise. It was one which, he must admit, if carried into effect, would have exceeded the amount of the surplus of the year's revenue; but he considered that some of the other taxes might have been increased, without at all endangering the public confidence, if this experiment had been carried into effect. These were the general views on which he was disposed to act. The resolution of the noble lord did not, he observed, point to any particular amount of reduction. It left that matter still open for consideration; but it distinctly encouraged the hope that it was the intention of the House, when called on to discuss the subject of local taxation, to give every practical relief that could be afforded to the landed interest consistent with the maintenance of public credit. If his noble friend would take his advice, he should be satisfied to obtain, on the part of his Majesty's ministers, an admission of the general principle—without pressing the matter of his Resolution to a division. His noble friend had better let the Chancellor of the Exchequer state, officially, what the amount of the available surplus was, and what proposition he had to make unconnected with general taxation, and then submit a specific motion with respect to local expenditure, reserving to himself the right of afterwards pressing the remission of any particular tax. If his noble friend did not take that course—he, for one, was bound to say that he could not acquiesce in the motion—thinking it open to the objection of exciting too great hopes on the part of the agricultural interests. He sympathized with their distresses as deeply as any man, but he was not willing to aggravate them—as they would be aggravated—by the excitement of hopes which could not be realized consistently with the maintenance of the public credit.

The original motion was negatived, and an amendment proposed by Lord John Russell, for referring the matter to a committee, substituted in its stead.

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS—A SILVER STANDARD.

JUNE 1, 1835.

Mr. Cayley, at the conclusion of a very elaborate speech, moved, “That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire if there be not effectual means within the reach of Parliament to afford substantial relief to the agriculture of the United Kingdom, and especially to recommend to its attention the subject of a silver, or a conjoined standard of silver and gold.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said: I feel it my duty to take my share of any unpopularity that may attach to the refusal of this committee. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Richards), has made a strong appeal to the feelings of the House, and has expatiated on the distress of the agricultural interest—which distress I admit. The hon. gentleman also dwells on the hardships of a refusal to inquire into the distress. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman knows, as well as I do, that the main object of this motion is not inquiry into that distress; but that the purpose of it—not avowed in direct terms, but in the escape of those candid confessions which have fallen unawares from every speaker in its favour—is the depreciation of the standard of the currency. By every gentleman who has spoken, it is admitted, that, try what remedies you please, unless you give relief to the productive classes, by diminishing the fixed and permanent burdens of the country, through an alteration of the standard, no other remedy will give relief. What is the natural inference to be drawn from this language, but that depreciation is intended? If I resist the granting of a Committee of Inquiry into agricultural distress, it is because I know that no effectual relief would result from it. We had, in 1832, a committee fully and fairly appointed on this very subject. They directed their best attention to the state of the agricultural interest. Every possible evidence was afforded to that committee. That evidence received the amplest consideration, and the result was, that the committee tendered their advice to the House, that they should, above all other things, abstain from interfering with the currency of the country. The hon. member has referred to the bill of 1819, and has again kindly attempted to relieve me from the responsibility attached to that measure. He says, that those who are convinced of their errors, ought to be candid enough to admit them. I do not deny the proposition of the hon. gentleman; but there can be no reason why persons not believing themselves in error, are to be called upon to make confessions of repentance. That the bill of 1819 did increase the distress of the country to a certain degree, I do not deny; but it was utterly impossible to escape from the evils of an inconvertible paper currency, continued for above twenty years, without the infliction of some pressure and distress on the country. The question was, whether we should submit to a temporary evil and occasional injustice, which a return to a better system of currency would at first produce, or continue and persevere in a course which would ultimately lead to ruin? It is not just to attribute to the Act of 1819 the whole of that reduction in prices, which has taken place in agricultural, and, in fact, in almost every other description of produce. There was, certainly, concurrently with the resumption of cash payments, a great reduction in prices, and the distress of the agriculturists was, in part, aggravated by that reduction. But a great reduction in the price of agricultural produce was inevitable, even if cash payments had not been resumed. It must have followed the cessation of that monopoly which had been enjoyed by agriculturists during the war,—the cessation of that stimulus to agricultural speculation, which was peculiarly the effect of a war, such as that in which this country was engaged from 1793 to 1815. The return of peace, had there been no inconvertible paper currency, no practical depreciation of the standard during the war, must have materially affected the agricultural interests. Nearly concurrently with the return of peace, the restoration of the standard took place. It aggravated, to a certain extent, the pressure which arose from another cause that came into simultaneous operation; but many assigned the whole effect to the restoration of the standard, and will make no allowance for the consequences of the other and more powerful agent, in the reduction of prices, and in the disappointment of those who had speculated on their continuance. The question to-night, is not whether we shall inquire into agricultural distress, but whether we shall now attempt to remedy the alleged evils caused by the bill of 1819. The mode by which relief can be given, must either be by returning to an inconvertible paper currency, or by a depreciation of the standard. The first method is disclaimed by many, the whole tenor of whose reasoning is in its favour; the second, if it were a just measure, and an expedient one, could only be enforced, with any prospect of advantage, by some sudden act of authority, which should leave no time for deliberation as to its probable results. Under a perfectly despotic form of government, a depreciation of the standard may take place, which, no doubt, will inflict injustice on all creditors, but need not cause that utter confusion in all commercial dealings, which would be the inevitable result of depreciation adopted after long previous warning of the intention to depreciate, and as the result of a protracted investigation before a committee. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken, being aware of this evil, says—"Let us have a committee, the result of which shall never be known to the public." There certainly can be no objection to a committee which is never to have a result. The hon. gentleman corrects me, and says he means that the proceedings in the committee should not be known. But I say, that it is the expectation of the result that would agitate the public mind. It is of no use to conceal the daily proceedings of the committee from the public, if you let them know beforehand the end you have in view. If depreciation is to be the result of the inquiry, it is useless to conceal the progress of the inquiry from the public. If the public mind is led to expect that, after three months' sitting, the result of the committee will be a depreciation of the standard, of what avail will it be that the committee should conduct in secret the inquiries which are to lead to that result? What would be the case of every debtor and creditor, if the public knew that the payment of existing debts would be placed on a different footing after the lapse of a given time?—that debts contracted in one currency were to be paid in another? Does the hon. gentleman expect that any transaction would take place in the mean time? Does he not know that the result would be the demand of every debt which could be promptly demanded,—a total paralysis of commerce,—and a total cessation of all dealings on credit? The hon. gentleman asks, why we have so much pity for the creditor, and none for the debtor? and argues, in the same spirit which dictates the question, that creditors are generally rich men, and entitled to a smaller share of indulgence. Now, can such a proposition be generally affirmed as to creditors throughout the country? Every person who has advanced money to the public, from confidence in the public faith—every one entering into any commercial transaction where money is not forthwith paid—is a creditor; liable to be affected in the recovery of a just demand by a depreciation of the standard. How absurd to class all creditors together, and to disregard their interests on the assumption that they are comparatively a rich body? The hon. gentleman who made the motion, employed rather a curious argument. He maintains that the person who has speculated in the purchase of land, has as good a right to expect an adequate return, as he who employs an equal amount of capital in the public funds. But is there not a palpable difference between the two transactions? The latter lends a thousand pounds to the public, and the public credit is pledged to him for the repayment of his debt; in the case of the former, it is a mere speculation, without any guarantee against failure given to him by the public. It shows a great confusion of ideas to place a mere pecuniary speculation on the same footing with a positive contract, and to contend that I have the same right to be guaranteed against loss when I make a purchase, as I have when I lend money with a promise of repayment. I affirmed that the express object of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Richards—of my hon. friend, if he will allow me so to call him)—is a depreciation of the currency. My hon. friend does not admit this—but what did he mean when he said that the hon. member for Wiltshire has thrown greater light on the effect of this measure than any body else? What was the light, thus thrown by the member for

Wiltshire, illustrating so clearly the consequences of his motion? It was this, that the agricultural interest would be benefited, because the fixed engagements and incumbrances of this country would be diminished. But how could they be diminished in this sense, excepting by discharging them in a depreciated currency? Well, indeed, may my hon. friend say, that the member for Wiltshire has stripped the motion of its false colours, and exhibited it in its true light. This proposition, so far as currency is concerned, directs itself to one or other of two objects: either it has in view the correction of the defects of the existing system of currency apart from any project of depreciation, or it means to give relief to the debtor by a depreciation of the standard, and a diminution, pro tanto, of the public burthens caused by the amount of the national debt. Let us examine separately each of these objects, and submit each to the test of fair reasoning. First, then, is there any defect in our existing monetary system? I remember it was prophesied, that if we returned to what was called the antiquated standard, there would be an end of the commerce of the country; but I have seen, that since the resumption of that antiquated standard, the commerce and manufacture of the country have been carried on to a much greater extent than at any former period. I repeat, that under the present monetary system, there has been a greater amount of commercial transactions—there has been more manufacturing industry employed—a greater export trade—a greater spirit of local improvement—than at any former period; even than at that of inconvertible paper. I do not apprehend that the state of our manufactures is such as to require any change in the monetary system of the country, and I cannot conceive what interest the agriculturist can have in lowering the standard, apart from the consideration of relief from debt by depreciation. I am keeping that matter distinct. It is said, indeed, that all interests prosper under a constantly depreciated currency; and the opinion of Mr. Hume has been referred to in support of such a position. But no sane man—much less a philosopher of the acuteness and intelligence of Mr. Hume—could ever have meant to advocate the constant and indefinite depreciation of the standard. Mr. Hume was speaking of the stimulus to trade which progressive reduction in the value of the precious metals would afford; but this is a matter totally distinct from actual depreciation of the standard by authority. If such depreciation is to be indefinite, where, I would ask the hon. member, is such a system to find an end? If parliament were to make a declaration, not only that the standard shall be altered now, but that the value of the currency shall be continually lowered by a constant future depreciation, it would be tantamount to a declaration, that there shall be no credit, and no commercial dealing in this country. If paper is not to be inconvertible, and if there is to be no depreciation of the standard, what separate interest can agriculture have in a change of the monetary system—and why connect the proposal for a change with inquiry into agricultural distress? Some gentlemen indeed argue, that a silver is, abstractedly, preferable to a gold standard; and there might, possibly, be some reason for that preference, if the whole matter were res integra, and we had now to choose, unfettered by any previous choice, between a gold and a silver standard. But suppose we had adopted a silver standard in the year 1819, and made paper convertible into silver instead of gold, the same pressure and distress would have occurred as that which followed the resumption of the gold standard. I see no advantage in the substitution of a silver for a gold standard. It appears to me, that at present our system of currency is as nearly perfect as it can be. We have gold as a sole standard, and we use silver coin as a token. You coin a pound of silver into 66s. instead of 62s., the mint price, or 60s. the real price, at present; but you do not permit it to be a legal tender for any sum above 40s. Now, if we proceed to alter the currency, the first question would be, shall we have a double standard of gold and silver conjointly, or shall we simply alter our standard from gold to silver? I cannot see any advantage derivable from the institution of a double standard—you cannot make a double standard without first defining the ratio which is to exist between the nominal values of the two metals. To say that every man shall pay his debt in silver or gold, whichever he might please, without defining their relative value, would be absurd and impracticable. We might certainly have a double standard, defining the relative values of gold and silver, and leaving it to the option of a party who had money to pay, to make his payment either in gold or silver. But this very option seems defeating the object of a standard, and introducing, unnecessarily, uncertainty into contracts. It appears to me a much less simple course than that of adhering to a single standard, and a course unaccompanied by any advantage countervailing the loss of simplicity. Gold and silver seem to have some necessary connexion, from being so frequently united in common parlance; but there is no more reason that they should be united in a standard, than that gold and lead, or gold and copper, should be so united. To unite two metals, the value of which is not in a fixed ratio, and cannot be, in a double standard, is to diminish the value and advantage of a standard. The more simple the standard the better—the very name implies unity and simplicity. It is the measure of value—and why not have one measure of value, as well as one measure of length or capacity? The hon. gentleman proposed to take silver as the standard, leaving gold to find its own value. I know that the subject is a dry one, and that the attempt to argue it, without having recourse to any exciting topics of party interest, must weary the patience of the House—but I will be as concise as possible. The hon. gentleman, then, is inclined to take silver as the standard, and to leave gold to find its own value, in the same way as copper, or lead, or coin, or any other article of commercial traffic. Now, what does he gain by this for agriculture? At what rate is silver to be estimated? At the former mint rate, 62s. to the pound, or at its present value in the market—namely, about 60s. to the pound? To take the silver standard at 66s., the rate at which the silver token circulates, would be barefaced depreciation of the standard, and certainly, if you are determined to depreciate your currency, the best and simplest mode of depreciation will be to do it openly and avowedly. Do not attempt to cover your design, but declare at once that the sovereign shall in future pass for 25s. or 30s., or any other sum you prefer. Such a plan would, at least, have this advantage—it would save the expense of calling in the present, and of issuing a new coinage. And it would also have another advantage—it would be doing that openly and fearlessly, if not honestly, that is often proposed to be done under other pretences. Whenever the House shall determine upon a depreciation of the standard of value—or, in other words, whenever you determine that the public creditor shall be defrauded, and that the debtor shall not pay what he has engaged to pay,—depend upon it, the best and simplest mode will be to say, that the sovereign shall remain a sovereign in name, but that it shall pass current for a larger amount than 20s. To adopt 66s. for the value of silver as a standard, because it has now that value as a token, would, I again repeat it, be a clear depreciation of the standard. I do not, however, understand that the hon. member is for taking 66s. as his standard for silver, when the price of silver is at present only about 60s. The sole object for which the hon. member professes to want his committee is, to inquire whether it is expedient to substitute silver at 60s. or 62s. as a standard, instead of gold at £3 : 17 : 10½ the ounce. To estimate silver as a standard at 62s. when its value is only 60s., would be depreciation on a small scale. The gain would be hardly worth the odium. If depreciation be disavowed altogether—and if silver be adopted as a standard at its present market value in relation to gold—I doubt whether the hon. gentleman would make a good bargain, even with his own views of a good bargain, for the agriculturist. I doubt it, because, if the substitution of the standard took place, there would be an immediate rise in the value of silver. Those who are the most opposed to the principle of the Act of 1819, should be the persons least sanguine in their expectations of great benefits to be derived from the substitution at present of a silver for a gold standard. If silver be substituted for gold as a standard, there must be, according to their doctrines, a material rise in the price of silver. Gold, being no longer required for coin, might leave the country, and might be depreciated in value,—for England would not then want the millions of gold which are now necessary for its circulation. Silver, on the other hand, being wanted instead of gold, having been substituted as the standard—as the sole legal tender—England would appear in the market as a purchaser of silver, which would therefore be more in demand, and would consequently rise in price. If this should be the case to any extent whatever, where would be the relief, to the debtor or mortgager, from an alteration in the standard? It may be said that there is a greater probability that silver will fall in value, on account of increased production from the mines, than that gold will. I doubt, however, whether a reference to the productiveness of mines, would not prove that gold has been of late years produced, relatively, in much greater quantities than silver. If hon. members will consult the works of Baron Humboldt,—if they will advert to the returns, imperfect as they must be, obtained from our consuls and diplomatic agents in South America,—if they will look at the statements contained in Mr. Jacob's work,—they will probably see reason to doubt whether gold is not now produced, taking into account the new supply from North America, from Russia, and from Siberia, in larger quantities, relatively to silver, than it has been heretofore. I doubt whether the hon. member, if he were to obtain his object of introducing, not a conjoint, but a silver standard, singly, at the present rate of silver, would not find that his efforts had been productive of more harm than good to the interests which he hopes to serve; and whether he would not, ere long, be awakened to the conviction, that he had made a worse bargain for those of the agriculturists who are suffering from debts and incumbrances, than that which exists at present. So much for alteration of the standard of value unconnected with depreciation. Now, let us consider it in connection with depreciation. By depreciating the standard, the prices of all commodities would be raised; the agriculturist would receive a greater price for the corn which he has to sell, but he will also have to pay a greater price for all the articles which he has to purchase for himself and his family; and thus the apparent and nominal advantages which he would reap as a seller, will be counter-balanced by the greater prices which he will be obliged to pay as a purchaser. There is, however, one point in which he would undoubtedly be a gainer at first from the depreciation of the currency. The rate of labour would, for a time—perhaps a considerable time—be lower; but in that case who would be the sufferer? Who but the agricultural labourer? I say, the sufferer by the depreciation of the currency is sure to be the labourer. The rate of wages would not be increased simultaneously with the reduced value of money. I know the argument that is used with regard to the general prosperity which is to revisit the land, and the demand for labour which would be the consequence of it: I know that the advocates of depreciation attempt to supply the deficiency of their arguments by the magnificence of their prophecies; but the truth is, the price of labour does not vary so rapidly as the price of commodities; and, depend upon it, that the first and chief sufferer by depreciation of the currency is he who is supported by the wages of manual labour. All, then, that the agriculturist would gain from depreciating the standard, would be the amount of his savings by defrauding the public creditor, and pinching the agricultural labourer. “But,” said the hon. gentleman, “the agricultural interest has a claim to the advantages which may arise from depreciating the currency, and from diminishing the pressure of the public burthens; because the members of it contracted their debts in one currency, and are now called upon to pay them in another.” Much has been said of the injustice done to those who, having made their engagements in depreciated, were called upon to fulfil them in an improved, currency; and no doubt there has been hardship in peculiar cases: but was it possible to devise any just scheme of general adjustment? It clearly is not fair to take one period only into account, or one class of sufferers from fluctuations in the value of the currency. If there is to be an attempt at the equitable adjustment of contracts, it must be on a very comprehensive principle, and extend over a very long period. We hear much of the injustice inflicted on the man who, having borrowed money during the period of a depreciated currency, has been called upon to repay it in one of increased value. But what say you to the case of those who, having lent money previously to the year 1797—that is, previously to the suspension of cash payments—were compelled to receive their principal or their interest in that very currency, the depreciation of which is said to have been so great? Were not they, at least, as great sufferers as the others? and can you open one of these accounts for equitable adjustment, and close the other? The question is,—“Can justice be done, now, by altering the arrangement to which Parliament came in the year 1819?” In 1819? No, I have already said, that that arrangement was decided on by Parliament in the year 1816. I repeat, that the arrangement was, in reality, made in 1816. I do not mean that cash payments were legally established in 1816; but I mean that, owing to natural causes, in consequence of the return of peace—the cessation of the stimulus of war—the free intercourse in all commodities—and the improvement in machinery, common to all manufacturing countries—that reduction of prices, and that contraction of currency, took place in 1816, which are attributed almost exclusively to the Act of 1819. It is necessary to separate the operation of that bill from these effects, which were produced by the natural causes which I have enumerated, and by the engagement into which Parliament had entered, to revert to cash payments on the conclusion of peace. Nineteen years have now elapsed since 1816, and, with trifling exceptions, all contracts now in existence were formed under the existing system of currency, and in full confidence that this system would be continued. Those who formed them had not only the faith of ordinary law to depend on, but had also the knowledge that repeated attempts were made in this House to obtain an alteration of that law, and were as repeatedly resisted and refused. The Act for the actual resumption of cash payments passed in 1819. In 1821, the House came to a solemn resolution, that it would not consent to any alteration in the standard. In 1826, it repeated that declaration; and, again, in 1833. What justice then, I ask, would there be in now depreciating the standard, and in making all contracts formed since 1819 conform to a depreciated currency? So far from redressing any injustice inflicted by former fluctuations, how many parties are there who would be double sufferers—who have closed the transactions—who have paid the debts in respect to which the former hardship was sustained—and have entered into new contracts, by the derangement of which they would again suffer? How small a portion of the contracts formed before 1816 remain now unfulfilled, compared with the number which have been formed since? In how many cases, to which law did not reach,—leases, for instance, and contracts for fixed payments,—has compensation been made by voluntary compacts between the parties? What injustice would you not inflict on those who have entered into contracts on the faith of your acts and of your resolutions, solemnly made and as solemnly reiterated, if you now compel the derangement of them, by depreciating the currency in which they were formed? For these considerations, and without troubling the House by the introduction of extraneous topics—believing that the agriculturists have no real interest in the proposition, apart from a depreciation of the currency, and thereby robbing the public creditor—and feeling it to be inconsistent with the honour and integrity of the House of Commons to lend itself to any measure that would have that result,—I shall not permit the pretext of a vague inquiry into agricultural distress to blind me as to the real objects of this proposition, which is neither more nor less than, through a depreciation of the standard, to seek a relief which would not, I believe, be effectual; and which, if effectual, would, I am sure, be dishonest.

On a division, the numbers were—Ayes, 126; Noes, 216; majority, 90.

THE BALLOT.

JUNE 2, 1835.

Mr. Grote having moved, "That it is the opinion of this House that the votes at elections for members of parliament should be taken by secret ballot," a long and animated discussion ensued, towards the close of which—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, I shall detain the House but a very short time, it not being my wish to trespass on what I think is the very natural impatience of hon. members. After the utter exhaustion of argument, I think I should be the last person to protract the discussion by any attempt to go over the same beaten course. I have recently heard the very able speech made on the principle of this measure, by the noble lord, the member for Devonshire—the noble lord, the member for Stroud, which to my mind carried complete conviction. To that speech I attach particular importance; because, from his recent experience in a popular election, the noble lord must have gained such information as to enable him to pronounce a judgment well entitled to the consideration of the House; and that speech, accordingly, followed by the able and argumentative address of the noble lord, the member for Lancashire, completed the conviction which I entertained upon the principle of the ballot. At the same time that my conviction was derived from the able arguments of two noble lords who took the same view of the question, it was, if possible, strengthened by the utterly abortive attempts of two subsequent speakers to weaken any one of their conclusions. One of those gentlemen who directed his attention to the subject, attaches great importance to it, and possesses considerable powers in debate; and sure I am that if the noble lord had taken up a false position, there is no man more competent than the hon. and learned gentleman to discover its weakness. Now, I ask any impartial man, whether the hon. and learned gentleman did succeed in shaking any one of his positions? I must say, that on this subject I should have been disposed to attach considerable weight to what fell from the hon. baronet. I pay him a sincere compliment when I say, that I am sure he delivered upon this question an opinion perfectly unbiassed by any party consideration; and his observations are peculiarly valuable, because he has, perhaps, had the longest experience of any man living in popular elections. Now, what did the hon. baronet admit? Why, that the speech of the noble lord, the member for Lancashire, had nearly convinced him, and that he had consequently been on the point of taking a different course to what he at first proposed. The hon. baronet further stated, that the anticipations of the advantages which would ensue from the introduction of the ballot, and the apprehensions as to the evils, were equally delusive, and that, in point of fact, we can neither gain nor lose any thing by its establishment. Then, sir, I ask why should we adopt a measure which is perfectly delusive? If, after all his experience of popular elections, it be his deliberate judgment that we have nothing to hope or fear from the ballot, does he not also see the great evil of adopting securities which he admits to be delusive? As to the argument of the hon. and learned member for Dublin, in reply to the noble lord, the member for Lancashire, what, he would ask, did it amount to? Why, in the first place, the hon. and learned member asserted that no pledge was ever given on the subject of the ballot during the discussion of the Reform Bill, that no such pledge could be quoted from the speeches of Lord Althorp, and that there was no pledge of honour on the part of those who supported Lord Grey's ministry in carrying reform, to prevent the legislature from now agreeing to establish the ballot. But did not the noble lord, the member for Lancashire, prove beyond the possibility of a doubt, that the government which brought forward the Reform Bill considered it as a final measure, and was determined to resist all further changes in the representative system? Could he bring forward a more cogent proof than that unanswerable extract from the speech of Lord Althorp, the leader of the House of Commons, and a witness the more unexceptionable, inasmuch as the opinions of the noble lord in an unreformed parliament were in favour of the ballot? The next objection of the hon. and learned gentleman was levelled at the quotation which the noble lord read from a letter in reference to America and the operation of the ballot system? The hon. and learned gentleman says, that in that case the ballot was not secret, but open. But what is the conclusion which we draw? That human nature overlooks all restrictions, and that the intention was to have a secret ballot, but that the influence of party was stronger than the operation of the law, and that parties became so deeply interested in the result of the election as to render all concealment impossible, and to put it to an end. The hon. gentleman has certainly, I must admit, brought forward his motion in the spirit which has been so justly characterized by the noble lord, the member for Lancashire, and delivered the speech introducing it not only with great ability but with exemplary temper. The hon. gentleman has, however, in the course of his able and eloquent speech, made one admission which, in my opinion, must prove fatal to the success of his proposition; for the hon. gentleman says that he would not—that it forms no part of the intention of his motion—exclude that which he designates as the really legal influence of property. He says that he thinks a man of property—a man of character—a man in whom confidence can be placed—will exercise, and ought to exercise, the influence which his position gives him over those who are his own neighbours, tenants, or dependents, even though the ballot should be in operation; but, if the hon. member thinks so, I ask him whether that is not directly contrary to the principle which is meant to be laid down by this motion? [Mr. Grote: "No, no."] Yes, but I contend that it is. By the introduction of the ballot it must be intended, or the argument of the hon. gentleman is worth nothing, that every individual voter shall take his own view of public affairs, and, having formed his own opinion, he must deliver his vote apart from influence or persuasion of any kind. If, then, the ballot

be efficacious at all, it must exclude that influence of property which the hon. gentleman says he desires to retain; would it not, then, be better to let voting remain, as at present, under the control of public opinion, than resort to secret voting, which must defeat the acknowledged efficacy of public opinion, as well as destroy the influence of property? The advocates of the ballot propose to confine that to the constituency, but why I know not. What is the difference in point of principle between the functions of the constituent body and the functions which the representatives of that constituent body are called upon to exercise? Are we inaccessible to the force of influence, or do we never, on many of the questions which come before us, act rather in conformity with party connection than upon abstract principle, in reference to their individual merits? Will it be said by any one member of this House, that, upon every question that comes before us, we act in accordance with the abstract merits of that question, without any view to party, or the existence of the ministers we wish to see in power? If we are to try every question by its abstract merits, I, for my own part, can see no reason why, if the ballot be considered good for the constituents, it should not also be good for the representatives, and why the ballot should not be introduced into the House of Commons. No doubt a vote by ballot might be given on purer principles than an open vote; but then you must, at the same time, take human nature into consideration, and make due allowance for its proneness to err. For my own part, I must say that I think the ballot would be, to say the least of it, inconvenient, and that it would not afford as much security for the proper exercise of the elective franchise as is given by acting in the face of day, subject to the control of public opinion. The influence of public opinion is the greatest security the country can have for the conduct of the representative body, and why it should not have an equally beneficial effect in the constituent body I certainly have yet to learn. But the hon. gentleman admits, if I apprehend him rightly, that in certain cases the ballot would be inefficacious. [Mr. Grote: "No."] In my view, the advantage of the ballot could at best be only partial; and the partial protection it would afford to a few, would be nothing as compared to the influence of public opinion over the great body of voters. I agree, sir, with the noble lord, the member for Lancashire, that we should not exclude the influence which property ought to possess; and I do not believe that the ballot would answer the expectations of its proposers if it were adopted. We cannot indeed exclude the influence of property consistently with the principles on which alone a monarchical government can be maintained; for, if the opinion of every man is to be considered as of equal weight, without reference to the influence of property, the result must be that the 40s. freeholder will have just as much influence over public affairs as the man who possesses ten, ay, a hundred, times his property and intelligence, and is infinitely more interested in the preservation of order. But, do what you will, I tell you that it is not in your power to exclude the influence of property; and I, therefore, am desirous that it should be exercised in the light of day, and under the control of public opinion. Now, sir, with respect to the manner in which it is proposed to meet this motion I shall offer only a very few remarks. The noble lord, the member for Stroud, is on principle opposed to the ballot. His Majesty's government intends to resist the motion; and where, then, is the necessity of not coming to a decision upon it at once? This is not a question which requires that we should wait for further information than we at present possess; and if we have experience enough to enable us to decide the matter now, where is the advantage of leaving it unsettled? By that course we preclude ourselves from nothing; for if new events should arise hereafter to induce us to alter our opinions, we shall be just as competent to deal with the question as if no discussion and no decision had ever taken place. If, then, we are opposed to the principle, what is the consequence of meeting it with a direct negative? By a direct negative all we affirm is that our minds are unconvinced, and that, instead of adopting a new experiment, we think proper to adhere to the present system; and this, I confess, appears to me to be the course which we ought to take. I come to the same conclusion as the noble lord, and feel averse from doing that which is calculated to delude the public into supposing that our opinion on this subject is not made up. We have, without allowing this question to remain unsettled, enough business on hand to occupy us for a long period; and am I unreasonable when I ask the House to dispose of this motion at the present moment, and not to adopt a vote which must lead to an impression on the part of the public that we are undecided—that our minds are not yet made up about the matter. Under these circumstances, I hope the noble lord will act upon the impression with which he came down to his place this evening—that he will, as leader of his Majesty's government in that House, so far set an example as openly to avow the opinion of the government—that he will concur with us, who wish to meet the question with a direct negative, rather than agree to so inconvenient a proposition as that brought forward by the hon. gentleman, the member for Derbyshire. I do, sir, hope that the noble lord, sensible of the inconvenience of assenting to the proposition of the hon. gentleman, the member for Derbyshire, will now come to a negative or affirmative decision of the main question. Instead of voting for the previous question, I hope we shall give the motion a decided negative, and that the noble lord will add his authority to the decision, by voting with me at once against the proposition of the hon. member for the city of London.

The motion was negatived by 317 to 144; majority, 173.

CORPORATION REFORM.

JUNE 5, 1835.

In the discussion arising out of Lord John Russell's motion, for leave to bring in a bill for the better regulation of Municipal Corporations in England and Wales—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, although, sir, I have resolved to avail myself of every advantage in the discussion of this most important question, which additional time and opportunities of reference, not only to documents already in the possession of the House, but to others which are not yet laid before it, will afford me, and to decline entering, therefore, into any detailed discussion of the measure which the noble lord has this night proposed: yet, sir, on account of its vast importance, I should be unwilling to allow the motion to be put from the chair without a single observation having been offered on the subject except those contained in the speech of the noble lord. I shall make no opposition whatever to that motion; I shall throw not the slightest impediment in the way of the introduction of this bill—and, moreover, I am about to state opinions upon the subject of Municipal Reform generally—though not in immediate reference to this measure, the details of which are so important that each is entitled to separate discussion—which will prove that an opposition on my part to the introduction of this measure would be quite inconsistent with the opinions which I entertain.

Sir, when I look to the state of the population of the larger towns of this kingdom—when I contemplate the rapidity with which places, which at no remote period were inconsiderable villages, have, through manufacturing industry, started into life, and into great wealth and importance—when I look, too, to the imperfect provision which is now made for the preservation of order and the administration of justice in most of those towns—I cannot deny that the time has arrived when it is of the utmost importance to the well-being of society, to establish within societies so circumstanced a good system of municipal government. In some of these towns no permanent and regular provision is, at present, made for the maintenance of public order, and the general purposes of good government; in others, the provision which was originally intended to be made through the instrumentality of the corporate system, has become utterly inefficient for the purpose; and I am bound to admit, therefore, that on account of the change of circumstances, and on that account singly, there was ample ground for now considering whether such provision ought not to be made in towns not corporate; and whether in those towns which have corporations, the provision at present in force be not inadequate! Sir, I am bound also to state that, on referring as fully as I have been able to do since they were presented, and amid the great pressure of other business, to the reports on the state of corporations, the general impression left on my mind is, that, independently of the considerations above mentioned, the general purport of the evidence adduced before the commission, shows that the time is also arrived when it is necessary for parliament to interfere for the purpose of providing some effectual checks against the abuses which have been proved to prevail in some of the corporate bodies in this country. I therefore, sir, without hesitation admit, that it is of the utmost importance to the well-being of society, that a good system of municipal government should be provided for the larger towns of this country, whether they be corporate or not, by the means of which the regular and pure administration of justice may be extended and secured, and the maintenance of public order promoted through the means of a well-regulated police. And, sir, after having made that admission, I think it follows, almost as a matter of course, that corporations, where they exist, ought to be made mainly instrumental in effecting those objects. To leave the corporations precisely on their present ground, and to establish new rates (where they may be necessary) for municipal purposes, by new laws to be now passed, making no new provision for the application of these revenues, placing them under the sole control of corporate bodies existing on the old principle, would have a great tendency to defeat the object in view. If we admit the fact, that the well-being of society requires the consideration of a good system of municipal government, it is impossible to exclude from simultaneous consideration the existing state of the corporate bodies themselves. I think parliament has a right to require, by laws to be now passed, that the revenues of these corporations, excepting where they are applied under particular bequests to special purposes, shall be henceforth devoted to public purposes connected with public municipal interests. I must say, that if I were a member of any corporation, so far from looking at this question in a mere narrow party light, I should feel a much greater interest, a much stronger, direct, personal, pecuniary interest, in seeing the corporate funds applied to public purposes, than in seeing them applied to any system of public feasting, or to any objects of mere electioneering and party interest. At the same time it is due to the existing corporations to admit at once, that while I have not the slightest objection to any new provision to be made by law which should impose some check on the appropriation of corporate revenues, such check will involve a new principle in law. The principle of the law hitherto has been, that these corporate bodies have had a legal right to apply their funds to other than public municipal purposes: they clearly had a right to apply their funds to corporate purposes as distinguished from municipal; and I apprehend that it has been ruled by the highest authorities, that excepting so far as the restraining statutes interfered with the powers of ecclesiastical corporations, the corporations of this country had a right to regulate at their discretion the application of their property, and even to alienate it, if they thought proper. The report made by the commissioners has not sufficiently referred to the principles of law in conformity with which the corporations have hitherto acted. I think, also, there is ground for complaint that this report involves all the corporations in too indiscriminate a censure, that it does not sufficiently point out the many cases in which corporations have acted honestly in the performance of their trust, but that it has thrown a general reflection on all corporations, in consequence of the abuse of their functions by a limited number. The noble lord did wisely in laying down the principle, that we had much better defer to a future opportunity any attempt to cite particular instances in which corporations may not have been justly dealt with. It is much more convenient on this occasion to refer to the general principle of the measure, than to enter into the consideration of any special and individual cases. The noble lord's precepts, however, were, as it often happens, much sounder than his practice. The noble lord said, he would not refer to instances of particular corporations; but scarcely had the words escaped the noble lord's lips, when he referred to some eight or ten corporations—not very impartially selected, I must say—and it is a little singular, that of those eight or ten corporations, the noble lord became acquainted with the circumstances of four-fifths of them by having access to documents which have not yet been laid before the House. We have had no report upon Norwich—we have had no report upon Bedford—we have had no report upon Oxford—we have had no report upon Cambridge—we have had no report upon Orford—we have had no report upon Aldborough—we have had no report upon Ipswich—and yet these are the cases which the noble lord has selected, and upon which he has mainly founded his argument. There is a double ground of complaint against the noble lord. He first takes the unfair advantage of quoting from documents to which he alone has had access, thus precluding all answer or explanation, which a reference to those documents might possibly afford; and secondly, he selects the cases of corporations in which a particular class of political opinions predominate, thus warranting the inference, that the party in the state holding those opinions, had been specially, if not exclusively, the encouragers of corporate abuse.

The noble lord, in the playfulness of his fancy, sent down an antiquarian on an excursion to the eastern coast of this country, to examine with particular and special care into the cases of Aldborough and Orford. Now, I hope the antiquarian will travel into the interior; I hope he will not select the smallest boroughs in which to indulge his antiquarian propensities. I hope he will go to Derby. Yes, I hope he will go to Derby, and, moreover, I hope he will go to Portsmouth. I really wish the noble lord had not taken this course; I wish he had adhered to the rule he himself laid down, because it would have been infinitely better to discuss general principles without reference to particular cases; and above all, if there were to be references to particular cases, it should have been to cases, to the reports on which all sides of the House had had access equally, and which were a fair and impartial selection. Why, see to what an objection the noble lord lays himself fairly open. If these unpublished reports be important as illustrations of his arguments, why did the noble lord press forward this measure until those reports were completed? I seek no delay of this measure; but I must say, with reference to good government, and to the success of the municipal system about to be established, that I do hope his Majesty's government—if they should find on this side of the House that disposition which they seem not to have anticipated, to discuss this question fairly, without reference to its party bearings, but with a single view of providing a system of good government—I say, I do hope his Majesty's government will feel it to be important on a matter even more intimately connected with the peace and happiness of these towns than the Reform Bill itself, to afford most ample time for the mature deliberation of the details of this bill. If the noble lord deem those reports, which are not yet laid upon the table, to be important as illustrations of his own arguments, he ought at least to enable us to refer to the whole of them before we are called upon to decide on the details of the measure. I again repeat, that I wish the noble lord had not made a partial speech. If the noble lord looks to the facts of the case, he will find nothing in the corporations of Aldborough or Orford which will make them more open to his comments, than corporations over which his own political friends have exercised an influence. I am quite aware of the observation in reply, to which I expose myself; I am quite aware that if I show that no class of political opinions, whether professedly Liberal or Conservative, is a guarantee against the exercise of undue influence, that I am only fortifying the general argument in favour of reform. No doubt this is the case. The more general perversion of corporate privileges, the greater the necessity for correction; but let us have the case fairly stated—let us acknowledge the truth, that Tory corporations are not the only ones to blame. The noble lord forces me to offer him a specimen, and it shall be but a specimen, of Whig, pure Whig, corporations; I am sure it escaped his recollection, and I therefore invite him to refresh his memory by referring to the report on Derby. We find it stated in the case of the corporation of Derby, that whenever they thought the number of freemen in their interest was "getting low," the mayor, or some other influential member of the corporation, applied to the agents of the Cavendish family, and requested a list of the names of persons to be admitted as "honorary freemen." The corporation took this course, because they wished to avail themselves of the interest of the Cavendish family over the freemen so admitted. On the last occasion when honorary freemen were made, almost all of them were tenants of his grace the Duke of Devonshire. The agent of his grace paid the fees on the admission of the honorary freemen. Without the creation of such freemen, it was said the corporation "could not have kept the Tories quiet—they would have been restless." Now we are not so intolerant here, I am sure, as to presume that our own opinions, or our own acts, must be exactly right, and those of every one else wrong; but if this corporation report had stated that a Tory nobleman had nominated all the freemen, and had paid for their freedom, and that the excuse was, that without doing so they could not have kept the Reformers quiet—the Reformers ("who were very restless,")—what a burst of vehement indignation would have been raised in this House against such an abuse of corporate privileges! I have not the slightest intention of following the noble lord's example in detail. As for myself and the corporation of Tamworth, with which I have the honour to be connected, we have no reason to shrink from any inquiry. As far as that truly honourable corporation is concerned, the report is most satisfactory. It gives to the corporation, both in respect to the selection of members and all its proceedings, unqualified praise.

I will not follow the noble lord by detailing many cases of Whig abuse; but there is one other corporation of which I must remind the noble lord. The antiquarian must not omit in the course of his excursion to pay a friendly visit to Portsmouth. (Mr. Bonham Carter bowed, which occasioned much laughter.) "In Portsmouth," say the commissioners, "it can hardly be necessary to point out the complete closeness of the system. For a long series of years it has been exercised with the undisguised purpose of confining the whole municipal and political power to a particular party, and almost to a particular family, and (as the report justly observes) it has been found perfectly efficacious in its operation." "That no instances can be traced of municipal corruption, seems attributable, not to any correcting principle in the system, but merely to the absence of evil intentions in those who had accidentally been placed at its head." Now, if I were to choose a corporation in the neighbourhood of which I, as an individual not interested in the honest application of corporate property, and fond of good living, should like to reside, the corporation of Portsmouth is the one, of all others, on which, without a moment's hesitation, my choice would fall. [Mr. Bonham Carter expressed his dissent.] The hon. gentleman shakes his head; let me beg his attention to the facts stated by the commissioners, with reference to that corporation. Their revenues are, I think, £600 or £700 a-year, of which about £450 is annually expended in feasts. Here is the account:—"The feasts," say the commissioners, "are rather more expensive this year than in ordinary years." Now, here let me ask the House in what year they supposed it was that the expense of feasting was particularly heavy? Why, no less than the great era of reform. "On the occasion of the accession of his present Majesty, £41, 9s. was spent in refreshment for the party attending the proclamation, and in the year 1830 the sum of £108, 10s. was expended on a dinner given on the election of the representatives—which expense, says the report, was defrayed on former occasions by the members themselves. The annual average expense of feasts from 1824 to 1831, inclusively, was £447. An account was given to us, showing that the average income during that time, accruing from dividends and rents, was £600." Now I have proved, I think, beyond a doubt, that in the whole kingdom there is not a more hospitable corporation than this, at least in proportion to their means; for out of an income not exceeding £600, the annual average expenditure on the rites of hospitality is no less than £447. But mark the attachment of the members of this corporation to the great principles upon which the Reform act was founded. Nothing can more clearly show their devotion to reform, than the special exception which they make in 1830 from their former usages, and the increased hospitality in which they indulged at the era of reform. Then it is that they add a new item to their expenditure, and pay £108, 10s. for an election dinner, the charge for which has been heretofore defrayed by the members themselves.

Mr. Francis Baring said, as we understood, that he had paid his share of the expense.

Sir Robert Peel: Here is the report, in which the whole matter is set down.

Mr. Bonham Carter: It is a very faithful report.

Sir Robert Peel continued—£41, 9s. was sufficient for a feast on the occasion of his Majesty's accession, but no less a sum than £108 was expended on a dinner to the representatives on their election. The hon. gentleman says, that this report is a faithful report, and he, no doubt, has repaid to the corporation his share of the money. I shall say nothing in regard to the corporation of Nottingham, or any other corporation; nor, indeed, should I have alluded to that of Portsmouth, but for the purpose of showing that neither the noble lord, nor any other person, ought to attempt to visit upon any one party exclusively, the abuses which have existed in corporations.

But the better course is to look to the future; and I, as one of the Conservative party, strongly advise all members of corporations readily and willingly to concur in an amendment of the existing system—to relinquish the influence that they may have derived from the control over corporate funds and charitable trusts; but upon this express condition—that the reform be a sincere, bona fide reform—that it be not a mere pretext for transferring power from one party in the state to another; that the object aimed at shall be a good system of municipal government—taking security, as far as security upon such a subject can be taken, that the really intelligent and respectable portion of the community of each town be called to the administration of municipal affairs; and guarding against the future application of the charitable or corporate funds to any other than charitable or public purposes. If this be the avowed and the real object of the new measure, I for one shall be disposed to give a favourable consideration to its general principles, and will co-operate cheerfully in the amendment of its details; but if, under the specious pretext of amendment, it shall be merely calculated not to extirpate, but to transfer the abuse of power—to extinguish one political party and to elevate another—then I shall consider the bill a great public evil, aggravating and confirming and perpetuating every existing abuse. I do not object to the principle, that corporate revenues shall be applied strictly to public municipal purposes—I do not object to the principle, that those who administer those revenues, and exercise corporate authority, shall execute their trust under the control of popular opinion. If, after admitting the leading principles, I suggest delay in the further consideration of this subject, I make the suggestion with no sinister view, and from no motive but a desire for the successful working of the new system. A great question of this kind, so complex in its details, and so very important in its principle, should not be hastily discussed. It requires long and deliberate investigation; and a little delay would not be misplaced in such a case. Great questions are never fully or successfully matured by a hurried process; their perfection is only the work of caution, time, and care.

I beg to advert briefly to one or two points in the noble lord's measure. He says the right of suffrage is to be invested in the rate-payers. ["No," from the Ministerial side.] Well, in the rate-payers being householders, and subject to certain conditions of residence and payment of rates. He does not invest it exclusively in the £10 householders. He would allow every one, no matter what the amount of his qualification be, a vote in the election of the governing body of the town, provided he be a resident rate-payer. The qualification of the constituent body is of course a most important element in the question. So is the frequency of elections. How often are they to take place? Every one who had respect for the good order of society, and was anxious to prevent personal collisions and animosities, which were unhappily consequent on elections, should be anxious to avoid too frequent occasions for these popular ferments. Corporate reform may be a very desirable and beneficial measure; but I trust we can procure the advantage of it at a cheaper rate than the sacrifice of the harmony, and good will, and social concord of the societies to which it is to be applied. If there is to be a perpetual conflict of political principle in every town—a constant revival of bitter animosities, with all the concomitant evils of popular elections—the result may be—the exclusion of men of intelligence and respectability from corporate functions—a bad administration of corporate authority—and destruction to all friendly intercourse and social happiness among men of different parties in the same town.

I give no opinion at present upon the nature of the qualification which the noble lord proposes for the constituent body. If he had taken the £10 franchise as the qualification, he would have had the same means of ascertaining the actual right to vote, which exists in the case of elections for members of parliament, namely, registration of the voter. If he takes a different franchise, there must still be some check upon the exercise of it—some means of proving that the right claimed is really possessed by the party claiming it. If the noble lord's plan be adopted, there will be in each borough town three different popular bodies entitled to vote in public matters. The vestry, controlling the expenditure of the poor-rates—the £10 householders, electing the members of parliament—and the body of householders, who will be entitled to vote for the common council and corporate officers. This seems, at first sight at least, a complicated and not very satisfactory arrangement.

Another important point, and one which will require very deliberate attention, is, the fixing of the limits of the new corporate jurisdiction in all cases wherein the limits of the existing corporate authority are unsuitable. By whom are the new limits to be determined on? Are they to be co-extensive in all cases with the limits of the borough under the reform bill? And if not, what authority shall decide on the exceptions to be made—and on the precise degree to which the old limits shall be extended? If the new common council is to have the authority of imposing additional rates for municipal purposes, this question of limits will be a most important one, and one of very difficult settlement. It will occasionally be embarrassed by the existence of local acts, extending over districts, the limits of which are different both from those of the old corporation and of the new borough, and which districts may have separate debts, and separate engagements. It may be very fit to abolish all these distinctions, and incorporate the whole into one district, subject to one general superintending authority; but it will be no easy matter, I fear, to provide by one general law for the mode of doing this consistently with justice, and the satisfaction of the parties concerned.

Some express provision ought to be made with regard to the existing obligations of corporate bodies. Many of them have contracted debts and engagements, in some cases, perhaps, improvidently; but still, if those debts and engagements were contracted under the authority of the law, the creditors ought to have a full assurance that the nature of their security shall not be affected by any change in the corporate authorities. In some corporations, the members of which are trustees of charitable estates, the estates have been alienated, and a compensation has been made by the charitable trust, not very regularly perhaps in some instances, out of the corporate revenues. Here, again, there ought to be a restraint upon the power which any new body may acquire over those revenues, and provision should be made, that the first lien upon the corporate property shall be, the repayment of the sum due to the charity on account of the alienation of the trust estates.

Then, again, with respect to ecclesiastical patronage. Many corporations are possessed of valuable livings, and extensive patronage connected with the church. Surely the right of appointing to livings ought not to be exercised by those who are not members of the church—who cannot be fit judges of the qualifications requisite in a minister of another religious profession, and have no direct interest in making fit appointments. A corporation possessed of ecclesiastical patronage, might, under the new system, be composed entirely of Dissenters, or might be under the control, at least, of a predominant dissenting interest. Would it be fitting that ecclesiastical patronage connected with the Church of England should be exercised by a dissenting body? Would not Dissenters themselves be the first to protest against any legislative enactment, which should by possibility place the nomination to their spiritual charges, whether Roman Catholic, or Methodist, or Presbyterian, in the hands, or under the direct influence, of members of the Church of England?

With regard to the future management of charitable trusts, such as have been hitherto under the superintendence of corporate authorities, some special provision will be, in my opinion, necessary, for the purpose of strictly confining the application of the charitable funds to the purposes for which they were intended. If they are to be placed under a political body, what security will there be that the political interest will not, as it has heretofore done, sway the distribution of the charitable revenues? There must be a selection of objects, and a large discretion as to that selection, capable of being very easily perverted to the promotion of party objects. Popular elections will give no security on this head; the body which owes its authority to the popular voice will have just as great temptation to the undue exercise of power in the management of a charitable trust, and as great opportunity for exercising it improperly, as a self-elected oligarchy. The only effectual precaution will be the separation, if possible, of the charitable from the municipal trust, and the selection of some independent and impartial authority, subject to proper control, for the management of the charitable estates, and the appropriation of the charitable revenues.

The noble lord has touched very imperfectly upon the local administration of justice under the new system which he proposes to establish. He has not adverted to the contemplated establishment of local courts, exercising jurisdiction in certain civil causes, and especially in regard to the recovery of debts below a certain amount. It will deserve serious consideration, whether, in the event of the establishment of such a local jurisdiction, the necessity for maintaining any separate borough jurisdiction will not, in most of the corporate towns, be superseded. In some of the larger ones, it may be fit to have a separate jurisdiction, but in the small boroughs, the continuance or establishment of a separate jurisdiction would interfere with the satisfactory and successful operation of any measure for the local administration of justice, founded upon general principles.

There is one point on which the noble lord has expressed an opinion, from which I see strong ground to dissent, namely, the proposal to devolve upon the common council—upon a body owing its authority to popular election—merely—the exclusive power of licensing public-houses within the corporate jurisdiction. I think this is a power, which a body so constituted is not likely to exercise wisely or impartially—that it is a power which may be grossly abused for party purposes, and also with a view to selfish considerations of personal interest. Here again I see no additional security against such abuse in popular election.

The noble lord proposes to confine the division of boroughs into wards, to twenty boroughs. I am very much inclined to think that the principle of such division may, with advantage, be extended much further—and that you may thereby ensure a much fairer representation of property, and of the varied interests in a borough, than if you were to make each borough a single district, without subdivision, so far as the right of election to corporate office is concerned.

Upon many of the points adverted to by the noble lord, the qualification of the constituent body, the number of the governing body, the frequency of elections, and other important matters of this kind, I shall reserve my opinion, feeling it quite unsuitable to the importance of the subject to pronounce a decided one at present. Of this I am satisfied, that no system of municipal government, however specious in its theory, will promote the object for which alone it ought to be designed, will ensure the maintenance of public order, the pure administration of justice, or the harmony and happiness of the societies to which it is to be applied, unless its direct tendency be to commit the management of municipal affairs to the hands of those who from the possession of property have the strongest interest in good government, and, from the qualifications of high character and intelligence, are most likely to conciliate the respect and confidence of their fellow citizens.

In reply to a remark by Lord John Russell, Sir Robert Peel observed, that there were some small corporations which had ceased to return members to parliament: he would therefore suggest, that if they wished to resign their corporate privileges they might be at liberty to do so. He thought that there could be no objection to this, provided it was done with the consent of all the parties interested.

The motion was ultimately agreed to; and the bill was brought in and read a first time.

Lord John Russell moved, “That the Municipal Corporation Reform Bill be read a second time.”

SIR ROBERT PEEL.—The same motives which induced me to listen favourably to the introduction of this bill, will lead me to give my assent to its second reading. We are told of party interests opposing obstacles in the way of the measure; but the great party with which I have the honour to be connected, feels, I have no doubt, the greatest interest in the establishment of a system of good municipal government in the large towns and cities of this kingdom—an interest far superior to that of mere party, or a desire to thwart the proceedings of the government—assuming the object of this bill to be the establishment of a good system of municipal government, and the correction, as far as human caution can provide, of all abuses attendant upon the exercise of corporate privileges. Our interest being concurrent with the maintenance of order, of laws, and of the established rights of property, will induce us to support whatever may be proved to be conducive to such objects. We are not inclined to oppose any private or special interest against that which may be necessary for the public good. Upon the same principle upon which the heritable jurisdictions of Scotland were abolished, and other reforms in the public policy have been made upon that same principle, if in any case corporate privileges are found to be an obstacle either to the pure administration of justice, or to the establishment of a good system of police and general government, we are willing to admit, that regard for the special privileges ought not to bar the consideration of whatever may conduce to the authority of the law, and to the maintenance of public order. We, therefore, shall offer no opposition to the second reading of this bill. Sir, I cannot contemplate the condition of some of the great towns of this country, and witness the frequent necessity of calling in the military in order to maintain tranquillity, without feeling desirous that the inhabitants of such towns should be habituated to obedience and order through the instrumentality of an efficient civil power, and a regular and systematic enforcement of the law. I believe that you could not establish a system of good government in the populous towns and cities of this country, retaining at the same time every existing privilege and practice of the corporate bodies as at present constituted; and I think it much better to place those towns under the exclusive control of a corporate authority, invigorated and adapted to their present state of society, than to leave the ancient corporation precisely where we find it—devolving at the same time all real power, and almost all the functions of administrative authority, upon some new body constituted on a different and more popular principle. This would be a virtual supercession of the ancient corporation—a virtual extinction of the power for the exercise of which it was originally intended; and its permitted co-existence with another body really exercising the authority of municipal government, would be of no possible advantage, either private or public. On the details of this bill, I, of course, reserve to myself the right of voting in such a manner as, after mature deliberation, shall appear to me to be the best calculated to effect that object which the bill professes to have in view. If I shall deem it necessary to propose any important amendment in such of the provisions of the bill as involve its general principle, I shall give notice of the nature of such amendment; and I think it would be a great convenience if hon. gentlemen were to do the same. Sir, I apprehend the three most important details connected with the bill are, the qualification of the constituent body, the qualification of the governing body, and the frequency of their election. With respect to the qualification of the constituent body, having given due consideration to that subject since this measure was brought forward by the noble lord (Lord John Russell), my present impression is, that it will be advantageous to establish a qualification different from that which is required for the constituent body under the Reform Act. The hon. gentleman who spoke last, and relied on his experience in respect to Scotch burghs, omitted to state, that the qualification for an elector in the burghs of Scotland is identical with that of an elector of a member of Parliament. In each case in Scotland, the £10 householder is the elector. As to the policy of following that precedent, and taking the same qualification in each case in this country, I feel the full force of the objection urged by the noble lord (Lord Stanley), that we run the risk of creating a corporate body influenced by all those political feelings and interests which sway that body in its other capacity of returning members to serve in parliament; and that every vacancy in the office of councillor, whether arising by death, by absence, or by the triennial retirement of a third of the council, would become a trial of political strength, having a great tendency to paralyze the exertions of the local magistracy, by giving them the character of political partisans—by throwing upon their magisterial acts the character, or at least the imputation, of partiality. There may, therefore, be an advantage in the establishment of a separate qualification for the elective body; and in that case the only question will be, what is the proper qualification? The suggestion of a three years' continuous residence and payment of rates, is a point which appears to me to require mature consideration. I am inclined to think it not a bad qualification, provided it be a bonâ fide one, and that effectual precautions be taken against the abuse of it—against the creation of a fictitious franchise. Three years' residence is a fair primâ facie test of good character; and three years' payment of rate—that is, a continuous payment of rate—by the occupier himself, is such a test of property and interest in good municipal government, as qualifies a man for the exercise of this franchise. At the same time it will be absolutely necessary to guard against many possible cases, in which there may be an usurpation of this franchise, and an evasion of the intention of the law. In many towns there are pauper residents, who, without having any parochial settlement in them, would, without such precautions, be entitled to vote for the council; they are paupers belonging to other parishes, who live under the constant threat of the overseers, that if they do not pay their rates regularly, they will be removed; and in many cases, the parishes to which they belong are the payers of the rates. Now, I apprehend that such persons as these are much less interested in the well-being of the town in which they reside, than persons possessing the elective franchise ought to be. They may have been residents for three years, and the rates due from them may have been paid; yet if they are, in point of fact, paupers belonging to another parish, they surely ought not to have a voice in the government of the town in which they are casual residents. I trust, therefore, that an effectual provision will be made, by which the qualification established in this bill shall be bonâ fide adhered to. I do not agree with those hon. gentlemen who maintain, that every man who contributes to the rates ought to have a vote in the government of a borough. You did not act on that principle in the Reform bill—you did not in that bill enact, that every man who contributes to the public exigencies shall vote for members of parliament. The main point to be considered is—not the abstract theoretical right of each particular man, but what is the class of electors which will be likely to choose, permanently, the best governing body?—and you have a perfect right to act upon the same principle in the government of a town as of a kingdom. If you believe that three years' payment of rates, and three years' residency, are the best qualification, and will secure a sufficient control over the acts of the governing body, it is a much more material object to establish that qualification, than to act upon the mere theory, that every man who contributes to the rates has a right to the franchise. With respect to the frequency of elections, I am inclined to think there is much reason in the proposition of the noble lord (Lord Stanley). I think we should study to give more permanency to the governing body, and to avoid the perpetual recurrence of those conflicts which poison the harmony of society. There are other advantages in life, besides the elective franchise and popular elections; and if you sacrifice the concord and peace of these great societies, for which you are now providing a system of government, to speculative improvements in the mode of that government, you will defeat your own ends, by discouraging the truly qualified and respectable inhabitants from voting on municipal affairs, and will provide little security against the abuse of power. With respect to the qualification of the members of the governing body, I believe the prevalent opinion in the country to be, that there ought to be some qualification—an opinion which has been acted upon by one of high authority on this subject (Lord Brougham). In the bill which he introduced for the government of certain towns, at present incorporate, he established a £10 qualification for the electors, and a qualification of £1000, of real and personal property, for each member of the governing body. Considering in all cases, that, by this bill, the mayor is to be a county magistrate virtute officii, to take his seat as a magistrate with those from whom a qualification is now required, there ought surely to be some test of his respectability in point of station in life and competency. In most of the local acts which have been established with the concurrence of the inhabitants of the towns to which they refer, there has been a qualification required in persons who are to be trusted with authority. I dare say the noble lord has looked into the act for the government of Stroud, the town he represents. I am not very well versed in the history of that local act; but I have no reason to doubt that it was passed with the general concurrence of the respectable and intelligent inhabitants of the town. In that act a high qualification is required on the part of the persons who have to perform functions analogous to those which are intrusted to the governing body of a borough under this bill. The points to which I have thus referred are those, I apprehend, which involve the chief considerations connected with this measure that are of a political character. There are several other details of the bill which are of great importance, and which require the most serious consideration. They are matters in which all persons who hear me have a common interest, and in respect to which they need not have, necessarily, on account of different party connections, different views. If I now allude to them, it will be with a view rather to promote than to defeat the professed object of the bill. It may be thought that it would be better to reserve the discussion of them for the committee; but there are advantages in taking a general view of the details of a measure of this nature—thus permitting the mature consideration of any suggestions that may be offered. One of the points to which I will call the attention of the noble lord, is the great power which is given to the mayor under this act. The mayor is to be the returning-officer of the borough; that is, he is to be an officer of a political character, having political functions to perform; and the power you intrust to him, of singly deciding upon the validity of the votes tendered in municipal elections, is extremely great. He is to receive the lists of votes, to examine that list, to revise it, and to proclaim the result. Here is, no doubt, a great opportunity of abusing power, without any efficient check or control over it. Then, as to the council, the more precaution you take in defining its powers, the more you can separate municipal from mere political objects, the better. So far am I from wishing to see one party gain any undue influence by the measure, that I think the test of its perfection will be the separating of interests which are political from those which are strictly municipal; but you constitute the mayor the returning-officer, and give him an almost irresponsible power—you give him the power to hold a court at which objections are to be made to the votes—he is charged with determining which party have the majority; you ought to establish such a check upon him that there may be no abuse, and that you may even prevent any suspicion from attaching itself to the integrity and impartiality of the chief officer. What possible objection can there be to provide that scrutineers shall be appointed? It is clear that there ought to be some check of the kind, and that the decision upon matters of this nature ought not to rest upon the simple declaration of any one man, who, after receiving the lists, and examining them, and declaring the result, may, if he so think fit, afterwards destroy them, and preclude the possibility of detection, in cases even of wilful error. The bill makes no provision for the application of any surplus there may be of corporate property. Now, there are many boroughs which are extremely wealthy; and, after providing for the public purposes named in the bill, it is clear that there may be, in some instances, a considerable surplus. My noble friend, the member for Liverpool, states, that in that town there is one of £35,000. The bill provides, that the new corporate body shall have all the powers which the existing body has; and as those powers over the property of the corporation are very considerable, there ought to be some provision controlling the appropriation of any surplus that may remain after providing for the special objects named in the bill. It ought to be known, that in many boroughs considerable expense is about to be incurred. The bill provides, that, after the termination of existing interests, there shall be no application of corporate property to individual uses, but the existing individual interests are to be protected; and thus, even in the cases wherein there are no corporate estates, some time will elapse before there will be a fund sufficient to provide for municipal purposes. In these cases, the new governing body will have to levy a new rate, and that rate will be the only source from which the municipal charges can be defrayed in the case of those towns which are now incorporate. This rate—its connection with the poor-rate—the mode of levying it—the appeal against it, are all matters of deep interest to the societies to which this bill applies, and require much more mature consideration than I fear they are likely to receive at this period of the session. The provision of this bill, with respect to county rates, are very important. Many districts will be hereafter exempt from direct contribution to the county-rates. In all those, for instance, which are to have a separate quarter-sessions, the county-rate will have to be levied upon a new principle. A calculation is to be made of the expenses of the prosecutions arising from those boroughs, and the treasurer of the county is to certify to each borough, what portion of the county-rate it ought to pay, and to demand payment accordingly. I am afraid the borough will not consider the treasurer of the county a very impartial judge upon that head. Then there is another enactment of a similar nature, and of equal importance, in clause 97, relating to the more general expenses of the county, such as building bridges and public buildings. Here, too, the treasurer of the county is to make a calculation as to the portion of the county-rate which should fall upon the district included within a borough; and in case any difference shall arise, it shall be lawful for either party to appeal to the privy council, who shall thereupon make such order as to them shall seem expedient, and such order shall be binding upon all parties. Now, I am afraid the privy council will not be well qualified to decide in these cases. There is no apparent principle to guide them in their determination. In the case of the expenses of prosecutions, there is a principle, because the expenses can be regulated and defined; but in the case of the general expenses of the county, the degree of benefit derived by a particular district is very indefinite. There will frequently be an appeal to the privy council against the demand of the county treasurer, which appeal will, I fear, be attended with considerable expense. It will, therefore, be for those who are intrusted with the administration of the county-rates, to watch this part of the bill with great attention. In the case of some boroughs, the new corporate district may not be coterminous with the parishes of which it is partly composed. In these cases, how will the county-rate operate?—part of a parish will be within the county, and part within the borough. Is the part within the county to contribute to the county-rate upon the old, and that within the borough upon the new principle? These are minor considerations, as affecting the principle of the measure, but they are important, with the view of preventing, as far as possible, litigation and expense. I come now to a more important point. The noble lord provides, that twenty of the larger boroughs are to be divided into wards—these wards are to be determined by the privy council upon the report of certain commissioners. Surely Parliament ought to have some control over this. I agree with the noble lord (Stanley), that it would be an immense advantage, and might be the means of ensuring a much fairer representation of property, if the principle of division into wards were extended far beyond the limits proposed in the bill—and I reserve to myself the power of moving an amendment to that effect—but I take the bill as it now stands: it provides, that twenty towns shall be divided into wards, and that the privy council shall not only have the power of determining how many wards there shall be, but also the number of representatives each ward is to return. Now, that I hold to be a power too important to be exercised by any authority short of that of Parliament. In a town like Liverpool, as it will be possible for the privy council to assign twenty representatives to one ward, and two to another, they may constitute the council either a democratic or aristocratic body, at their mere will. This is a power the Crown ought not to exercise without the control of Parliament; it is a power which was denied to the Crown in the Reform Bill, even in the case of the mere territorial boundaries of boroughs, and was expressly, after discussion, reserved to Parliament. This bill provides, that twenty large towns, named in the bill, may be divided into wards, but no obligation is imposed upon the Crown as to the period at which its discretionary authority is to be exercised. The Crown is not bound to make the division before the first election for the council; and if it do not, the elections will be made, as in the case of other towns, by the voters indiscriminately. In this respect, there ought to be some alteration in the bill. It should be reserved to Parliament to determine in what cases the division into wards shall take place—what shall be the number of wards—what the number of councillors to be allotted to each ward. An indefinite power is given to the council with regard to the amount of the new borough-rate. No maximum is established; and while a power is given to the council—or rather, an obligation is imposed to separate the charge of watching from that of lighting, nothing is defined (even in cases wherein a maximum on the whole rate now exists) in respect to the amount of the separate charges. When these points shall come to be looked at practically by the different societies to which this bill applies, they will be found to affect their interests in a very material degree. The bill, in fact, attempts to include in one act one hundred private bills,—to apply uniformly the same provisions to towns very differently circumstanced; and I am satisfied that, unless there be the fullest opportunity of considering very maturely the details of the measure, the result will be disappointment and failure. Then, with respect to the operation of the bill in individual instances, there are cases in which it will confer no benefit. In the town with which I am connected, the corporate body is a self-elected one: but that body has elected its members without reference to any political feeling; it has selected its members from among parties opposed to each other in political sentiment; the people are content, and there is neither abuse nor any allegation of it. In such a case as this, I should see the application of this bill with considerable regret, for I fear it would have a tendency to introduce party feelings in the constitution of the corporation, and considerably diminish the satisfaction which is now felt. Therefore I think it will be a matter of consideration for the noble lord, whether, in all cases where the communities at large are satisfied with the existing corporations, it will not be advisable to let them remain as they are. Sir, I have now given my opinions upon this subject, the details of which will, as I have observed, require much consideration in the committee; and the little disposition which has been shown to oppose the general principle of the bill, ought to make the noble lord doubly anxious to give all parties concerned the opportunity of considering and canvassing a measure which so intimately affects their interests, and the peace and good order of the societies to which they belong.

The bill was read a second time.

AFFAIRS OF SPAIN.

JUNE 24, 1835.

The Order of the Day for the Municipal Corporations (England) Bill having been read,—

Lord Mahon rose, and after discussing the policy pursued by government with regard to Spain, concluded a most eloquent speech, by moving an humble address for “A copy of the Order in Council exempting his Majesty’s subjects who may engage in the service of Spain from the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act, and copies of all correspondence which had taken place between the Spanish Government and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs relative to the subject.”

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that nothing was more reasonable than the proposal made by the noble lord, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Lord Palmerston,) that if any observations were made on the policy of the act to which his noble friend had called the attention of the House, which required explanation, he should not be debarred by a rigorous adherence to the rules of the House from meeting those observations. He was bound, in the first place, to thank the noble lord for the frank and cordial testimony which he had borne to the manner in which the late government had generally carried into effect the obligations contracted under the Quadruple Treaty, that treaty being the diplomatic act of a former government. It was a testimony equally honourable to the noble lord himself, and to those to whom it was borne, inasmuch as it proved on the one hand, that no political difference of opinion should prevent an honourable man from doing justice to a political opponent to whom he felt it was due. And on the other, that the pledged faith of the country had been scrupulously observed by those who might have doubted the wisdom of pledging it. The testimony of the noble lord must be considered conclusive on the subject, because the noble lord had access to all the official documents, as well as to the most secret correspondence which had passed through the hands of his noble friend (the Duke of Wellington;) and with all the knowledge derived from such sources, the noble lord had not hesitated to declare, that if even the parties to it had been called on to execute that treaty, they could not have done so in a more honourable and complete manner than that in which the obligations of the treaty had been executed by his noble friend. The hon. member for Westminster seemed to think that the only act done by the British government in execution of that treaty was the exportation of 40,000 stand of arms. He apprehended, that whatever the spirit and intention of the treaty was, all that the British government was called upon to do was literally and honourably to fulfil the special engagements into which it had entered. The obligations of the British government under that treaty were, as he understood them, to afford arms to Spain, to allow the opportunity of getting Spanish vessels repaired in our harbours, and also to give to Spain, if circumstances required it, the aid of a naval force. He was sure the noble lord opposite would bear out the truth of the observation, when he stated, that though the obligation of supplying a naval force to Spain was in case of necessity imposed on England, yet the law of nations did throw great obstacles in the way of the fulfilment of that special obligation. Without a declaration of war, it was with the greatest difficulty that the special obligation of giving naval aid could be fulfilled, without placing the force of such a compact, the performance of which was guaranteed on the existence of certain circumstances, against the general binding nature of international law.

Let them take, for instance, a neutral nation requiring arms. Whatever the special obligation imposed on this country might be, it did not warrant us in checking the enterprise of our own countrymen, or preventing that neutral state from receiving a supply of arms. But we had no right, without a positive declaration of war, to stop the ships of a neutral country on the high seas. It was this difficulty of properly adhering to a determination to give just effect to the terms of the Quadruple Treaty, a difficulty which he was sure the hon. and learned gentleman, the Attorney-general, would readily admit had been equally felt by the government of Lord Melbourne, and that by which it was succeeded, and which induced the latter to confine its aid to a limited supply of arms, not from any unwillingness to fulfil the obligations under which this country was placed, but on account of those obstacles to which he had before alluded, and which were found by all administrations to be insuperable. The Queen of Spain's claims on the cordial assistance of this country are the same as those of any other ally. She had been recognised, no matter by what government—for he considered nothing of such vital importance to the character and interests of this country, as that the engagements entered into by one administration should not be disturbed by another of opposite political principles; and upon that principle he should have considered it unjustifiable on the part of the administration to which he belonged, to attempt to evade the obligations of the Quadruple Treaty (however they might have dissented from the policy by which it had been originally dictated), or to refuse to carry it into operation in a fair, honourable, and equitable manner. But still, consistently with the admission that the Queen of Spain was equally entitled as any other friendly power to the cordial assistance and good wishes of this country, he might call in question the policy of a particular act, which for the first time in the recent history of this country admitted of direct military intervention in the domestic affairs of another nation. The noble lord had stated that the permanent interests of this country would be promoted by the firm establishment of the Queen of Spain on the throne. That was a doctrine which might, he thought, be carried too far. What limit could be affixed to such a principle? What nation might not find in it a pretext for interfering in the domestic concerns of another? The general rule on which England had hitherto acted was that of non-intervention. The only exception admitted to this rule were cases where the necessity was urgent and immediate; affecting, either on account of vicinity or some special circumstances, the safety or vital interests of the state, and then interference was admitted. To interfere on the vague ground that British interests would be promoted by intervention—on the plea that it would be for our advantage to see established a particular form of government in a country circumstanced as Spain was—is to destroy altogether the general rule of non-intervention, and to place the independence of every weak power at the mercy of a formidable neighbour. It might be said, however, that he was not warranted in applying the terms "direct military interference," to the expedition which had been sanctioned by the government. How did it, in principle, differ from such an interference? It was impossible to deny that an act, which the British government permitted, authorizing British soldiers and subjects to enlist in the service of a foreign power, and allowing them to be organized in this country, was a recognition of the doctrine of the propriety of assisting by military force a foreign government in an insurrection of its own subjects. When the Foreign Enlistment Act was under consideration in that House, the particular clause which empowered the king in council to suspend its operation was objected to on this ground—that if there were no Foreign Enlistment Act, the subjects of this country might volunteer into the service of another, and there could be no particular ground of complaint against them; but that if the King in Council were permitted to issue an order suspending the law with reference to every belligerent, the government might be considered as sending a force under its own immediate control. The noble lord had stated, that the insurrection in Spain was confined to the Biscayan provinces. The noble lord had not, he thought, escaped from the dilemma in which his noble friend had shown him to be situated—namely, that if the Queen's government were established in the general affections of the people—if those who, it was said, possessed intelligence, opulence, and knowledge of political rights, and who were in favour of her government, preponderated immensely over those engaged in the insurrection, why did they not put it down without calling for the assistance of any foreign power? But if, on the other hand, it happened that the question was a disputed one—that the opinions of the people were nearly equally divided—and if the difficulty of suppressing the insurrection arose from the fact, that the pretender to the throne had support nearly as powerful as its possessor—we had, in that case, embarked in a contest, the issue of which could not now be foreseen, and the settlement of which by our arms, if the precedent of such intervention were once established, must lead to eternal turmoil and warfare. To succeed by our arms, too, would be a perpetual source of weakness to the Queen's government. The Queen had an army of 54,000 men. How came it, again he asked, that with this preponderating force, with all the intelligence and wealth of the commercial towns ranged, as was said, on the Queen's side, that the insurrection was not yet put down? And where was the security that that government, which could not suppress an insurrection without foreign aid, would maintain itself by its own native vigour? The noble lord, however, had stated, that the spirit of the treaty justified the expedition. The spirit of the treaty never contemplated, in his opinion, military intervention by any of the parties to it; on the contrary, it rather excluded military intervention. But he would say no more on the foreign policy of the act, and would only further make a few observations with reference to the bearing of the Order in Council on the domestic concerns of this country. He held that, with respect to them, it would be a most dangerous precedent. First, there was no restriction, as far as it appeared, with regard to the number of men to be enrolled. He would ask the noble lord (the Secretary of State for the Home Department) if any limits had been assigned since the Order in Council to the number of men to be enrolled? Had he made any private arrangements on the subject? Had he been authorized to do so? He did not take the particular case, he was arguing on the principle; and he asked if there was any thing to prevent the enrolment of 5,000 men, and their retention in this country for an indefinite period previous to their embarkation? Thus they would be British subjects in the service, say, of the Queen of Spain, bound together by new associations, and at least, while abroad, acknowledging immediate allegiance to another sovereign. He wished to ask, under what system of discipline they were to be? He perceived the force was styled, the British Auxiliary Force, and one of the regulations stated, that the men during their stay in Spain would be subject to the British military law. He could not exactly understand that. The regulation assumed that it would be possible to apply the military code of this country to troops in Spain. He asked the Attorney-general and the noble lord (Russell), could they be so subjected to it? Would any voluntary arrangement of submission on the part of the soldiers be binding? He apprehended not. Their refusal to obey would be sufficient. Any punishment inflicted on them would be illegal. Therefore he thought it would be impossible to apply our military code in another country. Whatever might be their numbers, whether 5,000 or 10,000; whatever might be the service in which they were engaged, he looked upon the principle of permitting the enrolment and discipline of troops here for a foreign state, as pregnant with great dangers. These men were to go to Spain, to engage in warfare, and contract its habits. The House had a right to be satisfied touching the discipline under which they would be placed. They had a right to know whether men who might shortly be returned to their native country, were under the same control with the private soldier here, who looked to the state for his reward on the termination of his service. In conclusion, he would say, both with reference to our foreign and domestic relations, he doubted the policy of the present proceeding. He viewed the principle, the precedent, and the power of perverting it, with serious alarm.

The motion was agreed to.

LORD HAYTESBURY'S APPOINTMENT.

JUNE 29, 1835.

Mr. Winthrop Prael moved for copies of any communications which have passed between the Board of Commissioners for the Affairs of India, and the Court of Directors of the East India Company, on the subject of the revocation of the appointment of Lord Heytesbury as Governor-general of India.

SIR ROBERT PEELE said, that he observed the noble lord opposite watching anxiously for the opportunity of going into the committee on the corporation bill, and therefore he would detain the House but for a very short time whilst he made a few observations upon the question before the House, and he promised that he would compress what he had to say within the smallest possible compass. He had listened to the speech of the right hon. baronet, the President of the Board of Control, with considerable attention, and he must be allowed to make a distinction between the tone and manner of that speech and its object. For the tone and manner of his speech he gave the right hon. baronet credit; the fair manner in which he stated the case, and the generosity with which he bore testimony to the merit, where he could do so, of his predecessor in office, though opposed to him in politics, and his abstinence from reflections on the personal character of Lord Heytesbury, were highly honourable to him. The right hon. baronet relied upon one single point, namely, that he had not confidence in Lord Heytesbury, on account mainly of their difference of opinion on political topics. The right hon. baronet, however, had not convinced him that the exercise of the King's prerogative, which he had advised, was justifiable. The right hon. baronet said, that he had not confidence in Lord Heytesbury, and that, therefore, he refused to sanction his appointment; and he added, that he would not let Lord Ellenborough nominate his governor-general. If the right hon. baronet's argument were well founded, it went to this length, that he must carry into the government of India the colours and shades of our political differences; and the example derived from the fountain head, and applied to the chief officer of the government, could not fail to introduce into India, for the first time, party dissensions and factions, and thereby to weaken the control we had over the dominion of those vast territories. The right hon. baronet said, that if Lord Heytesbury had proceeded to India he would not have recalled him. Why not? If a want of confidence in Lord Heytesbury, grounded on a difference of political opinion, justified the revocation of the noble lord's appointment, would it not also justify his removal from the government of India, supposing he had assumed it? If it were necessary that the Governor-general of India should be a person in whom the government placed confidence—founded on an identity of political opinion—then he contended that the mere circumstance of the Governor-general being in India, or having set sail, made no difference whatever as to the application of the principle. If the principle was to be laid down as one on which a government ought to act, he (Sir Robert Peel) ought to have recalled Sir R. Grant and Mr. Macaulay. He was just as much responsible for the exercise of their functions as the present government would have been for the conduct of Lord Heytesbury. The only difference between the cases of a Governor-general recalled, and one deprived of his appointment before setting sail was, that in the former a greater amount of individual hardship would be sustained. The right hon. baronet said, that he would ally himself with those with whom he agreed in political sentiment, and did him (Sir Robert Peel) the honour to appeal to his authority upon that point. He agreed with the right hon. baronet. He recognised the principle that the confidential offices in this country, connected with the executive government, ought to be filled by persons whose political sentiments were congenial with those of the government. He did not, however, act upon the principle which the right hon. baronet had applied to Lord Heytesbury, for he retained in office gentlemen whom his predecessors had appointed to situations not connected with the executive department of the state. The principle which he recognised did not apply to India—that was a neutral territory, into which politics ought not to be allowed to enter. Conceding the principle with respect to confidential offices in this country—agreeing with the right hon. baronet, that that government deserved no respect which tried to conciliate favour by retaining in office persons in whom they had not confidence, he was prepared to contend that principle was not applicable to the case under consideration. Neither the history of the act of parliament, which limited the prerogative of the Crown, nor the practice under the act, nor the policy pursued in India, nor the admissions of the right hon. baronet himself, justified the proceedings which had taken place with respect to Lord Heytesbury. The confidence which the government ought to have in a person filling the office of Governor-general should be founded, not on identity of political opinion, but on his general integrity, which would ensure the fulfilment of the instructions he might receive. The act of 1784 was intended solely to reserve to the Crown the power of removing the Governor-general in case of delinquency; not to ensure the appointment of a partisan. What had been the course of practice under the act? The right hon. baronet had quoted only one case—namely, that of Sir George Barlowe, in which the power of removal had been exercised without imputed delinquency; but the circumstances of that case were totally different from those of Lord Heytesbury's. The examples in the opposite direction were numerous. Lord Minto was appointed by the Whig government, and sailed in March. Mr. Percival came into power in April, and could, by sending a fast-sailing vessel after his lordship, have recalled him, but he did nothing of the kind. The case of Lord William Bentinck was still stronger. His lordship was appointed by one government, and retained in his appointment under two successive changes of administration, and did not sail until a month after the Duke of Wellington's government was formed. That case, therefore, supplied a second instance in favour of his argument: for there the principle for which he contended was again ratified and confirmed. Provided the government have confidence in the general integrity and experience in public life of the individual appointed, they do not contract any personal responsibility by continuing him in office. The right hon. gentleman seemed to consider he put a conclusive question, when he asked, "Would I have appointed Lord Heytesbury?" Certainly, he must presume, not; but then he might put another question, and ask, "Would he have appointed Sir Robert Grant or Mr. Macaulay?" No. If he had more confidence, then, in some other person, why should he not have recalled Sir Robert Grant, and sent out some person in whom he had confidence? He did not think it possible for the right hon. gentleman to give this argument a valid answer: and if he could not, had he not a right to assert, upon the authority of the case of Sir George Barlowe, that in the instance of Lord Heytesbury's appointment, the prerogative of the Crown had not been exercised in accordance with precedent. He would say one word upon an important point—namely, the bearing which the proceeding would have upon Indian affairs. It was impossible to put out of consideration the peculiar circumstances under which our dominion in India was exercised. After all, it was impossible to deny that our dominion was not recommended to the natives of India by any participation, on their parts, in our political feelings, or admiration of our civil institutions—it rested mainly on a general confidence in our justice, and a conviction of our power. We had been able to retain our dominion over 80,000,000 of natives, by proving to them that there existed amongst the foreigners who governed them a complete unity of purpose. To introduce party divisions among the foreigners in India, to prove to the natives that they are separated by the same animosities which separated us here, would do more to undermine our authority in India than any thing which he could imagine. By the recent measure the number of British settlers in America had been multiplied: and although the government of that country might have acquired some accession of physical strength by that means, it would be as nothing compared to the results likely to ensue from the introduction of the seeds of party dissension, and that general misery which party spirit is sure, sooner or later, to give birth to. He complained that the King's government had refused to concur in the appointment of Lord Heytesbury: and he did so, because ever since the King's assent was required for the confirmation of this appointment, the government of the country had always acted on the principle to which he had alluded. This appointment, it should not be forgotten, was made by the Court of Directors, under the sanction of the Sovereign; and it would go far to weaken the royal authority in India, if an appointment which had been formerly made by the Directors, were to be set aside at the will and pleasure of the executive government. The intention of the legislature was, that the King's consent having been given to the appointment made by the Court of Directors, the means should be reserved of removing the individual for any dereliction of duty: but the appointment was to be held as good, until valid and sufficient reason to the contrary should be shown. The course of proceeding complained of by his hon. friend, had a direct tendency to undermine the English authority in India. The legislature had stripped the company of their charter as merchants;—"but," it is said, "we will still respect them as a political body." Could any thing be better calculated to sap and destroy the remains of the company's authority, than to say to the people of India, "Although the company had appointed a Governor-general, so little respect have we for the company, that as soon as a change takes place in the government at home, we change the governor who may have been thus appointed by the company?" Why was the East India Company reserved in their present form as an intermediate body between the original legislation of the old Indian government, and the direct intervention of the government at home? He apprehended that, in the first place, the force of prescription operated; that it was felt to be inexpedient to discontinue that power of administration which the company had theretofore exercised, wisely and well. This was one reason, and, if it was a good one, it was certainly the only way by which the respect of the legislature for the company could be shown. Another reason was, that the legislature was afraid to intrust the executive government at home with the vast patronage of India, and it desired to have that patronage exercised by a body independent of the government. Yet, the first act of government was to revoke this resolution, and take away the appointment from those in whom the legislature had vested it. The right hon. member for Kirkcubright said, that this was done in order to enable ministers to send out a friend of their own in whom they had confidence.

Mr. C. Fergusson said, that what he had stated was, that it was necessary some person should be appointed in whom the government had confidence, in order that he might carry the new system into effect.

Sir Robert Peel said, that amounted to just what he was stating. The government argued thus:—"Our predecessors appointed a person in whom they had confidence, and we will appoint one in whom we have confidence." He had already argued the principle, and therefore he would only say, that such a proceeding was a direct supersession of the power reserved to the Court of Directors by the act of parliament. In conclusion, he thought the cancelling of the appointment of Lord Heytesbury would tend to diminish the respect in which the Court of Directors had hitherto been held, and to weaken our power in India by introducing party feelings, the absence of which hitherto had been the main cause of our strength. He thought that the right hon. baronet had failed to make out a valid defence for the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown; and, as he had admitted that no public inconvenience would arise from the production of the papers, he would probably not oppose the motion.

Lord John Russell having replied, the motion was negatived by 254 to 179; majority against the motion, 75.

CORPORATION REFORM—COMMITTEE.

JUNE 30, 1835.

Lord John Russell having moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee on this Bill,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL remarked, that there was an impression entertained, either real or feigned—not so much, he believed, in that House as out of it—that there existed on the part of himself, and those with whom he acted, a desire to throw some obstruction in the way of the noble lord's proceedings, with reference to the bill which the House was now about to consider. He begged to say, for himself, that he did not entertain any such feeling; that, on the contrary, he was most anxious to give every aid in his power to the noble lord, on every occasion. He wished, indeed, that some arrangement could be adopted, by which a steady perseverance with the bill might be insured. The plan of devoting an hour and a half one night, and two hours another night, was not one which admitted of their paying proper attention to the measure; and it insured the certain result of a succession of amendments being brought forward on the report, which ought to have been made in the committee. He knew well the inconvenience attending upon morning sittings, on account of the numerous committees which were then engaged, and he did not, therefore, propose them; but if any arrangement could be made for going into committee on this bill regularly, on certain days, and at certain hours, so far from having any objection to it, he should be happy to see it adopted, and he was sure it would be most acceptable to all with whom he acted.

The House then went into committee, and several clauses were agreed to.

On clause 20, being read—

Sir Robert Peel rose to propose an amendment which related to the qualification of those who were to be elected members of the town council; and, to simplify his statement on the subject, he would divide it into two heads—first, as to whether there ought to be a qualification or not for the members of the town council; and next, if there should be, what ought to be the nature of the qualification. He was aware that there were various opinions on the subject. Some persons thought that there ought to be no qualification whatever, but that the electors should be at liberty to elect whom they pleased, without any reference to property; while others were of opinion, that a certain qualification as to property was indispensable. He would not enter into any detail as to either of those opinions; for he had always found that, where disputed points of this kind were discussed, which turned more on theoretical principles than on facts, the discussion generally ended by leaving each party in the same opinion which he entertained when it began. He would, therefore, confine his remarks to what had been the usual practice in local enactments for many of our towns. He was quite aware that, according to ancient practice, no pecuniary qualifications were required for members of corporations; but the usual words of the charters were, that they should elect “fit, discreet, and respectable” persons to fill the corporate offices. No peculiar qualification was named beyond those general terms; but the spirit of the charters was, that persons fit for their respective offices should be appointed, and he apprehended that, even in those self-elected corporations, whatever might be their defects in other respects, care was taken to elect persons of wealth and respectability. Many towns were regulated in their local arrangements of police, watching, lighting, and so on, by acts of parliament, obtained generally with the consent of the whole body, or with that of the great majority of the rate-paying inhabitants; in some of these the officers of the corporations were included as guardians or trustees; in others they were not. These acts, he repeated, were in general sought for with the good-will of the majority of the rate-payers, and were discussed before committees of that and the other House; but in almost every case it was found that a small body was appointed for controlling the watching, lighting, or other local arrangements. Sometimes this body was elected by the rate-payers generally, and sometimes by those who possessed certain defined qualifications, but, in all cases, there was a fixed qualification named for those who were to be members of the governing body. In Manchester, it was necessary that the members of the governing body should each be the occupier of a house rated at £28 a-year, or the owner of a tenement of the value of £150. In the same town the electors of the governing body were required, as a qualification, to occupy a house rated at £16 a-year, or, if a publican, he must be rated at £32 a-year. In Salford, a similar principle was adopted, and he recollected well the hon. member for Salford calling their attention to the course of modern improvements in that town, and to the excellent system of local government; and yet, in Salford, a qualification was necessary on the part of each member of the governing body. The act which required the qualification was passed for the good of the whole town, and by the testimony of the hon. member himself, than whom no one was better qualified to judge of the management of the local interests, the act had effected its object, and given rise to not the slightest dissatisfaction. All these regulations, let it be borne in mind, were found in recent local acts, which were called for by the general voice, and which gave general satisfaction. In Birmingham, the qualification for the members of the governing body was, being rated at £15 a-year; or being possessed of £1,000 in real or personal property. In Sheffield, the qualification was being rated at £20, or possessing property to the value of £1,000. In Sunderland, it was being rated at £20 a-year, or having £30 yearly income. In Devonport, it was being rated at £20. In Wolverhampton, it was being rated at £20 a-year, or possessing £1,000 personal property. In Bilston, the qualification was £40 a-year in land, or being the son of a man worth £100 a-year, or possessing £1000 in personal property. In Bolton, it was £100 in real or personal property. In Brighton, it was £100 a-year in house or land, and in Oldham, £100 in land. In Stoke-upon-Trent, the qualification for the governing body was £100 in land. He was taking, as illustrations of his arguments, those towns which were most popular, or which were considered to represent popular opinion.

Mr. Brotherton said, that, in Manchester and Salford, some individuals were commissioners under local acts for watching, lighting, &c., in virtue of their property, without being elected.

Sir Robert Peel said, that he spoke only of those who were required to be elected. In Stroud the qualification of a commissioner, under the local act, was £100 a-year in land, or being the son of a person having £150 a-year, or having £3,000 in real or personal property. He would not say, that this was the lowest scale to which a qualification should be reduced, but he had observed, that in places where the qualification was highest, there popular opinion prevailed most, and, as an instance, he might mention the borough of Stroud, which had returned the noble lord as its representative. He had mentioned these cases to show that, where powers were given, such as those of commissioners for watching, paving, and lighting, care was taken, in almost every instance, that the parties exercising those powers should have a certain qualification as to property. In asking the committee to adhere to this course, he sought to introduce no new principle. They were going to make a new governing body in corporations, and all he asked was, that they should not do away with the qualification which was usually required of every member of such body. But they were going to do more than confer the mere patronage of watching, and paving, and lighting. Some of the corporations under this bill, would have considerable patronage in other respects. The town council were to be, in some cases, commissioners of charities, and these were reasons why they should have some qualification as to property. The bill would give greater powers to magistrates in some corporations, and, he would ask, was it right that they should have less qualifications than were now given to those who had much smaller powers to exercise? Another reason for the necessity of a qualification was, that a party was liable to a fine for refusing to serve as a member of the governing body. A blank was at present left in the bill for the amount of the fine, so that he could not say what its amount was intended to be; but if a man were to be fined for refusing to accept an office, he ought to be selected from that class which could pay the fine, otherwise it would be gross injustice. But what fine could be imposed on a man who derived no qualification from property? He would not say, that the possession of property necessarily implied respectability, but it was, at least, some guarantee, in the party appointed to office, for his conduct in the discharge of its duties. It was required of a magistrate that he should have at least £100 a-year in the county in which he exercised his functions, but the Mayor of any of the corporations under this bill, would be a magistrate of the county in which it was situated. Would it not, in that case, be necessary that he should have some qualification? Was it not consistent with the principle laid down on the opposite side, that there should be no qualification for the mayor of a borough, who, being the returning-officer for that borough, was liable to a fine of £500 for any neglect of his duty as such returning officer. Surely, it was absurd to say, that a man who might be so fined for neglect of duty, might have no qualification as to property. Let him add, that a man was by this bill disqualified by bankruptcy or insolvency, yet both might be consistent with strict integrity; but if property was not to be a qualification, why should bankruptcy or insolvency disqualify? When he spoke of property as a qualification, he felt that it would not be proper to attach a very high qualification to the members of the governing body. In this respect, he thought there ought to be some distinction between towns. The bill related to towns, some of which were extensive and prosperous, and others were small and comparatively poor. Now it would not be fair to have the same test of qualification in these two classes of towns. He had looked to the cases of most of the towns, and he had adopted a lower qualification than that which was usually adopted; and in making it, he had distinguished between the two classes of towns recognised by the bill—he meant those which were divided into wards, and those which were not so divided; and, as he had mentioned wards, he hoped that the principle of dividing towns into wards would be more general than it was at present in this bill. He thought that that principle ought to be extended much beyond what it was at present. He trusted also that the committee would go with him in thinking that it would be right not to adopt a single qualification for all towns, but they would consent to distinguish between the greater and the smaller towns. In the Birmingham bill, the qualification for the governing body was £1,000 real or personal property. He thought he could suggest a better mode of fixing the qualification. It would, in his opinion, be better to make it consist of joint qualifications; for many tradesmen might find it difficult to swear that they had realized £1,000. He would therefore propose, that in towns which were divided into wards, the qualification for the members of the governing body should be, that they were possessed of an estate, real or personal, of the clear value of £1,000, or that they should be rated to the relief of the poor on a sum of not less than £40 a-year. In towns not divided into wards, the qualification should be, that the town-councillor should be possessed of at least £500 in real or personal estate, or be rated to the poor-rate on a sum of not less than £20 a-year. Those who thought with him that there ought to be a qualification, might differ as to the amount which he had mentioned, but he could not think that he had stated it too low. There were various tests in several local acts, and he had taken the lowest. What he had stated was lower on the average than the majority of the cases in which local acts had been passed. The right hon. baronet concluded by moving as an amendment, that after the word "council" in the clause, the following words should be added:—"Provided such members of council who shall be elected in boroughs divided into wards shall, at the time of their election, be seised or possessed of real or personal property of the clear value of £1,000, or that they shall be rated on a rental of not less than £40 a-year; and also provided that all such members elected in towns not divided into wards shall, at the time of their election, be seised or possessed of property, real or personal, of the clear value of £500, or be rated to the relief of the poor on a rental of not less than £20 a-year."

In reply to Lord John Russell—

Sir Robert Peel said, that the noble lord had reproached—no, he would not say reproached—but animadverted upon him for not having rested his case on some general train of reasoning; but had he not adduced a stream of concurring evidence to show, that what he proposed would most conduce to the good government of the places to which this bill was intended to apply? He had thought it better to refrain from adducing any authority except such as was founded upon general reasoning; but if the House wished for other precedents, then he would refer them to one of great authority—he would refer them to a bill brought in by the noble lord himself—and when he heard the noble lord pronouncing censure upon those who were unwilling to place implicit confidence in the electoral body—when he heard him talk about good government on the part of the governing body, because, forsooth, the electoral body would only choose those in whom they could confide, he stared at the restrictions which he found on looking into the act which the noble lord had supported through that House, "for the better regulation of the affairs of the parishes of St. Giles's-in-the-Fields, and St. George's, Bloomsbury." Here there was an excellent opportunity for the noble lord to act upon his own principle; but had he done so? The noble lord had now disclaimed all restrictions as unnecessary and uncalled for, on the ground that the governing body would be always controlled by the good sense of the electoral body; but was this the principle upon which the noble lord's own act was founded? The House would see. The act to which he referred, provided that one-half of those who should be eligible to vote for the election of vestrymen, churchwardens, and other parochial officers in the parishes of St. Giles's-in-the-Fields, and St. George's, Bloomsbury, or who, in execution of that act, should, from time to time, be elected under it, should be resident householders in the parish, and rated to the relief of the poor in an annual assessment of the value of not less than—what did the House think? why, than £75 per annum. The noble lord attached another qualification to the other half; but although four divisions took place respecting the qualification of the electoral body, not one division occurred with reference to the governing body. By the same act no rate-payer was entitled to vote unless rated to the amount of £30 a-year. An hon. gentleman proposed that the rating of voters should be £15, but the noble lord opposed and divided against the proposition, which was lost. The noble lord said on that occasion, that though he thought £30 too high a qualification, he considered £15 too low. Not a doubt was entertained as to the propriety of the qualification of the governing body, but there were four divisions on the subject of the elective body. Thus it appeared, that when this act was passed, the noble lord, who now reposed the utmost confidence in the discrimination of the elective body, had great doubts as to the electors choosing the persons best qualified for the due administration of their affairs.

The Committee divided on the amendment; Ayes, 204; Noes, 267; majority 63. Several other clauses were agreed to, and the House resumed.

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

JULY 1, 1835.

Lord John Russell moved, as an amendment to the motion of the Lord Advocate for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the Church of Scotland, "That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, praying that his Majesty will be graciously pleased to appoint a commission to inquire into the opportunities of religious worship, and means of religious instruction, and the pastoral superintendence afforded to the people of Scotland, and how far these are of avail for the religious and moral improvement of the poor and of the working classes; and with this view, to obtain information respecting their stated attendance at places of worship, and their actual connection with any religious denomination; to inquire what funds are now, or may hereafter be, available for the purpose of the Established Church of Scotland; and to report from time to time, in order that such remedies may be applied to any existing evils as parliament may think fit."

SIR ROBERT PEEL: If the motion of my right hon. friend had been brought before the House at an earlier period of the session, considering his high authority, I should have had no difficulty whatever in expressing my preference of it to the amendment which has been moved. But I cannot omit from my consideration the time in which we have to decide upon it. On the 1st of July it is that we are called upon to go into an inquiry, and at this late period I feel that it is impossible to come to any conclusion which will lead to a vote of the public money. Two months ago I should not have hesitated to prefer the original motion, but at this advanced period I cannot but think that the inquiry by commission will be more satisfactory than the appointment of a committee for the same purpose. I am afraid that the appointment of a committee would lead to a double inquiry, that, at the termination of their labours, the committee would find it expedient to recommend that a commission of inquiry should be instituted. In short, the result would be the same as that of the corporation committee. After spending much time in fruitless investigation, the committee would find themselves unable to come to any satisfactory conclusion—a committee of local investigation would, from its expense, be out of the question—and the only course left would be to appoint that commission of inquiry, which, if it is to be ultimately recommended, had better be appointed at once. I find it impossible to throw the present time out of consideration, and, therefore, I am inclined to prefer the full investigation of the matter by a commission to its consideration by a committee. There is a slight difference in opinion—slight in terms, but important in principle—between the noble lord and myself. Last night I took the liberty of referring to that passage in the address which was carried nemine contradicente. His Majesty, in his address to the two Houses, called their attention to the two Church Establishments in the two parts of the United Kingdom, England and Scotland; and informed them that he had already appointed a commission for the purpose of enquiring into the condition of the Established Church in this country. In the answer which the House returned to that portion of the speech, we expressed our acknowledgments to his Majesty for informing us that the special object of the appointment of the commission was, to extend more widely the means of religious instruction, according to the doctrines of the Established Church, and to confirm its hold upon the affections of the people. We then assured his Majesty that we should take into consideration the condition of the Church of Scotland, and the means of religious worship which were afforded to the poorer classes in that part of the United Kingdom. All that I propose is, that the House of Commons should confirm and realize the assurance which they gave at a time not remarkable for the good agreement of the members, but at a time when party spirit ran high, and when other parts of that address were amended, in opposition to the government. Notwithstanding the then bitterness of party spirit, the House of Commons unanimously assured the Crown that they would take into consideration the condition of the Scotch Church Establishment. Now, I do not hesitate to say, that though I am not a member of the Church of Scotland, yet I look at it as an Establishment in the same point of view as I look at that of which I am a member. There is, I apprehend, no one point which we are bound to uphold in the case of the Church Establishment in this country, that we are not equally bound to uphold in the case of the Church Establishment of Scotland. This opinion I give not on dry and technical grounds—but I do state that the obligation which I feel as a subject of the King, is confirmed by my respect and attachment to that church, arising from the opportunities I have had of witnessing the virtues and services of her ministers, and their effect in improving the moral and social condition of the people. All that I ask is, that we should place the Church of Scotland, in our inquiries into its condition, in the same situation in which we have placed the Church of England, and that we should recognise its claims as an Establishment precisely to the same extent. To recognise the equal claims which the Church of Scotland has, will, I apprehend, give universal satisfaction to its members, and to all those who regard it in the light in which I regard it. The noble lord opposite has moved, that an humble address be presented to his Majesty, praying that his Majesty may be graciously pleased to appoint a commission to inquire into the opportunities of religious worship, and the means of religious instruction and pastoral superintendence afforded to the people of Scotland, &c. All that I propose is, to insert after “pastoral superintendence,” the words, “by the Church of Scotland.” If I am asked, Whether I would exclude other inquiries, I must say, Most certainly not. I do not, indeed, think that the object of the commission could be completed if we excluded other inquiries—as, for instance, into the moral and social condition of the working classes, their actual attendance at divine worship, and their connection with any religious sect. After the commission appointed by the Crown to inquire into the means of religious worship according to the doctrines of the Established Church in England, and after the assurance of the House of Commons, that the condition of the Church of Scotland shall be investigated, I do contend, however unimportant the point may be as to the inquiry, though it certainly is not in principle, that we should put the Church of Scotland on precisely the same footing as the Church of England, to which it has just claims according to law, and according to the constitution. And this we may do without at all prejudicing the inquiry into the means of religious instruction afforded by other religious denominations. This, be it observed, is a delicate point, and I hope the noble lord will consult, not the possibility of objection, but the importance of my suggestion, and accordingly will consent to the introduction of words recognising the principle of the Established Church in Scotland, as equal to the Establishment in England. That is the whole of my suggestion. But the discussion of the main question I shall not enter upon, as I wish no hostility to be provoked between the Established Church and those who have seceded from it. What I feel is this, that there is between the Dissenters and the Established Church an enormous neutral ground of infidelity, which, by an union of exertion and perseverance, it is possible to reclaim. Of the Dissenters I should be far from speaking with disrespect. Their voluntary exertions in support of religion I honour; and therefore, while I support the principle of an ecclesiastical Establishment, and the extension of its means of affording religious instruction, I should never grudge the applause to which the labours of those who have seceded from it are entitled. The Established Church and the Dissenters are, I say, equally interested in reclaiming from infidelity the thousands and tens of thousands who have never heard the name of their God—and for whose benefit it is proposed to extend the means of moral and religious instruction in Scotland. The only remaining point to which I shall allude, is the expediency of his Majesty’s government considering the policy of making any alteration in the law rather than devolving that duty upon a commission. Shall we authorize the commission to inquire what funds are, or may be, available for the establishment of the Church of Scotland, and whether any funds are available without an alteration of the law, or shall we not rather reserve to ourselves that question? To the commissioners ascertaining any important fact I have no objection; but certainly I think that the policy of altering the law ought to be ascertained by his Majesty's government and the House of Commons. I doubt the expediency of transferring the power of considering such a point to the commission, and withdrawing from the government its proper responsibility. What may be the effect of this vague and indefinite direction? May you not cause those who are prejudiced against religious inquiries to entertain apprehensions which, however groundless, are not the less forcible with those who have not immediate access to the best sources of information. Besides, I would suggest that those who are well qualified for making religious inquiries, are not always equally qualified for carrying on political investigations. I trust that the noble lord will agree to my suggestion, and, if so, I hope that the discussion will be left in that state which is least likely to induce any irritated feeling or promote any asperity, which in a question involving religious interests it is so desirable to avoid.

After a short discussion the original motion was negatived, and the Address moved by Lord John carried.

CORPORATION REFORM.

JULY 2, 1835.

The House having gone into Committee on this bill,—

On Clause 42 being proposed, relating to Town Clerks and other Officers of the borough, Lord Stanley proposed an amendment, to the effect that the Town Clerks hereafter to be appointed, should have a tenure of office during good behaviour.

SIR ROBERT PEEL did not consider the arguments of the noble lord (Howick,) who had just addressed the House, perfectly conclusive in favour of retaining the clause as it stood. The noble lord, for instance, in the first place, stated that one of the grounds on which the town clerk would, under the proposed bill, be sure to be continued in office, was the difficulty of getting rid of him. Was there, then, to be such a want of fixedness of purpose among the new bodies—were they to be so completely subject to unjust influence, as that an officer appointed under them had no other security for the tenure of his office than their inability to go on without him. The noble lord had argued almost entirely for the vices of the present system. Every deduction which could be derived from the working of the existing corporate bodies, the noble lord enlisted into his service. Now, he thought these bodies would be subjected so completely to the influence of popular opinion, and that the duties of their officers, and amongst others, their town clerk, would be so clearly defined, as that it would be almost impossible they should do wrong, and consequently be subjected to the loss of office, except by wilful and gross misconduct. The noble lord appeared to be labouring under some mistake as to the practical effect of this measure, or he took a very despairing view of it, and seemed to entertain much less confidence in the exercise of public opinion than could have been expected. The noble lord had stated that a canvass was already going forward for the office of town clerk. Certainly these canvassers must be gifted with the keenest scent of office of any men who ever existed; for, be it recollected, it was the council who had the power of nominating to the office of town clerk, and the solicitation must be directed to a council not yet in existence, which was to be chosen by burghesses not yet made. The reasons which induced the House to give the coroner his tenure of office during good behaviour, applied to the town clerk, for the duties of both were analogous. For his part, he thought all legal appointments should be permanent, and he regretted that it was not customary to continue in office the Attorney-general on a change of administration. He ought to be a man who, from long experience, was well acquainted with the duties of his office, and was active in the performance of them. There was no reason why the Attorney-general should be a political officer more than a judge.

The Attorney-general: Nothing should induce me to hold office under men from whom I differ in politics.

Sir Robert Peel resumed. He was only speaking of an attorney-general in the abstract, he was making no particular allusion to the hon. and learned gentleman. Crambo had found it impossible to form an abstract idea of a lord mayor without imagining some particular individual clothed in the robes of office—gold chain, furred gown, and the other exterior manifestations of the civic dignity. But he merely spoke of an attorney-general in the abstract, and regretted that that hon. and learned gentleman sitting opposite to him had, by his impatient political virtue, tended to disturb his abstract idea of an attorney-general. He had, however, known instances in which attorneys-general had remained in office when a change in the administration had taken place. [The Attorney-general: I would not do so.] The chivalrous declaration of the hon. and learned gentleman was favourable to his view; for it went to prove that, if the office of town-clerk were made a political one, he would be deprived of his office every time a change took place in the dominant party in the council. Would not this be the language held in the different boroughs by those from whom the town-clerk might differ in politics:—"True, he discharges his duties exceedingly well; we have no fault to find with him on that head; but then there are dozens of our own active partisans here, of known adherence to our political opinions, and one of whom, we are, therefore, bound to appoint to his office." Such was the principle which had been declared by the hon. member for Nottingham, when he stated that he could not permit Lord Ellenborough's nominee to remain in office, and recommended his Majesty to remove Lord Heytesbury, and was such a principle to be acted on in every borough in the kingdom? Then again, according to the principle of the hon. and learned gentleman, not only will political opinions influence the elections of legal officers, but if the town-clerk, for example, entertained certain views in politics which differed, or which he thought differed, from the opinions which prevailed in the council, he would be bound, according to the praiseworthy declaration of the hon. and learned gentleman, immediately on ascertaining the fact, to tender his resignation. He only put this case hypothetically; and he trusted that the town-clerk, when once appointed, might rely on his personal integrity and character as a security for the permanent tenure of his office, and might feel convinced, that when he lost that security he could no longer retain office against the good sense and feeling of his fellow-citizens. It certainly appeared to him to be of great importance, that as the council was a fluctuating body, and as two-thirds of them retired annually, that such an officer as the town-clerk should hold office during the continuance of his good conduct, and that the services of an officer of the council should be thus secured; a man who could answer those inquiries which would be likely to be made by a new council, who was acquainted with all the points of law referring to them as a body, who was in possession of all their records, and who had a personal interest in promoting the welfare of the borough. He thought that, on the principle that the Speaker of that House was appointed during the existence of the parliament, without its being necessary to hold over him the constant control of annual rejection, it would conduce to the respectability of the office of town-clerk, and of the man who filled it, if the tenure of office were permanent, and dependent only on good behaviour.

The amendment was negatived by 125 to 65; majority, 60.

JULY 3, 1835,

Clause 56, respecting Charities, being proposed—Mr. Hughes Hughes moved, "That there be added to the number of charitable trustees for every borough, the Recorder for the time being (if any) of such borough, and all Justices of the Peace acting in and for the same."

SIR ROBERT PEEL thought no one could for a moment contest the truth and importance of the observation made by the hon. member for Southwark, that they should all, on such a question as the present, whatever might be their divergence of political opinion, endeavour to consider this question on its own merits without any party bias, and solely with the view of making the clause as satisfactory in its operation as possible. With that object in view, and there being no difference of principle between them, they had first to secure the application of those charities as nearly as possible to the original intentions of their foundation, and in the next place to prevent the abuse of them for any parliamentary or electioneering purposes. The only question was, by what mode those objects could be most efficiently carried into practical effect. He agreed with the hon. member for Southwark, that wealth, property, and station in society were not necessary guarantees of the due performance of a charitable trust. The truth was, that persons were apt to undertake the duty of trustees without at all considering the obligations which that imposed on them; and in proportion to the high station which they occupied in society, having more important matters to engross their time, it was not likely that they would give all that detailed and continuous attention to the trust which, perhaps, its interest and importance demanded. But while he agreed with the hon. member so far, he must be allowed to go a step still further. He confessed he did not think, on the other hand, that any system of popular election or control would of itself supply a sufficient guarantee that the charity trusts would in all instances be properly discharged. He did not by any means wish to undervalue the usefulness of that principle. He believed that popular control would induce the council to administer properly the borough funds, to enforce a system of economical expenditure, and adopt proper measures with respect to paving, lighting, and other local matters in which the interests of the borough might be internally concerned. But with respect to charities, he did not think that popular control would be a sufficient check to the abuses which were complained of under the present system. Party feeling would no doubt enter into the constitution of the council, and where there were advantages to be distributed, and good things to be given away, they had a right to presume the possibility of abuse, and adopt the best means of preventing it. The whole of this country was divided in political feeling, and those differences of opinion and prejudices existed to as great, if not to a much greater, extent in small boroughs as compared with large towns. Indeed, he very much doubted whether the severest contest might not, in the history of elections, be traced to local partialities for particular families rather than to any broad and distinctive differences of opinion on great political questions. The predominant party must, according to all analogies of the constitution, be presumed to be a body capable of committing an abuse, and therefore they ought to take some security that the perversions which had occurred under the old system should not be perpetuated under the new. Their first object should be to provide for the due fulfilment of the original trust, and then to take care that no perversion took place. He greatly regretted that the House was called upon at present to make any arrangement on this subject; for he was most anxious that the fulfilment of these trusts as originally intended, should be secured, and the perversion of them to any but the specified or proper purposes be prevented. He was afraid, however, that if they were under the complete control of the corporate bodies, the application of these funds would be guided by the political opinions and party and private prejudices which must inevitably prevail in such bodies as those contemplated. The hon. gentleman, the member for Southwark, proposed, and the noble lord appeared to assent to his proposition, that there should be instituted some central and general commission, which might exercise a superintending authority over all those charities. He did not deny that in some cases a superintending commission might do some good; but he very much doubted whether the appointment of one to watch over the distribution of the existing charities, would be attended with the advantages which the noble lord seemed to anticipate. These charities were generally granted by individuals, to be applied to some specified purpose, for local and individual benefit. Now, the management of such funds must naturally rest with those who are resident at the place in which they were to be distributed. A superintending board might very well direct the mode in which the accounts of charitable bodies should be kept, or originate the appointment of trustees; but as these charities were strictly local, as different objects were contemplated by the establishment of each of them, as they were held in trust by different persons and different bodies of persons, the immediate direction and superintendence of them must be local. And no board sitting in London could determine whether they were applied to the personal purposes which they were originally meant to answer. All the knowledge which the details connected with such funds called for, required local and individual management, and imposed upon the legislature the necessity of leaving them to the management of local authorities, to be constituted in some way or other. The noble lord had alluded to a bill which he had brought in with respect to endowed schools in Ireland, and argued that because he had appointed, under that bill, a central board in Dublin, he was favourable to the formation of a similar body to watch over the distribution of the funds of the various charities throughout the country. The cases, however, were very different. These endowed schools were, in Ireland, spread over the whole country, and it was very easy for a board sitting in Dublin to exercise a superintendence over schools all established on the same royal foundation, to direct the amount of salary to be paid to the masters of them, and to watch over their general management; but it did not follow that a board appointed in Dublin to direct the distributions of the funds of the numerous charities in Ireland, could attempt to answer the object of their establishment with any prospect of success. He was very much afraid that they were proceeding to legislate with respect to these charities without sufficient information. He had hoped (and he would certainly suggest it to the noble lord) that the noble lord would, before they took any step in the settlement of this question, have appointed a select committee for the purpose of making a report to the House on the nature of the charities connected with corporations. He thought that some scheme must be devised by which a provisional arrangement must be entered into, before the clauses which regard to charities supposed to be connected with the corporations, could be carried into operation. He was quite satisfied that the charities of the old corporations, which were left under bequests or acts of parliament, could not be transferred to the new bodies without making some intermediate provision. The nature of those trusts varied exceedingly; for instance, some of them were left for the benefit of the freemen, who were those appointed under a totally different system to be in future the recipients of these funds. The freemen were, by this bill, about to be extinguished; in what manner were these funds, left exclusively for their advantage, to be in future applied? By the great revolution which was about to be effected in corporations, the new trustees would find it exceedingly difficult to administer them according to the original intention of the donors. This dangerous question would also be raised by it, "What is corporate, and what is charitable property?" Now he thought it would comparatively be a very easy matter for nine or eleven gentlemen first to give a general view of the different trusts, to distinguish between those which could be considered only corporate property and those which were detached from the corporation, and determine by what scheme they might be applied, as strictly as possible, to their original purposes. He would, at all events, recommend the noble lord to erase that clause by which every person is prevented from being a charitable trustee, under the new bill, who is not a burgess. There were many respectable clergymen and gentlemen who were perfectly well qualified to become trustees to charities, but who had no desire to mix in local politics or differences, and who would, therefore, be unwilling to become enrolled as burgesses. He would not hesitate to go the length of saying, that the man who had no direct interest either in electioneering or municipal purposes, would be far the most likely man to use his exertions towards the fair and honest application of charitable funds. He begged, in conclusion, to impress on the mind of the noble lord opposite, that such a transfer of trust as this bill effected, should not be made without due consideration, and on the fullest information. There was in one city so large a sum as £18,000 a-year disbursed annually under charitable trusts. How did they mean to deal with such property? which must prove a blessing or a curse, according as it was well or ill applied. It would, he thought, be most desirable, if the noble lord should not consent to the postponement of the question of charitable trusts until the House was in possession of the knowledge which would enable them to legislate properly on the subject, that he should agree to leave the further consideration of this and three or four other clauses which referred to charities, until the other provisions of the measure were disposed of.

Lord John Russell observed, that if the right hon. baronet (Sir R. Peel) wished to have the clause postponed till Monday, with a view to make any favourable alteration in it, he would not object to its being postponed.

Sir Robert Peel could not hold out any such hope to the noble lord. He would, however, say one word more with respect to a commission. He thought that much more good might be effected by the appointment of some person attached to one of the offices of state, who would give constant reports to parliament of the mode in which the duties of those invested with charitable trusts were fulfilled, than by the establishment of any cumbrous commission. Instead of dividing the government of the country into a variety of commissions, it was his decided opinion, that when any increase of its functions was rendered necessary for such an object as that of watching over the management of charitable uses, that some person should be attached to one of the departments connected with some of the responsible ministers of the Crown, by which course all the expense of a commission would be saved, and the danger of having such practices carried on under the countenance of such a body as might escape the observation of parliament, avoided. He would throw out, therefore, a suggestion, the adoption of which would save a tenfold degree of expense—that a clerk should be added to those of the treasury or home office, who should have the direction of these charitable funds, and should have part of his time employed in some other business, if it should happen not to be wholly engaged by the duties imposed on them. He did hope, therefore, that the government would give up the idea of appointing any commission, but would see that the duties of such a body should be performed by some person in the office, and under the control of some responsible minister of the Crown.

Various verbal amendments were agreed to; and eventually the clause, as amended, was ordered to stand part of the bill.

JULY 6, 1835.

The 79th clause, as amended, having been read, Lord John Russell thought it necessary to mention two of the alterations in the clause. By the first, the town council were made liable to the payment of the capital as well as the interest of the debts of the corporation; and, by the second, they were not at liberty to lower the rate until this debt of the corporation was satisfied.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that in case a surplus should remain after providing for municipal purposes, he hoped that the town council would not have the power of alienating what was considered corporate property. The corporations had, in many instances, large estates, which in all probability would increase in value under a system of good government. Now, he apprehended that under the bill, as it then stood, or at least as it was originally introduced, the town council would be invested with all the legal powers which the existing corporations possessed; and according to the construction put on the law, by the Court of King's Bench and other judicial tribunals, the town council might be enabled to alienate the property of the corporation. The corporation of the town of Derby imposed a rate at one time for the purpose of lighting and watching, under an act called the county-rate act. By this act the corporation of this town were empowered to levy a rate for certain municipal purposes. The corporation of the town imposed that rate. It was objected to by some of the inhabitants, on the ground that there were in the hands of the corporation sufficient funds to answer the object for which the rate was imposed. They alleged that they ought not to be called on to pay a rate in the shape of a county-rate until the funds of the corporation were proved to be exhausted. In the Court of King's Bench, however, it was ruled (Lord Ellenborough being the Chief Justice) that they had no power to compel the corporation to apply corporate property to municipal purposes, and the validity of the rate was accordingly established. Lord Ellenborough ruled, too, in that case, that except in certain instances, in which ecclesiastical property was left within the control of the corporation, the corporation did possess the power of alienating its property, and applying it to corporate, as distinguished from municipal, purposes. Here might, then, be a case in which a clear surplus, arising from property belonging to the existing corporations, would be placed at the disposal of the new body called the town council, and which might by them be applied to "corporate purposes," in the altered acceptance of the terms. What he desired, then, was, that if any such case as that to which he alluded should occur (and he admitted that it was likely to be of rare occurrence), the town council should not have the power of distributing or alienating corporate property without the authority of the privy council, or some higher power.

Lord John Russell said, that he had provided for the case which the right hon. baronet anticipated.

Sir Robert Peel said, it was difficult to amend the bill, even when the amendments were assented to. There was what appeared to be a discrepancy between the bill and one of the schedules in an important particular, to which he begged leave to call the attention of the noble lord. In page ten, line ten, the clause assumed that the particular species of property for which an individual was entitled to vote should be described on the burgess-roll: the words were these—"And no person shall be admitted to vote at any such election except at the booth allotted for the part wherein the house, warehouse, counting-house, or shop occupied by him, as described in the burgess-roll, may be." It contemplated a distinct description of the nature of the property out of which the qualification arose, following the principle of the Reform Bill, as was indeed absolutely necessary, in order to guard against those cases of fraudulent description which otherwise were likely to occur. If the noble lord, however, looked at schedule D, he would find that there was no column for a description of the property, but only for the street in which it was situate. Arguing from the analogy of the Reform Bill, and on every principle of common sense, there should be a third column, containing a specific description of the property out of which the franchise arose: at present the schedule was at variance with the enacting parts of the bill. He begged to call the attention of the noble lord to another point. The rate to be levied was to be in the nature of a county-rate, and that was the form used in previous acts of parliament. The clause provided that the council should not be empowered to receive an appeal against that rate, but it assumed that there might be an appeal against the rate made by an individual, the words being—"and if any person shall think himself aggrieved by any such rate, it shall be lawful," &c. Now, there was no appeal on the part of an individual against the county-rate; that appeal must be made by parishes. The law required that the rate should be of the nature of a county-rate, and yet it anticipated an appeal against it, while there could be no such appeal; for though there might be an appeal by a parish there could be none by an individual. He had no doubt, if it remained in its present vague and indefinite shape, much inconvenience would arise, and great expense would be incurred in useless litigation. In his opinion, it would be highly expedient to separate the payment on account of poor-rate from that payable for borough-rate. Thus, should the whole payment be 2s. 6d., 1s. 6d. might be paid on account of the poor, and 1s. for the borough. The whole 2s. 6d. ought to be applied for at one and the same time, for he was fully aware of the aggravation of the burthen of payment which separate applications occasioned, but his wish was that the 1s. 6d. and the 1s. might be set down in the account as separate items.

On a subsequent part of the clause,

Sir Robert Peel called the attention of the House to the necessity which there existed to make provision for the payment of the debts of a corporation. He knew the case of a corporation which for upwards of two hundred years had remained in possession of a certain quantity of freehold property, that freehold was now claimed on behalf of the poor of the parish, and proceedings in Chancery had been instituted for the recovery of it. The only result of those proceedings up to the present time was, that costs had been incurred to the amount of £1000; of that, £500 had been paid. Now, suppose the suit were to be decided against the corporation, who was to pay the remaining £500? It was true that the tolls were not alienable till the debts of the corporation were paid; but he entreated the House not to agree to an enactment which would have the effect of continuing tolls that might ruin the town. He felt quite assured that the present bill ought not to be disposed of until some provision were made for paying the debts of a corporation. The matter ought not now to be passed over, but some specific and distinct mode should be provided, by borough-rate or otherwise, for paying those debts.

The clause, as amended, was ordered to stand part of the bill.

Lord John Russell next proposed the insertion of a clause in place of the 30th clause, which had been postponed, to the effect that in all cases where the population of a borough exceeded 12,000, his Majesty should be empowered to divide it into two wards, for the purpose of electing town councillors; and where the population exceeded 24,000, then into as many wards as his Majesty should think fit.

Sir Robert Peel said, as there might be as many burgesses in a borough with a population of 10,000 as in one where the number of inhabitants amounted to 12,000, this restriction of the exercise of the power intended to be invested in the Crown was unwise as it was, in apprehension, unnecessary. It might also so happen that, in boroughs where the population exceeded 18,000, more than two wards would be necessary, and therefore it was, that if they were to place such a power in the hands of the Crown, it should be so placed as to enable the Crown to exercise a proper discretion. Many boroughs, with a less population than 10,000, now actually conducted their business by means of wards; and he might mention Ludlow as one; and, for his part, he should wish to see the privileges of those boroughs preserved to them wherever the system had been found to work well. He thought, however, that the power of division was one which ought to rest with the parliament rather than with the Crown; but still, as the intention of the noble lord's bill was to confer it upon the Crown, he certainly should be sorry to see it limited, as this clause proposed. There might be double the number of voters in one borough that there was in another; and surely, if this point was to be determined by the Crown, it was no more than fair that the Crown should be left something like the exercise of a discretion with respect to the division into wards. But the noble lord's clause laid down nothing like a principle. It did not appear whether the divisions were to be effected by a reference to the number of burgesses, by the number of inhabitants considered in connexion with the payment of rates and taxes, or by the gross number of the population of men, women, and children of the borough; and, if no rule were necessary to be prescribed to the Crown in this respect, surely no rule should be laid down as to the number of wards into which a borough should be divided.

In reply to Mr. Grote—

Sir Robert Peel thought that establishing a minimum of rate-payers would be a very good principle to go upon; and such a test, he must say, would be obviously much better than if they were to be guided solely by the total number of men, women, and children. He was surprised, he must confess, to hear the hon. gentleman, the member for the city of London, condemning a system which prevailed in that city, which was held up in the report of the commissioners as a perfect model of a corporation.

The clause was agreed to, and the House resumed.

TITHES AND CHURCH (IRELAND).

JULY 7, 1835.

Lord Morpeth brought up and laid on the table of the House a bill for the better regulation of ecclesiastical revenues, and for the moral and religious education of the people of Ireland, which was read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Monday next.

SIR ROBERT PEEL rose and said, I wish to take this public opportunity of stating the course which I intend to pursue with respect to this bill. It comprehends some enactments in the general policy of which I concur; it comprehends others to which I feel the most decided objection in point of principle. I concur in the policy of making some new arrangement with respect to the collection of tithe in Ireland—I concur in the policy of substituting for the payment of tithe in kind, and also for composition for tithe, a rent-charge, as provided by one part of the noble lord's bill. I disagree as to making that rent-charge perpetual. I disagree as to the omission of conversion and redemption of the rent-charge, and its conversion into land. But at the same time, in the present state of Ireland, and with my strong feeling of the policy of making some immediate arrangement in respect to the collection of tithe, I have, notwithstanding the decided objection which I feel to other parts of the bill, a difficulty in giving a vote on the second reading, the effect of which, if successful, would probably be to preclude that arrangement with respect to the substitution of a rent-charge in lieu of tithe, in the general policy of which I concur; but I have no hesitation in saying that my objection to other parts of the bill, particularly to the appropriation of ecclesiastical property to other than ecclesiastical purposes immediately in connexion with the interests of the Established Church; and my objection to the wholesale suppression of the spiritual charge of so many parishes in Ireland, are so strong, that I cannot consent to purchase the benefit of the substitution of a rent-charge for tithe on the conditions which the noble lord has annexed to the change. The course, therefore, which I mean to pursue is, that on the motion that the Speaker leave the chair, for the purpose of enabling the House to go into committee on this bill, I shall move an instruction to that committee, that the bill introduced by the noble lord be divided into two bills. I do this for the express purpose of enabling those who may concur in the view I take, to support that part of the combined bill to which I am ready to give my assent; and I do it also for the express and avowed purpose of enabling myself and those with whom I act to reject altogether, if we can, that portion of the bill from which I entirely disagree. By taking that course, I relieve myself from the difficulties which I must necessarily incur on my rejecting, or attempting to reject, the bill as it now stands on its second reading. I should be affected by the opposition of those difficulties on many grounds, and amongst others by being obliged to manifest an apparent disposition to prevent some arrangement being made for that relief to the suffering clergy to which they are justly entitled. If I should succeed in my motion, and if the instruction to the committee be agreed to, I shall then have an opportunity of giving my assent to that part of the noble lord's bill of which I approve; but if that motion be objected to, and if it be determined that the principles involved in the bill shall not be separated, I shall have taken that mode of manifesting my decided objection to an appropriation of ecclesiastical revenue to other than ecclesiastical purposes, and to the suppression of the cure of souls in 868 parishes in Ireland. I should, I repeat, thus declare my sentiments as to these two principles, whilst I would give my assent to that by which the conversion of tithe or composition for tithe into a rent-charge was intended to be effected. The noble lord may easily see, therefore, what course I mean to take on the second reading of the bill. As I shall have an opportunity of fully explaining my views when I introduce my motion for an instruction to the committee, and as I do not wish to trouble the House with a double explanation of them, I shall move no amendments, nor occupy at all the attention of the House by addressing them on the second reading. It would, therefore, be for the convenience of the House, and of all the parties concerned, if a fair notice were to be given by the noble lord of the day on which he proposes the House should resolve itself into committee for the consideration of the Irish tithe bill. I think it therefore probable (though I cannot, of course, answer for the other members on this point), that there will be no lengthened discussion on the second reading, and therefore it is desirable that the noble lord should to-morrow, or, at all events, on an early day in the week, give a public notice of the day on which he means that the House should go into committee on the Irish tithe bill, and the debate on the important question involved in the bill should take place. I don't mean to say a word more, or adduce a single argument in favour of my views on this subject. All I desire is, that it should be understood that it is my distinct object to take the sense of the House on the principles involved in the two parts of the bill to which I have already alluded.

The bill was read a first time.

GREAT YARMOUTH ELECTION.

JULY 14, 1835.

In the debate on Mr. Rigby Wason's motion, praying that the House would cause an inquiry to be made into the circumstances stated in the petitions from Great Yarmouth, of the 26th and 30th June, and that they be referred to a select committee.

SIR ROBERT PEEL would give his vote against the appointment of a committee upon this ground—that the effect of such an appointment would be gradually to undermine the force of that tribunal which had been founded for the express purpose of securing equality and impartiality in the decisions of that House. The hon. member who cheered might doubt whether the tribunal had that effect; and if the hon. member would show him that any other system could be devised, by which the character of the House could be sustained for the impartiality of its decisions on election cases, he should be glad to adopt it. He was not contending that the present tribunal was the best for that purpose, but was simply stating, that the object of it was to do away with the scandal of former times, which was practically found to result from leaving these matters to be decided under the influence of party feeling in this House. If petitions, such as that now before the House, were made the subjects of special inquiry, the House would be virtually doing away with the Grenville Act, and taking from the proceedings of election committees the sanction of an oath, which only committees under that Act could administer. What was the fact with regard to the committee on the Liverpool case? They had no power to compel the attendance of members; and he believed that not three members regularly attended that committee. But under the Grenville Act regular attendance could be enforced. Supposing, however, the committee to be appointed, what was to be its object. It was not to try the right of a member to a particular seat, but to decide on the existence of the elective franchise of the borough; and this on the allegations contained in a petition which had been signed twice, and in one case seven times, by the same person. Having once sanctioned this committee, where would the House stop? You cannot draw the line at a petition signed by 1,300 or 1,000. The principle on which you go will just as well, as far as I can see, justify you in taking a similar course with one signed by 100, or even a smaller number. And see who are they, on whose allegations you are about to take this step. They are wholly irresponsible, and have not even the risk of incurring any expense if they do not succeed in making good their allegations; and yet, on such grounds as these, you establish a precedent by which the franchise of any city or borough in the country may be put in jeopardy. This was a serious, and in practice a very embarrassing proceeding. In addition to the Grenville Act, the noble lord opposite (Lord John Russell) had passed a resolution which entirely met a case of this kind. For where a petition had been postponed for fourteen days after the return of the writ, the resolution gave the parties who could allege the fact of bribery having been committed, leave to present a petition to the House within twenty-eight days after the fact alleged was said to have taken place. But in the present case the parties did not come forward within twenty-eight days. Again, as well under the resolution of the noble lord as under the Grenville Act, the parties incurred some responsibility; but they were now about to open a mode of investigation which dispensed with all responsibility. He would venture to say, that if this precedent should be established, the two former courses would no longer be acted upon, but that parties, taking the choice of destroying the elective franchise without any risk, this would be the only course resorted to. Under these circumstances, and believing that no case existed which could be made a precedent for this motion—believing that, if they once adopted this, there would be no limit as to the numbers on whose allegations a similar charge might be brought, that it might be 1,300 or not 100; believing also that this precedent would bring back the most objectionable practice of deciding election matters rather with reference to the interests of political parties than to the intrinsic merits of the case, he must, if this case went to a division, give his vote against the motion.

On a division the numbers were, for the motion, 116; against it 132; majority in favour of it, 54.

The appointment of the Committee was postponed.

CORPORATION REFORM.

JULY 16, 1835.

The House resolved itself into a Committee on this bill.

On the 11th Clause being read, which provides that no new burgesses be admitted who are not qualified under this Act.

Mr. Praed proposed an amendment, relative to the continuance to the present freemen of their parliamentary rights.

Rising after Lord John Russell,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the noble lord having commenced his speech by promising to argue the question, not only briefly, but drily, he thought the noble lord meant not to draw upon his imagination, but to adhere to facts. However, when he found the noble lord asserting that this measure did not alter the Reform Act, and that it had nothing to do with the election of members of parliament, he thought the noble lord was not proceeding quite so drily as he promised, but that he had drawn largely upon his fancy, and been guilty of, as great a sophism as was ever committed. What he complained of was, that the noble lord did not undertake to alter the Reform Act explicitly and avowedly, as, if he believed it to require alteration, he ought to have done, but the noble lord proceeded indirectly to effect his purpose. If the noble lord believed that bribery existed generally among the lower class of freemen, and could support his opinion by proof, let him come forward, and on that ground manfully and avowedly deprive the freemen of their right of voting for members of parliament. But the noble lord did not take that course, though in the course which he pursued, he covertly interfered with the provisions of an act which the country had been taught by the noble lord himself to consider a final settlement. The noble lord admitted that he did make use of that expression when he consented to "perpetuate" the rights of the freemen, a phrase which dropped from the noble lord in the unsuspecting candour of his nature. A fine notion of perpetuity! Since this final measure a period of three years had elapsed, and now the noble lord came forward to destroy the right which he admitted he intended to perpetuate. Just see in what manner the right of freemen to vote for members of parliament was finally confirmed by the Reform Bill. But first, in reference to the statement that this was a compromise, a step of submission taken to induce the Lords to agree to the measure, and one which therefore ought not to be persisted in; he must say that this was a bad, not to say dishonest, argument. If the House of Commons did procure the consent of the other House of parliament to the Reform Bill by preserving the rights of freemen, to recede from that stipulation was not the way to procure the consent of the Lords a second time within three years. He knew that there was nothing in the Reform Act to fetter the legislature; but he contended that it was the duty of the government, if they ultimately intended to alter the right of voting possessed by freemen, to avow that they did not mean to "perpetuate" that privilege, but to propose an alteration in it on introducing a bill for the regulation of municipal corporations. "You did not take this course—you left the House of Lords, the country, and the entire body of freemen, under the impression that this was an acknowledgment and perpetuation of their right, which had received a new sanction and greater force from that Reform Act, of which you boasted as the second charter of our liberties." What were the expressions posted up in every village—"The Reform Bill, the whole bill, and nothing but the bill." How was this announcement adhered to? He had always prophesied at the moment when his friends professed their desire to accept the Reform Bill as our constitutional charter, and not only to accept, but abide by it, that any proposal for its modification was much more likely to come from the authors of the measure than from its opponents; and that the first provision to be modified would be one supposed peculiarly to affect the interests of the party in power. Look at the progress of the Reform Bill and its enactments as they regarded the privileges of the freemen. At first, the only right protected was that of freemen having an existing right to vote in elections of members of parliament at the passing of the bill. The bill, as amended, provided that the children of freemen living at that period, and apprentices who were then bound, should acquire and maintain the right of voting during their lives. See how the bill went on, without any hostile attack on the original clause, improving in this respect, as if by the growing good-will of the government towards the freemen, first admitting existing rights, and then including in its provisions inchoate rights. This was not all; the bill was further altered in committee, the noble lord exhibiting that degree of deference to the fair sex in the alteration which he feared both the noble lord and himself might be charged with neglecting in consequence of their vote of to-night. In the third edition of the Reform Bill of 1831, the noble lord gave the franchise to persons who might marry the widows or daughters of freemen. The bill, thus amended, was sent up to the Lords, by whom it was rejected on the second reading. A new Reform Bill was introduced by the noble lord on the 12th of December, 1831, the first having been rejected in the House of Peers, as he before said, on the second reading, on the general principle, and not with any special reference to its mode of dealing with the rights of freemen. A clause was voluntarily introduced in the new bill, on which the noble lord congratulated himself exceedingly. By this clause the rights of freemen were preserved in perpetuity, subject to one or two exceptions, such as that no honorary freeman should have the right of voting, &c. The words of the clause were as follow:—"That every person who would have been entitled to vote in the election of a member or members to serve in any future parliament for any city or borough not included in the schedule marked (A) to this act annexed, either as a burgess or freeman, or in the city of London as a freeman and liveryman, if this act had not been passed, shall be entitled to vote in such election, provided such person shall be duly registered according to the provisions hereinafter contained. Provided always, that no person who shall have been elected, made, or admitted a burgess or freeman since the 1st day of March, 1831, otherwise than in respect of birth or servitude, or who shall hereafter be elected, made, or admitted a burgess or freeman, otherwise than in respect of birth or servitude, shall be entitled to vote as such in any such election for any city or borough as aforesaid, or to be so registered as aforesaid; provided also, that no person shall be so entitled as a burgess or freeman in respect of birth, unless his right be originally derived from or through some person who was a burgess or freeman, or entitled to be admitted a burgess or freeman, previously to the 1st day of March, in the year 1831, or from or through some person who since that time shall have become, or shall hereafter become a burgess or freeman in respect of servitude." Did not the whole of this proceeding—the gradual admission and extension of the privileges of freemen—nay, the very exceptions and exclusions adopted, give an appearance of finality and permanence to the measure? If the arrangement had been merely temporary, why did the noble lord except honorary freemen, or those who might acquire a right of freedom subsequently to March 1st, 1831? Did not those exceptions show that the noble lord intended the bill to be a final measure, and that, by connecting the right of voting with residence and registration, he had taken security against bribery and corruption among non-resident freemen, who were thought most liable to suspicion, and who, having no local interest in boroughs where they did not live, made elections a sort of holyday, or prolonged saturnalia—a practice leading to indefinite expense, which it was thought right to limit? Did not the fact of these exceptions and securities, he asked, prove that the arrangement finally proposed by the noble lord was not meant as a temporary or provisional arrangement? These rights being so confirmed to the freeman by the Reform Act, it did tend to destroy all confidence in that "final settlement" when the House found the noble lord proceeding, not by a direct and open attack, but by sap and mine, to assail and take away privileges which had existed by long prescription, and which were confirmed by the recent enactment of 1831. It shook his confidence in the permanency of our second charter, when within three years he saw so important a branch as this lopped off under the pretence of Municipal Reform. The noble lord talked of hearing eloquent declamations and great pretensions of false sympathy for the rights of the poor on the Opposition side of the House. For his part he pretended to no false sympathy for the poor, and did not mean to offer any declamation in favour of extending the franchise to the humbler classes; for if it were proposed to enlarge the right of voting for members of parliament, by taking in the municipal voters created under this bill, he would oppose it. But let the noble lord recollect that the House was not now inquiring, on theoretical and speculative principles, as to what might constitute a good right of voting, but it was dealing with a franchise which it found existing by long prescription, and solemnly confirmed by the noble lord's final measure and conclusive settlement of the Reform Act. If, therefore, he now attempted to continue that right, it did not arise from any desire to indulge in vain declamations about the privileges of the poor, but from a wish to maintain that good faith which he thought pledged to the "perpetuation" of the franchise. If the House proceeded against the freemen on the ground of bribery and corruption, in justice to those men it ought first to establish the existence of corruption before attempting to punish them. It was not fair, on a general and vague presumption of bad repute, to destroy their rights. He admitted cases had been proved of freemen abusing their franchise and taking bribes, but if the argument built on that ground were good for destroying the rights of freemen, it was also good for destroying elective rights much more extensively.

The case of Stafford had been referred to, and if in that or any other instance it was proved that the practice of bribery was inveterate, and the voters irreclaimable, he would be willing to punish them. But were no other parties liable to the charge of corruption except the freemen? Was it not notorious that the £10 householders of the borough of Stafford were subject to the imputation of bribery? He could add another case, in which proof of bribery was clearly brought home to the electors. He referred to the election at Liverpool in 1830. It might be said that in this case it was the freemen of Liverpool who were bribed. They were—but was the bribery confined to freemen who were not also £10 householders? and who bribed them? Here was the evidence of Mr. W. Miers, a merchant of Liverpool, who acted as president on Mr. Ewart's side, assisted by Mr. Thornely and Mr. Harvey. That gentleman stated, that he paid away large sums in bank-notes to voters—of what class?—poor freemen? no; but persons in respectable situations in life. The witness gave the names and occupations of some of those parties. £50 was the highest price paid for a vote—it was given to a retired brewer. A captain of militia received £30 or £35, witness was not sure which, but he recollected giving this voter a certain sum, and that, discontented with the amount, the captain returned and obliged him to give £10 more. Three brothers, named Howard, “very respectable men,” got £10 a-piece. A ship-carpenter, with whom the witness frequently had dealings, and who was also “a respectable man,” got £12, but he came early in the day. He was worth £8,000 or £10,000—“a very respectable gentleman.” When asked whether the higher or lower class of voters received most in bribes, the witness replied that he thought the middling class got the most, because they kept off. Witness could not specify the total expense of the contest of 1830; he did not know what other individuals might have paid, he could only say what he had disbursed himself, and he thought that about £34,000 had passed through his hands. Now, he (Sir R. Peel) dared to say, that in the distribution of this £34,000, the lower class of voters did participate; but it was equally clear that the higher class, £10 householders and persons occupying premises of considerably greater value, did also share in the bribery, and their crime was infinitely greater. Such cases as those of the man of substance who accepted £12, and the captain who came back for an additional £10, were of a much more aggravated nature than any corruption among the humbler voters. He had a right to say, without any attempt at eloquent declamation, that poverty was not in itself a conclusive proof of a disposition to be bribed, and therefore that you ought not to act on a general assumption of the guilt of the humbler class of voters, but should have proofs of corruption before you inflicted upon them such a penalty as the present. One word as to the general principle: he said at once and explicitly, that he was averse to extending the elective franchise, on the ground stated on the other side of the House, because to introduce constant changes in the franchise and mode of electing members of parliament, was to unsettle the minds of the people for no good end. On that ground Lord Althorp refused to vote for the ballot when the question was brought forward by the hon. member for London. The noble lord said he had been a party to what he considered a great constitutional settlement, which had not as yet been sufficiently tried; and that on that ground, although his opinion was in favour of the ballot, and had been so expressed, he felt bound to reject the proposition, because the Reform Bill had not received a fair trial. If that was a good argument against the introduction of the ballot, how much more strongly could it be urged against any alteration in the elective franchise. Now a word as to the general policy of the measure. He would not consent to make the electoral franchise co-extensive with the burgess franchise; but finding the electoral franchise of freemen in existence, he would maintain it, because, for one reason, he thought it an advantage not to have one uniform dead level of franchise prevailing throughout the country. He would not extend the electoral franchise of freemen beyond its present limits; indeed, he would willingly admit that he did not think the franchise good in itself, or that, arguing à priori, he would propose to establish it for the first time; but finding it established and confirmed under the Reform Act, he would not consent to abolish it. Nor did he hesitate to avow, notwithstanding the taunts which the noble lord had thought it becoming to indulge in, that he was not sorry to see some modified connection between the working classes and the constitution of the House of Commons. He was not sorry to see those who did not happen to be householders possess to a certain extent a voice in the choice of representatives. He was not indisposed to think that the right of voting acquired by persons who served an apprenticeship of seven years, was equally entitled to protection with that which a man acquired by living three years, in a town and paying the borough rates. As if, however, to aggravate the disappointment and mortification of the freemen, the old franchise was destroyed by the same act which created the new one. The noble lord was not content with the £10 franchise in this new act. He assumed that that qualification was not necessary for the exercise of the municipal franchise. Under the provisions of the bill a person who had no connection with the borough, whose rates might be paid by his landlord, who might live in a different part of the country, was assumed to have such an interest in the municipal government of the town as entitled him to vote for members of the council, whilst it was held that a person who had acquired his freedom by servitude could have no such interest. It appeared to him that a servitude for a period of seven years was as good a test of character as a residence of three years in a town; and as the capital of a man in that condition of life consisted not in money, but in acquired skill, it supplied also, he thought, as good a test of solvency as the payment of rates for three years. He disregarded the anomaly of having the parliamentary franchise different from the corporate franchise; but at all events, the noble lord was not entitled to urge that as a reason for passing the present clause, because he himself had created it. On the grounds which he had stated, wishing to preserve the existing modified connection between the working classes and that House, being at the same time prepared to punish the freemen if a case of guilt could be established against them; but above all, because parliament and the country had been taught to believe that the Reform Bill was a final settlement of a great constitutional question, he could not consent to make the important alteration which the noble lord proposed, and therefore he would give his vote against the mutilation of the Reform Act.

CHURCH OF IRELAND.

JULY 21, 1835.

Viscount Morpeth moved the Order of the Day for the House to resolve itself into a Committee on the Tithes and Church (Ireland) Bill.

SIR ROBERT PEEL addressed the House as follows:—Sir, I rise for the purpose of moving the instructions, of which I have given notice, to the committee upon the bill relating to the Church of Ireland—instructions to the effect that the bill be divided into two parts, in order that the House may have an opportunity of giving a separate consideration to that part of the bill which provides for the recovery of tithes, and for the realization of property justly belonging to the church, and that part which establishes a new distribution of church property, and its application to other than ecclesiastical purposes. I rise oppressed with a deep anxiety, partly arising from the vast importance of the subject on which I am about to address you, and partly from an apprehension that I may not be able to do justice to my own conviction, to my own deep impression, that, if reason and justice shall prevail, the House will never consent to the appropriation of church property that is now contemplated. Believing that my conviction is grounded, not on feeling or prejudice, but upon the force of demonstration which it is impossible to resist—I am oppressed with the natural anxiety which accompanies the fear, lest, through some defect of statement, some omission or obscurity in the argument, that assent of the mind which ought to follow clear and conclusive reasoning, may be withheld, and lest the advocate, through the unskillful use of the instruments at his command, may fail in bringing home to others that conviction which presses upon his own mind with irresistible force.

I well know that there exist great impediments to my success—that there are great and numerous obstacles in the way of that for which I have to contend. In the first place, I have to contend against that prejudice which it is difficult to overcome—that prejudice which arises from repeated exaggerations as to the amount of the church property—exaggerations which have been made with such confidence—which have been reiterated so often, and from so early a period—that it is now difficult to remove the impression they have made on the public mind.

In addition to that obstacle with which I have to contend from the effect of repeated exaggeration, is another and an equally powerful one. We have adopted a resolution, based on the erroneous estimate, and proposed and carried expressly with a view to a party triumph. The victory has been gained—the government has been overthrown—the irrevocable pledge has been given. What hope is there now that the Irish Church will have a fair hearing, and that there will be candour and justice enough virtually to rescind the resolution, which decided that the property ought to be alienated, and applied to other purposes? What hope is there, that the tardy correction of notorious error, the establishment of unsuspected truth, on evidence which cannot be shaken, will prevail against those barriers which will be raised by the force of habit, by the effect of long-continued assent to exaggeration and misstatement—and, above all, by the false pride and false shame, which will forbid the revocation of the hasty pledge which has been publicly given by a powerful and victorious party?

I will, in the first place, state the principles upon which I shall conduct my argument. I waive the discussion for the present of some of the most important grounds on which the inalienability of church property has been on former occasions maintained. I do not abandon them. I admit their full force; but I select another ground, because, if I can establish it, I ought to compel the acquiescence and assent of those who are most opposed to me. I do not, therefore, bring forward the general principle of the sacredness of property, or the special confirmation of that property in the case of the Church in Ireland by the Act of Union. I waive any reference to the bill for the relief of the Roman Catholic disabilities and the declarations it imposed—I take your own tests—I combat with your own instrument—I rely on your own evidence—I stand within the circle which you have drawn around me—and, without transgressing its narrow limits, I will attempt to prove to you, that, on your own admissions and your own principles, you have no surplus of church property to dispose of, and that the pretence of this bill, that there is such a surplus, is a dishonest one.

In approaching this question, it is my desire to take nothing for granted, but to establish every conclusion which I shall draw from premises which cannot be questioned. And first, as to the fact and the extent of exaggeration. I have met it in every form and in every degree—in pamphlets, in conversation, and in speeches—varying from errors of small amount to an error of millions. I have read a letter of a late Roman Catholic prelate—one of high reputation in his own country, and who was supposed to possess peculiar information on the subject on which he wrote. I allude to the late Dr. Doyle. That right rev. prelate, in a letter addressed to Lord Farnham, made this statement as to the revenues of the Established Church in Ireland, and also as to the numbers of those Protestants in communion with that church, for whose religious instruction those revenues were destined: “Can your lordship, laying your hand on your breast, appeal to your conscience or honour, and then say that the Irish Church Establishment requires no reform? It is impossible that you could, my lord, because it is monstrous to think that an annual income, amounting to several millions sterling, should be appropriated, in such a country as Ireland, to the maintenance of the pastors of less than one-thirtieth part of the population.”

Here, then, was an Irishman, a Roman Catholic prelate, estimating in a work, by the publication of which he challenged contradiction which he never received—estimating the church revenues of Ireland at several millions, and the Protestants, for whose religious instruction these millions were expended, at about 260,000. Can one be surprised, then, that the writer of that statement should have characterised the Church of Ireland in these words?—“A man of reflection, living in Ireland, and coolly observing the workings of the Church Establishment, would seek for some likeness to it only among the priests of Juggernaut, who sacrifice the poor naked human victims to their impure and detestable idols.” Into the same errors, members of the legislature (themselves also members of the church) have fallen. I find that the hon. member for Middlesex, in introducing, on the 6th of May, 1824, a measure relating to the Established Church in Ireland, made statements respecting that church, the numbers in communion with it, and the amount of its revenues, which showed his total want of accurate information on the subject. I say this, not as imputing blame to the hon. member for wilful misstatement, for no doubt the hon. member thought he was stating what was correct—but I now mention it, because I am attempting to show, and if possible to remove, the obstacles which exist to a fair, dispassionate, and unprejudiced consideration of this question, from the very grossly exaggerated accounts which have already gone forth to the public respecting it. On the occasion to which I allude, the hon. member for Middlesex estimated the number of Protestants belonging to the Established Church in Ireland at 500,000. He said, that he had taken great pains to ascertain the revenues of the Irish Church, and these he estimated at £3,200,000. His statement was, that, “according to the best calculation which he had been able to make, there were church lands, which, if rented out as other lands were, would let for £2,500,000. There were 14,000,000 of acres in Ireland, of which the clergy held two elevenths, and, taking Wakefield’s proportions, and the average value of property in the different counties, it amounted to that sum.” “Adding to the £2,500,000 the average sum produced by 1,289 benefices at £500 a-year each, the appointments would make a sum of £3,200,000.” The hon. member added—“The comparison in Ireland was now, one Protestant to fourteen Catholics. It might be one Protestant to forty, fifty, or sixty Catholics; and while this diminution clearly showed the worthlessness and inutility of the Church Establishment, would any man be so hardy as to insist that that establishment ought to be preserved at the expense of nearly £3,000,000 sterling?” In later times, however, in discussions on the Irish Church, the extent of exaggeration has been somewhat diminished. When the hon. member for St. Alban’s brought forward his motion in the course of last year, he materially reduced the extravagant estimates of Dr. Doyle, and of the member for Middlesex, but still he greatly overrated the revenues of the church in Ireland, and underrated the number of those who professed its doctrines. In his motion on the property of the Irish Church, on the 27th of May, 1834, the hon. member for St. Alban’s (Mr. Ward) said—“If, in lieu of adopting the averages which returns sent me would authorize me in taking, I assume Wakefield’s average of one to fourteen, I cannot fairly be accused of any design to diminish the number of the Episcopalian Protestants below their real amount. This would give 600,000 in all as the number of those for whose exclusive benefit the present establishment is kept up. And what is the cost of that establishment? The glebe lands, together with the bishops’ lands, the ecclesiastical corporations, and the returns of tithes, will make a total of £937,456 as the yearly revenue actually received by the Irish Church.” The motion of the hon. member for St. Alban’s on that occasion was seconded by the hon. member for London (Mr. Grote), who said—“My hon. friend stated that the expense of the Protestant Church Establishment in Ireland is £900,000 annually; the number of Protestants of the Church of England (in Ireland) is not more than 600,000: the charge of the whole establishment, therefore, is not less than £1, 10s. per head.” Thus, then, in the course of the last year, it had been assumed that the revenues of the Church in Ireland were £937,000, and that the number of Protestants did not exceed 600,000.

When a noble lord (Althorp), at that time Chancellor of the Exchequer, brought the subject forward in 1833, he fairly admitted the great extent to which exaggeration had been carried on the subject. In his speech on that occasion, the noble lord said, “I can say, conscientiously, that greater exaggeration has prevailed upon this subject than has prevailed upon any other political topic that I recollect. Before I look more narrowly into the question myself, I had greatly exaggerated to my own mind the amount of the revenues of the Irish Church Establishment.” “One great and very prevalent exaggeration relates to the revenues of the bishops. I shall surprise the House when I mention, that the net amount of all their revenues is only £130,000 a-year.” “I think, therefore, that I shall be justified in stating, that all the revenues of the Church of Ireland applicable to the support of the ministers of that church, do not exceed £800,000. I have gone into this detail,” said Lord

Althorp, "and have pressed it upon the attention of the House, in consequence of the exaggerations which prevail upon the subject, and which render it impossible for gentlemen to come to a just consideration of this question without knowing the facts upon which it rests." I give you the same caution that Lord Althorp did. I ask you to ascertain the facts before you form your conclusions; and it is the more necessary that I should repeat the caution, for Lord Althorp's own estimates were erroneous, like those of his predecessors. I despair of removing the effect which has been made by these repeated misstatements. I may correct the error, but I cannot efface the impression which it has made. There may be a reluctant assent to the correctness of my remarks, a tardy admission of past mistakes; but the prejudices against the church will remain. The misrepresentation has had its effect. It has been repeated within these walls so often, that it is regarded as incontrovertible. It was brought back in petitions from the country; and we have mistaken the echo of our own delusions for new and confirmatory evidence of their truth. If, however, I shall make it appear that this church, which is said to possess several millions, does not own property to the amount of one-tenth of that which she is said to hold; if I can make it clear and indisputable, that, instead of only 260,000 persons belonging to her communion in Ireland, according to the statement of Dr. Doyle, the number of Protestants connected with the Church of Ireland is 860,000; if this should be shown from the latest and most authentic accounts, I would ask hon. members to renounce their own admitted error and to acknowledge the truth.

Superadded to the difficulty which I have mentioned from the prejudices arising from oft-repeated exaggerated statements, there is another and not less powerful one, in the resolution decidedly hostile to the Established Church of Ireland, adopted by this House for party purposes, and under the influence of party feelings and prejudices. I will not argue the question with reference to any feelings of this kind. I will not argue it on any other ground than that of the force of evidence and reason; and let me add, that if the House resigns itself to the influences of a powerful party, united against the Irish Church for purposes to which false delicacy or false shame may make them disposed to adhere, I admit that I have no chance for the success of my motion; but if the House will struggle against the impression produced by erroneous statements—if I have to deal only with men of ingenious minds, on whom I can hope to impress the conviction which so strongly weighs on my own mind, I have no doubt that I shall be able to carry my motion by a large majority.

The bill states in its preamble, that "whereas it is just and necessary for the establishment of peace and good order in Ireland, and conducive to religion and morality, that after adequate provision made for the spiritual wants of the members of the Established Church, the surplus income of such parishes shall be applied to the moral and religious education of the people, without distinction of religious persuasion." Here then is first a fact assumed, and next a principle asserted. It is assumed that there is a surplus revenue, after adequate provision made for the spiritual wants of the members of the Established Church; and next, the principle is asserted, that that surplus should be applied for purposes other than ecclesiastical.

Now, before we can satisfactorily decide what are the spiritual wants of the Established Church, and what therefore can constitute a surplus, it is necessary to bear in mind the principle and provisions of an act which was passed so lately as the year 1833, which was brought in by the government of Lord Grey, and was intended to effect important and substantial reforms in the Irish Church. It was generally known by the name of the Church Temporalities' Act. By this act, ten out of the twenty-two bishoprics of Ireland were suppressed, provision was made for the extinction of sinecure dignities, and for the suppression of benefices in places wherein divine worship had not been performed for the period of three years preceding. A large proportion of the revenue thus obtained was applied as a substitute for the church-cess in Ireland; that is to say, the church took upon itself a charge for repairing and building churches, which had up to that period been borne by the proprietor and occupier of land. Lord Grey gave a summary of the bill to the following effect. He estimated the amount of the church-cess at £60,000 a year. Another object of the fund which would be created by the bill was the augmentation of small livings. The House of Commons had, by a separate resolution, declared, that those clergymen whose parishes produced to them a maintenance of less than £200 a-year, should have their incomes raised to that amount out of the church funds, that being the lowest which it was considered a clergyman ought to have who had the charge of a parish. He believed that the resolution passed unanimously. It was true, the hon. member for Middlesex growled a faint opposition to it; but he did not divide on the subject. The hon. member had, however, afterwards candidly and manfully admitted in debate, that he thought £300 a-year was not too much for the incumbent of a parish, actively engaged in the performance of parochial duties. The noble lord (Grey) estimated, the sum required for the augmentation of small livings would be about £46,500 a-year. The sum required for the building new churches was estimated at £20,000, and that for the purchase and improvement of glebes at £10,000, making the total charge on the Church Temporalities' Fund to be £136,500. Now, to meet this charge, the noble lord estimated that there would be £40,000 a-year as the interest of a capital of £1,000,000, which he expected would be realised by the sale of bishops' lands. The produce of the suppressed bishoprics was estimated at £50,780. The tax on the remaining bishoprics was calculated to produce £4,600. The tax on the incumbents of the several livings in Ireland, and the funds to be derived from suppressed sinecures, were taken at £42,000 per annum; the repayments on account of glebe-houses for fifteen years were estimated at about £8,000. The total charge on the fund was taken, as I have before observed, at £136,500, and its ultimate annual produce was calculated by lord Grey at about £155,000. Recollect that this was the fund, the only fund, out of which certain great objects, then declared to be of the utmost importance to the efficiency and stability of the church, were to be provided for. From this fund, and from this alone, churches were to be repaired, small livings to be increased, glebe-houses to be built. On the faith of assurances, we were called upon to relinquish the vestry-cess, and to consent to the suppression of ten bishoprics.

Now, what is the present condition of the funds under this Church Temporalities' Act, and how are they affected by this bill? It will be found, that instead of the sum of £155,000, the actual amount of revenue received by the commissioners under the Church Temporalities' Bill will not exceed £29,127. Now it will appear from the papers to which I have referred, that the sum required for repairs of churches throughout Ireland amounts annually to £25,000. Other expenses connected with the performance of divine service, formerly defrayed by the vestry-cess, amount to £34,412. In consequence of the vestry-cess not having been paid, many churches have gone so much out of repair, as to require a greater sum to put them in repair than they would have done had the repairs been made as soon as required. The expenses of the commissioners, including salaries to commissioners, clerks, agents, architects, and stationery, are £10,000. So that here is an annual expenditure of £69,412, to be charged on a present annual income of £29,127. It is true the commissioners have done that which is frequent with Irish commissioners—they have realized a debt. A loan of £100,000 has been advanced by the treasury to the commissioners, of which sum £46,000 has been received, and of that sum £45,688 has been applied to pay the vestry-cess of 1833, and the arrears of the cess of 1832 and 1831; and this, be it remembered, without making any provision for the building of churches, without making any provision for the augmentation of small livings, without making any provision for another important object of the Church Temporalities' Fund—the purchase and improvement of glebes. A calculation has been made as to the period when the fund will be productive, so as to be equal to the permanent expenditure of the commissioners, and the answer to the inquiry on this point is, "If the permanent income of £83,440, as set forth by the ecclesiastical commissioners, is to be the only income certainly forthcoming, the annual funds of the ecclesiastical commissioners will never equal their contemplated expenditure, but, on the contrary, fall short of the same by an immediate and perpetual annuity of £3,446, or an immediate capital of £86,173. Assuming that the doubtful income of £22,000 from the tax on incumbents should be paid, the period when the funds would meet the early expenditure would be less than eighteen years, that is to say, in February, 1853. The period when the fund would reach its maximum would be in thirty-seven years and a-half, or the 1st of August, 1873. The debt on the fund likely to be realized by the accumulation of the yearly deficit until the income may be equal to the expenditure, is £412,382. The time required to pay off such debt after it shall have attained its maximum, will be twenty years from February, 1853, being from and after the 1st of August next thirty-seven years and a-half." But this answer proceeded on the supposition that the £100,000, advanced by the treasury to the commissioners on the Perpetual fund, would be paid off on the 1st of August next from the first proceeds of the Perpetuity fund. I have not heard that any such payment is likely to be made on the 1st of August, and I see, from the despairing nod given by the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that he has no expectation that such will be the case; and yet with this knowledge, that it would take thirty-seven years and a-half before the fund would be productive, the noble lord saddles it with five per cent. immediate payment on the present amount of tithes to each clergyman who shall sustain a loss by the operation of the present bill.

The statements which I have just read will expose the miserable expedients of the bill. The clergy appear to have a lien on a fund which might be, if every thing went on prosperously, in a condition to pay in about forty years. But the fund itself is at an end. The revenue to be realized under the former bill is annihilated by this. The income from suppressed dignities is applied to another purpose. The tax on incomes above £300, will become almost unproductive; for incomes are, at the discretion of the lord-lieutenant, to be reduced to £300. The plain truth is, that the fund under the Church Temporalities' Bill will not meet the charges which heretofore fell on the vestry-cess, and that the promised provision for building churches and glebe-houses, and for increasing small livings, is at an end. So much for the bearing of the present measure on that which was described as a comprehensive scheme of church reform in Ireland, which was hailed with shouts of applause only two years since, as effectually correcting the abuses, and at the same time supplying the acknowledged deficiency, of the church!

I will now consider the operation and effect of this bill upon the general revenues of the church, and prove the extent to which they will be produced by it. Never was that mathematical process, the process of exhaustion, applied with greater ingenuity, or with greater success. There are three separate modes, all working simultaneously, by which the church revenue will be affected by this bill. First, there is to be at once a deduction of thirty per cent. from the present amount of tithe composition. Secondly, there is to be a power to re-open the compositions entered into and fixed in amount, either by arbitration or by voluntary consent of parties. This power is to be exercised, not by the lord-lieutenant in council, but at the discretion of three gentlemen sitting at Whitehall, the commissioners of land revenue, under whom the lord-lieutenant is to act as a mere subordinate and ministerial agent. It is true there may be some few special cases in which the composition ought to be re-opened—there may be some instances (I think they will be very rare instances) of fraud, or collusion, or gross error—if there be any such cases, a special remedy, with proper guards and securities against the abuse of it, might be provided. By this bill, however, the decision is placed in the hands of three commissioners of woods and forests, and on that decision every composition may be re-opened. What will be the consequent position of the clergy of Ireland? Each incumbent may be called on to defend, not only his own temporary interest, but the permanent interest of the church, in the amount of tithe composition. The present incumbent very probably has not been a party to the composition. There may have been two or three intervening incumbencies, the evidence may have been destroyed, the persons able to give parole evidence may be dead, the composition may have been effected, in the first instance, without minute valuation, through amicable compromise between the parties. And yet the unfortunate clergyman is by this bill to be called on to defend the composition, upon the ground of his own existing interest during his life in the receipt of tithes; that is to say, the clergyman who has been unable during late years to collect any tithe at all, is to defend compositions for tithe entered into fourteen or fifteen years ago, and in respect to which compositions he is possessed of no evidence. What, let me remind the House, is the tribunal before whom these compositions are to be reopened? Three barristers, three at the very least, are to preside over the investigation. The composition may be reopened separately in each parish of a union. In each, the charge of defending it on the part of the church may be thrown on the incumbent. The barristers are to determine what portion of the expense incurred by their inquiries is to fall on him; and thus the clergyman, who has received nothing for the last three or four years, whose family may be actually starving, is to be visited with the triple curse of a visit from three barristers, at five guineas a-day each, besides their expenses, for the purpose of opening a composition under which he has recovered nothing! Now, I will take the case of a clergyman who, with a nominal income of £150 or £200 per annum, has not realized one shilling of his tithe for the last three or four years, and ask the House to conceive for one moment his feelings, when he sees a barouche and four, containing three barristers at five guineas a-day each, drive up to his door for the purpose of reopening a composition into which his predecessor had entered, and from which he has realized nothing. Let the House imagine the feelings of that man who, unable to realize one farthing of the stipend to which he is entitled, under a composition to which he was no party, is thus to bear the burden of an inquiry respecting which he possesses no information and no evidence. To what extent the reopening of the compositions may proceed, it is impossible for me to calculate. It is equally impossible for me to calculate how far it will tend to diminish the income and revenues of the Irish Protestant Church; but surely it is most vexatious and unjust thus to encourage parishes to open the compositions to which they have in most cases been voluntary parties—or which have been arranged through the intervention of disinterested arbitrators. In short, the measure is in this respect fraught with greater injustice and individual hardship, than any measure I ever remember to have been submitted to the legislature. This is the second battery which the noble lord opposite (Lord Morpeth) has directed against the revenues of the Irish Church.

The third is the substitution of a new corn average for that which formed the standard of the compositions now existing. It is necessary that I should shortly state to the House the principles of those compositions. They were first provided for in the bill which was brought in by my right hon. friend (Mr. Goulburn), and which passed in 1823. That bill was amended in 1824, and by that measure an option was given to make the composition for tithes to endure for twenty-one years, and, in conformity with the bill of my right hon. friend, most compositions have been effected for the term of twenty-one years. Consequently the composition under those bills, if made from 1824 to 1831 inclusive, for the period of twenty-one years, would extend to the years 1845 or 1852 inclusive, and could not be open to revision in the intermediate time. The bill of my right hon. friend was succeeded by that of the noble lord, the member for North Lancashire, (Lord Stanley) by the provisions of which it was made compulsory, in cases where compositions had not been entered into under the former bill, that they should be made. The bill of the noble lord did not at all disturb the compositions which had been effected for the term of twenty-one years under Mr. Goulburn's bill. If under that bill they had been entered into for that or for shorter periods, the contract, whatever it was, was to endure. Lord Stanley's bill compelled a composition, in every uncompounded parish, making the new and compulsory composition variable every seven years, but assuming, as the standard which was to regulate the first composition, the average price of corn for the seven years preceeding November 1830. The compositions under Lord Stanley's bill were effected in the course of 1833 and 1834, and as they are invariable for seven years, they ought to endure of course until 1840 and 1841. Now, this bill provides in lieu of the standard adopted respectively in Mr. Goulburn's and Lord Stanley's bills, that a new average of prices shall be taken; in short, that a principle shall be applied differing from that which has met with the consent of all parties. And what is the average now proposed?—that of the prices for the last seven years preceeding the date of the present bill. It is notorious both to the House and the country, that corn is now much lower in price than it was at the period when the average of each of the former bills was taken. So far as I have been enabled to ascertain those averages, I believe them to be correct when thus stated:—The average prices for the seven years ending the 1st of November, 1821 (that taken by Mr. Goulburn), was of wheat, £1 15s. 10½d., oats, 13s. 11¾d. For the seven years ending the 1st of November, 1830, that adopted by the noble lord (Stanley), the average prices were, wheat, £1 12s. 0½d., oats, 13s. The present average prices which will be brought into operation are—wheat, £1 10s. 1½d.; oats, 11s. 8¾d. Now, the effect of adopting these averages in lieu of the standard which guided the preceding measures will be, if my estimate be correct, to diminish the amount of the composition about sixteen per cent. or one-sixth of the whole; and this reduction is to be added to three-tenths to which I have already alluded.

I have thus attempted to explain to the House the triple process by which the Church in Ireland is to be relieved of superfluous wealth:—First, the deduction of thirty per cent., a simple, intelligible, and definite deduction. Secondly, the re-opening of compositions, the precise effect of which it is impossible to calculate. Thirdly, the substitution of a new standard of corn averages, in lieu of those which at present rule the tithe compositions. I will now apply practically the machinery of the bill, and consider its operation, first upon a given amount—say £100 of tithe composition—then upon a living of the nominal value of £600—then upon the general mass of Church revenue derivable from tithe. And first I will take its effect upon £100 of tithe composition. In the first place, there will be the reduction of three-tenths, and thus under the first battery of the noble lord, the £100 tithe composition is reduced to £70 at once. To what extent it will further be reduced by the expenses of three barristers at five guineas per day each, I cannot acquaint the House, but still a farther reduction may be made by reopening the composition. I have, however, reduced the £100 to £70. The forcible substitution of new corn averages will effect a further reduction of at least one-sixth, amounting upon the original £100 tithe composition to £11 10s., so that the £100 is melted down to £58 10s. This is the sum which the commissioners of Woods and Forests are to realize, but they are empowered to charge the clergyman 6d. in the pound for the expenses of the collection, which will be £1 9s., so that in the end the £100 tithe composition is reduced to £57 1s., independently of the expenses consequent upon opening the composition.

I now take the case of a living of the nominal value of £600 per annum. Deducting the three-tenths, the living of the nominal value of £600 will be reduced to £420; and, if my calculation is correct, a further reduction of one-sixth, or £70 must be the consequence of the new corn averages. This will further cut down the nominal living of £600 per annum to £350. From this a further demand of 6d. in the pound for the expenses of collection, amounting to £8 15s. will be made, again reducing the nominal living of £600 per annum to £341 5s. Is this all? Oh, no. The unhappy incumbent, who thus sees his £600 a-year dwindled down to £341 5s. is visited with another deduction from another quarter. He is subjected to a new demand of two and a half per cent. as an income tax, under the Church Temporalities' bill, which finally reduces the nominal living of £600 a-year, to the sum of £332 15s. Now, if the incumbent of such a living should, with a view to a future provision for his family, have insured his life, supposing he pays £40 a-year for that purpose, and £75 for a curate to assist him in the discharge of his duties to the flock intrusted to his pastoral care—supposing too, he has to pay an instalment for the glebe-house—I leave the House to judge of the condition of this man and his family, and of the mockery and cruel insult of taunting him with his superfluous wealth. The only doubt which can arise on this statement is, whether or not I have overrated the extent of the deduction which I have contended is to be made in respect of the new corn averages; but even if I am in error, I think I may fairly set against any miscalculation on that head, the expenses which will result from the proposed re-opening of the composition for tithes.

I have now shown the House, that by the ingenious process embodied in this bill, an ecclesiastical living will be reduced to little more than one-half its nominal amount, and I now proceed to consider the effect which this measure will have upon the revenues generally of the Irish Protestant Church. This consideration is most important, because, before a supposed surplus is applied, it is desirable to ascertain what is the actual revenue of the church. I have taken the pains to ascertain what is the real amount of the gross composition for clerical tithes in Ireland, payable to parochial incumbents. The noble lord opposite, (Lord Morpeth) in his calculation included the lay tithes, or, in other words, the tithes payable to lay impropriators, not with a view of producing error I admit; but I will not encumber the question by adverting on this occasion to lay tithes, which for the present purposes shall be excluded from consideration. I am now dealing only with church property, and the effects upon it which the machinery of this bill may in future produce. Tithes received by the bishops have also been included by the noble lord, when they ought to have been excluded from this calculation, for the bishops' tithes are provided for in the Church Temporalities' Bill. In the same way I shall omit from consideration the tithes due to deans and chapters, because those tithes are applied to the repairs of the cathedrals, unless they are held with benefices, and in the latter case they become subject to the operation of the present bill. From the best calculation I can make from a revision of the whole of the parishes from which returns have been made, the total amount of tithes payable to parochial clergy, excluding bishops, deans and chapters, and vicars choral, is £507,367. That is the whole amount of tithes payable to the parochial clergy of Ireland, and before it is thought of applying a presumed surplus to other than ecclesiastical purposes, it will be well to consider what will be the effect of the bill upon the revenues of the church. By a reduction of three-tenths, viz., £152,700 from £507,000, the amount will be brought down to £354,667. The expense of collection at the rate of sixpence in the pound, amounting to £8,872, is further to be deducted, which brings down the gross receipt of tithes by the clergy to £345,795. I am unable to estimate the extent of the further reduction which must result from the reopening of the compositions: but taking, as in the former calculations, one-sixth as the consequence of the new corn averages, that sixth, amounting to £57,632, will, by the ingenious process of exhaustion provided in this bill, produce this result—viz., that, instead of the amount of Irish parochial tithe being £507,367, its net amount will be only £288,163.

In this stage of my observations, it will be well for me to pause a moment for the purpose of comparing the amount to which I have thus practically reduced the Irish parochial tithe with the estimate of indefinite millions assumed by Dr. Doyle, or the more moderate calculation of the total of church property made by the hon. member for Middlesex, who, upon the closest approximation, stated the amount to be £3,200,000. Have I not been justified in lamenting the effect of such extraordinary exaggerations, and in earnestly entreating the House to be upon its guard against the force of early and erroneous impressions? To the sum of £288,163, the tithe revenue of the Irish clergy, it is only fair that I should add the amount received by them as ministers' money, and the value of the glebes. The noble lord (Lord John Russell) stated the value of the glebes to be about £65,000; but I believe their value is not overrated at £76,778, which, with £12,838, the amount of ministers' money, will make a total revenue derivable by the Irish clergy from every source, of only £377,779.

The total amount of future revenue being thus ascertained, I will now consider the present condition of the church in Ireland, and the amount requisite for its maintenance. In discussing this subject, the House has now the advantage, which it did not possess when it pledged itself to the resolution of appropriation, of the report which the commissioners have made in immediate reference to this point. I have done all I could to prevail upon the House to postpone that resolution until this report was furnished. The House had, however, pledged itself that there was a surplus before they had received the report showing the actual condition of the Irish church. It appears, from the report presented by the commissioners appointed by the present government, that there are in Ireland 1,385 benefices—of these 264 contain fewer than fifty Protestants. The House will perceive that a material distinction is to be drawn between benefices and parishes. Benefices may consist of one or many parishes, and of these it appears from the report that there are 2,405 in Ireland, though there are only 1,385 benefices. Now, as I have already stated, I wish to argue this question on the narrow grounds which his Majesty's government have themselves afforded me; I wish to discuss this measure on the principles assumed by the king's government itself, admitting, for the sake of argument, those principles to be correct, and that my own views are erroneous. I take this course solely for this reason, that I can afford to make the concession, and, having made it, I can show that the ministers are, on their own principles, and with their own admissions, bound to accede to my motion. Arguing from their own evidence, I can show that there is no surplus to distribute, and, according to their own principles, therefore, they are bound not to sanction any alienation of the revenues of the Irish Church. I will assume that, in the present state of the church in Ireland, and due regard being had to the special circumstances of that country, the church revenues ought to bear the whole charge of the establishment—not only the maintenance of the ministers, but the expence of building new places of worship, and every other expense connected with the performance of divine worship, according to the doctrines of the church. From the report it appears that there are 1,121 benefices in Ireland, in each of which there are more than fifty Protestants. Divide the amount of tithes amongst them, and the average of tithes appropriated to these benefices will amount to £256 per annum. But these unions of parishes are in many cases a great evil, and they ought to be severed. That principle has been recognised by Lord Plunkett, by Sir John Newport, and by all who have contended most strenuously for the improvement of the church. The unions were made partly on account of the abolition of agistment tithe, partly from want of places of worship, or residences for ministers; and the first claim, in case of a new distribution of church revenue, is on the part of those parishes in which a respectable congregation can be found, and which are now inconveniently and improvidently united to others. Taking then, the parishes instead of benefices, what appears in the report? The number of parishes in Ireland is stated to be 2,405, and of these 860 contain fewer than fifty Protestants. I consider the provisions of this bill, in respect to those 860 parishes in no other light than as a blow fatal to the Irish Church. But here, again, assuming that the noble lord is right, and that I am wrong—assuming that, in a parish where there are fewer than fifty Protestants, you are at liberty to deal with it as this bill doth deal with it—still, deducting 860 from 2,405, there are 1,545 separate parishes in Ireland, in each of which there is a greater number than fifty Protestants. Allotting to each of the parishes a separate minister, adopting the principles of this bill, that where there are fifty Protestants, there the spiritual services of a Protestant resident minister shall not be withdrawn, what is the provision you can make from tithes to each of those incumbents? On the average of this whole, it does not exceed £180 to each. But there are 961 benefices in Ireland with more than 100 Protestant members of the Established Church in each. The noble lord intimates that he was not aware of that. Be it so: but, then, who was it that entered into the resolution, pledging the House to the alienation of church property, even before his own report was presented? That report may convict hon. gentlemen on my side of the House of want of foresight in obstructing the inquiry, in preventing the ascertainment of a fact so important as that to which I have just referred, namely, that there are 961 benefices in Ireland, each with a Protestant population of more than 100 members; but it will convict hon. gentlemen opposite of deliberate error, if they persist in adhering to their resolution after that report has been placed in their possession. There are 961 benefices in Ireland, with more than 100 Protestant members of the Established Church in each. I proclaim that fact. There are 1,165 benefices in Ireland, with a church in each, and with two churches in some. There are 1,383 churches of the establishment existing at present in Ireland. Now, according to the principles of the noble lord, wherever there is a church in any parish in Ireland, there also there is to be a minister; and wherever there is a minister, the noble lord has declared himself ready to allot to that minister an independent stipend. Now, if the noble lord is prepared to allot £220 a-year for the maintenance of each church in Ireland, I will make bold to tell him, that, instead of having a surplus to dispose of, he will find that he will have a deficiency to supply. I will take the benefices of Ireland with the number of Protestants therein, varying of course in amount in each. I will discard from my calculation the parishes whose revenues the noble lord is prepared to confiscate to the amount of 860, but still, for whose spiritual instruction the noble lord intends to make some provision, reducing, therefore, to that extent (I believe nearly £30,000), the total amount of available revenue. For my present purpose I will assume that the principle of the noble lord is correct, and I will attempt to show, that upon that principle he ought not to refuse his acquiescence in my present requisition. There are 670 benefices in Ireland, with Protestants of the Established Church varying in number from fifty to 500. There are 209 benefices in Ireland, with Protestants of the Established Church varying in number from 500 to 1,000. There are 242 benefices in Ireland, containing more than 1,000 Protestants of the Established Church. I have thus divided the benefices in Ireland into three classes, varying with the extent of the protestant population. Now, I want no clerical sinecures in Ireland, I want no gross inequality, wholly disproportioned to actual duty, between the incomes of parochial clergy. But I do contend for such gradations in the amount of revenue as are justified by variations in the expenses of living, in the demands for charity, in the extent of duty for such gradations, as would hold out an encouragement to exertion on the part of those who are less amply provided for, and enable the Protestant minister to maintain his station in society. In populous places, like the cities of Dublin, Cork, and Belfast, there ought to be livings amply provided with means for the support of the Protestant ministers of the Established Church. If there are not such livings—if the minister of the Protestant Established Church is not enabled to maintain his independence and respectability of station as compared with his equals in life, then the House will, in my opinion, not only be degrading the man, but also inflicting irreparable injury upon the establishment itself.

Now, take the three classes of benefices to which I have referred—assume that you are at liberty to apportion the revenue of the spiritual Church, according to some rule, having reference to the extent of duty and the number of Protestant inhabitants—will any man propose a more moderate allowance than that of £200 a-year to the 670 benefices of the first class, £300 a-year to the 209 benefices of the second class, and £400 a-year to the 242 benefices of the third class? The demand on the revenues of the Irish Church for that extremely low and moderate scale of support would amount to £293,500, whereas the revenue derivable from tithes in Ireland is only £288,000, as I have already clearly proved. I trust that the House will observe that this calculation is made on the number of benefices, not of parishes. Besides this, I have made no provision for curates; and yet in all benefices where there is a Protestant population of more than 1,000 persons belonging to the Established Church, there must probably be one curate. On the other hand, it is true that I have not taken into account the glebe lands, but have considered only the revenue from tithe as available for the maintenance of the parochial clergy. But against the value of the glebe place the deductions to be made from tithe, on account of the charge for religious service in 860 suppressed parishes—on account of the reopening of compositions—on account of the necessary provision for curates—on account of the difference between any estimate of Irish revenues, and the actual net sum realized; and I do not believe that the revenue derivable from glebes will more than supply the deficit, or will, therefore, disturb my calculations. Again, if I take, as I am entitled to take, parishes instead of benefices, the average allotment to each minister must be materially reduced.

I may be asked why I have assumed £200 as the minimum in the scale of allowance to be made to parochial ministers? My answer is, not on any vague assumption of my own, but on the acts and recorded declarations of the authors and supporters of the present bill. The estimate is theirs, not mine. I may think £200 (as I do think it), a very insufficient provision—but I am arguing throughout on the principles of my opponents, and claiming their support of my proposal on those principles. The Church Temporalities' Bill assumes that £200 a-year is the lowest sum which ought to be paid as a stipend to any clergyman who has the care, not of a benefice, but of a parish. I find that opinion confirmed by all the authorities which I have been enabled to consult upon the subject. I find, first of all, that Lord Hatherton, then Mr. Littleton, Secretary for Ireland, entertained this opinion:—"I concur," said he, "in the opinion expressed by my right hon. friend, that £200 per annum is not too large a sum for the support of a clergyman of the Established Church. If the Protestant religion is to be maintained in Ireland at all, its ministers must be placed in the condition of gentlemen. From the representations which have been made to me, I believe that many clergymen of the Established Church in Ireland are, at the present moment, removed but in a short degree from the necessity of begging for their daily subsistence." Dr. Lushington, and there could be no higher authority, also said on the same occasion—"I fully recognise the principle that parliament may deal with any surplus of Church property which may exist after the necessities of the Church have been provided for; but the first and most sacred of our duties is to provide for the support of the ministers of the Church; and I apprehend that no man, who is not prepared to say that the Protestant establishment in Ireland ought to be levelled to the ground, will stand up in this House and say that

£200 per annum is too much for a Protestant minister to receive." I am now going to appeal to the authority of a Roman Catholic gentleman, Mr. Finn, the member for the county of Kilkenny. "It is evident," said he, "that a man to be a curate," and here I will observe, that I am now speaking, as Mr. Finn then was, of curates acting under the control of their rectors, and looking forward to future elevation in the Church as an inducement to perform their spiritual functions for a time for a very moderate compensation; I am speaking of the provision to be made for an independent minister, who ought to be placed, according to the noble lord, in every parish where there is a church, or where there is a population of fifty Protestants—Mr. Finn, I repeat, said—"It is evident that a man to be a curate must be as well educated as the rich diocesan, and, having been myself educated at Trinity College, I can speak to the fact. I have always said, that it was disgraceful that a clergyman should receive a salary of only £75. The Protestant curates, who do the duty of the superior clergy, are infamously paid, while the Roman Catholic curates are much better paid, and more comfortably provided for. It is well known, that, in the counties of Kilkenny and Carlow, the Roman Catholic peasantry have actually given relief to the Protestant curates, many of whom are placed in situations in which they are frequently obliged to do that which they would otherwise shrink from doing, but which they are compelled to do, in consequence of the miserable sums they receive for their services." Can you have more convincing evidence, more conclusive testimony than this, proceeding as it does from a Roman Catholic gentleman residing in Ireland, who tells you, that, because there is not a sufficient maintenance for the clergymen of the Established Church, such is the force of sympathy and generous compassion for their distresses, that the Roman Catholic peasantry themselves contribute to their relief, in order to avoid the scandal of a starving ministry, though professing another creed? With a view, then, of preventing the Protestant clergy of the Established Church of Ireland from being obliged to do what they would otherwise shrink from doing, and with a view of relieving the Roman Catholic peasantry from the necessity of contributing alms to the support of clergy in whose creed they do not believe—I cite the authority of Mr. Finn as conclusive evidence, that the House ought to provide, not a superfluous, but a decent and becoming maintenance for the ministers of the Established Church. The last authority which I shall cite is the most recent—it is the authority of the hon. and learned Attorney-general for Ireland—Mr. Perrin. Speaking of livings, of which the incumbents reside in England, drawing the amount of their tithes from their parishes, in Ireland, and allotting only £75 a-year to their curates, Mr. Perrin said, and in that assertion I fully agree with him, that this evil of non-residence must be redressed. Not one word have I said—not one word will I say—in vindication of that system. I would correct it, not only for the future, but also for the present. I would insist on the right of parliament to require from any clergyman who receives £700 a-year, or indeed any sum, from a parish as its incumbent, no matter what were the conditions on which he received the living, the immediate personal superintendence of the parish, and the immediate personal discharge of his spiritual duties. I do not contest the principle which the hon. and learned Attorney-general for Ireland thus laid down; on the contrary, I admit it most fully and unequivocally. But what said the hon. and learned gentleman?—"I am not one of those who would withdraw any thing from the incomes of the working clergy; on the contrary, I would seek to place those members of that body in a situation more becoming their sacred calling, by giving every actual incumbent not less than £200 or £250 per annum."

Now, have I have not proved, not upon vague reasonings, not upon general assumptions, but as I have said that I would, out of the admissions of the noble lord and his supporters, that the House ought to allot to ministers in benefices where there is a church, or where there is a congregation of more than fifty Protestants of the Established Church, at the very least, £200 or £250 a-year as the minimum of stipend? We hear the Scotch Church constantly spoken of. I have no objection to adopt its principle in this respect, for I find that inequality in the value of benefices prevails in Scotland. Though the Scotch Church is poorer than that of England and Ireland, yet the principle of the inequality of parochial stipends is admitted in it. I apprehend that the ministers of the church of Scotland residing in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and other populous towns, having greater expenses to meet than those ministers who reside in villages in more remote parts of the country, receive stipends, in many cases double and treble those allotted to the ministers of rural parishes. I believe that there are livings in the Church of Scotland, which produce to their incumbents not less than £800 or £1,000 a-year. In the case of the living of North Leith, papers have recently been laid on the table of the House, which prove that the average receipts of the minister for the last three years was £670 a-year. I understand, that in Edinburgh there are eighteen clergymen, each with an income varying from £500 to £600 a-year. In Greenock, the minister has above £800 a-year. In the country parishes, be it remembered that glebe-houses are provided for the residence of the ministers of the church of Scotland. In North Leith, the minister, in addition to his £670 a-year, has £60 a year allowed him in lieu of a house. In Scotland, these glebe-houses are kept in repair at the expense of the church. I say that in Ireland you ought to adopt a corresponding principle. I further say, that if you take £200 or £250 a-year as the minimum of stipend to be paid to the ministers of country parishes, with a population of fifty Protestant members of the Established Church, it is clear that you must, when you come to provide for a minister in a large town, like Dublin, Cork, and Belfast, place him in a condition above the privations, I might say the temptations, of poverty, if you expect him to exercise the legitimate influence of his station. You must fix his income on the principle which is adopted in the large towns of Scotland, and provide him with a maintenance becoming the station he has to occupy. If you adopt £200 or £250 a-year as the minimum of stipend, and determine to give a liberal salary to the ministers of the Established Church whom you place in the parishes of populous towns in Ireland, again I say, would the conclusion come upon you with resistless force, that, in carrying your intentions into effect, you would not have a surplus to dispose of, but a deficiency to supply.

I shall postpone the consideration of many points involved in this bill—for I am not discussing its principle, but endeavouring to show that the bill ought to be divided. I think that there is so much doubt respecting the possession of a surplus to appropriate, that the House ought not to assert a principle which, if asserted, would naturally lead the people of Ireland to entertain extravagant expectations which must be disappointed. Can any proposition be more clear than this—that the existence of the surplus should be clearly ascertained before that surplus is appropriated? Can the truth of it be denied, by the most eager advocates for the right of alienation in the event of a surplus? To them my present argument is addressed. I want to convince them that, assuming their principle to be a correct one, there is no pretence for its practical application in this case. How does the noble lord gain his surplus? By sequestrating the revenues of 860 parishes, which the noble lord facetiously calls the feeders of his reserve. I have been hitherto assuming that the noble lord has these 860 parishes to deal with. Their revenues constitute his reserve. But I will now show by what means, and at the expense of what injustice, this miserable reserve is procured. In many parts of the West of Ireland, there are parishes which do not contain fifty Protestant members of the Established Church, but which are united together in one benefice. In many of these united parishes there are more than 100.—ay, than 200 or 300, members of the Established Church. The parish church is frequently in the centre of the Union, within a tolerably convenient distance of each of the parishes, which, by their conjoint contributions, provide a salary for their minister, often not exceeding £200 or £300 a-year. The noble lord finds that in some of the parishes belonging to the Union, taken separately, there are not fifty members of the Established Church; and then proceeds on the principle that he can sequester the revenue of all the parishes composing the Union; because, though there are 200, or perhaps 300 members of the Established Church in the benefice, there are not fifty Protestants of the Established Church in each separate parish composing it. Now, I should rather have expected from the House a reprobation of the practice of forming parishes into Unions. I should rather have expected that our present object would be to sever unions, and to provide each parish with an independent minister. The noble lord, however, declares, that he will sequester the revenues of all these parishes, and render them one and all the feeders of his reserve. Now I will show by one or two instances the injustice of this system of sequestration. There is a union of three parishes, making the benefice of Collon, consisting of the parishes of Collon, Moss-town, and Dromyn. What, I ask, would be the practical effect of making the reserve fund feed on the Union of Collon? In that union there are 848 Protestants of the Established Church. In the parish of Collon there are 760 Protestants; in the parish of Mosstown, forty-eight; and in that of Dromyn, forty. Now, as this union consists of three parishes, and as two of those three parishes have fewer than fifty members of the Established Church, the noble lord proposes to sequester the proceeds of the two parishes, and leave the minister of Collon to enjoy himself in luxurious ease, on the untouched revenues of Collon, which has 760 members of the Established Church; but though Collon has 760 members of the Established Church, it so happens that Collon produces no income at all. Collon, I repeat, has no income. Mosstown has at present an income from tithe composition to the amount of £248 a-year, and Dromyn to the amount of £204 a-year. The nominal amount of the present tithe composition is £452 a-year. The noble lord's blow of thirty per cent will reduce that amount to £317 a-year, leaving the minister of Collon subject to the tax, imposed by the Church Temporalities' Bill, and with spiritual duties to perform to 848 Protestants resident within this union. Surely this would be deduction enough. "But no," says the noble lord, "I want feeders for my reserve fund. I will therefore take the revenues of the productive parishes, and leave the incumbent of Collon, with heavy duties, but no income." There are at least forty other instances of this kind. I will take another, in the south of Ireland, in the diocese of Ross. The union of Kilgarraffe consists of three parishes—the parish of Kilgarraffe, the parish of Dysart, and the parish of Island. The Church of the Union is in the parish of Kilgarraffe. There are two clergymen resident in the union. The average attendance at the Church is five hundred persons. It appears by the report, that the congregation is increasing. The amount of the income of this union, which contains 1,123 members of the Established Church, is by the tithe composition returns, £510 a-year. When this is reduced by the noble lord's plan by £153, the residue of £357 is the gross amount of the receipts of which two ministers of the Established Church are to be maintained in this union. The various other deductions will reduce it to £300. The noble lord proposes to separate from the union the two parishes of Dysart and Island, because Dysart contains only eight, and Island not more than forty-eight members of the Established Church. Now the income of Dysart is £36 a-year, and that of Island is £260 a-year. The noble lord, therefore, subtracts £295 from the present income, and leaves the residue, subject to various deductions, as a fit maintenance for the Protestant pastor of Kilgarraffe. I will take another instance from a country town—Dundalk. The benefice of Dundalk is the union of the parishes of Dundalk and Castletown. The members of the Established Church residing in that town amount to 1,447. Castletown contains only fourteen members of the Established Church, but it contributes £200 out of the £210 which forms the income of the reverend incumbent of the benefice. There being only fourteen members of the Established Church now resident in Castletown, the noble lord proposes to sequester the income of that parish, and to leave the minister of Dundalk, with a flock of more than 1,430 persons, and the proceeds of one single acre of glebe, which produces just £10 a-year. Such is the manner in which the noble lord realizes a surplus. Such is the manner in which he provides the "feeders" of his reserve fund.

I trust that I have now said enough to show that there are grounds for calling upon the House to pause before it proceeds further—to pause before it gives a pledge, which it must either redeem, to the inevitable injury of the Established Church in Ireland; or which, if unredeemed, would leave the House open to the imputation of having excited hopes of which it had reason to doubt the fulfilment. The bill professes to consult the true interests of the Established Church in Ireland. What are the true interests of that church? They do not consist in the allotment of £5 or £20 in this or that parish for the performance of spiritual duties on a particular exigency. No, in those interests, properly understood, are involved considerations political, moral, and religious, as important as any ever submitted to the superintendence of a Christian legislature. I admit, on the one hand, that the true interests of the Established Church are not promoted by the defence of sinecures, by the retention of pluralities, by the existence of gross inequalities in the revenues of its ministers. I admit that principle most fully, and I am prepared to enter immediately into the consideration of the means by which the Established Church, without reference to political ends, without regard to personal interests, looking only to the permanent support of the church itself, and the great objects for which it was instituted, can be best maintained. But neither, on the other hand, are the true interests of the Established Church consulted by relying on the extravagant zeal, or the superhuman virtues, of the ministers who discharge its functions. You cannot consult the true interests of the Established Church without allotting to its ministers, in cases where spiritual duties are to be performed, a decent and becoming maintenance. You exact from the minister of the Established Church great moral duties—you exact from him great intellectual acquirements—you exact from him an expensive course of education—you interdict him from all secular pursuits. You require from him the devotion of his whole time to his spiritual calling. You do not, indeed, compel him to resign the relations and the cares of domestic life. You want none of the influence which vows of celibacy confer. You tell him he may marry. You tell him that if he inculcates, by the practical force of example, those great principles which he is bound to enforce by his doctrines, he is not a worse member of society, he is not a less efficient member of the church. You tell him to confirm the claim of his station to the respect of his parishioners, by setting them an example in every relation of domestic life. If you require these qualifications from the minister of the Established Church; if you do not discourage him from forming connections which entail unavoidable expenses; if you tell him that marriage is honourable; if you encourage him to contract it; to call in aid of his spiritual authority the example and influence of his domestic virtues—then, according to every principle of justice, according to every principle of common sense, it is neither right nor decent to subject him to the dependence, the anxieties, the privations, the temptations of poverty. It is not right for his sake—it is not right for yours—it is not right for the sake of the Established Church—it is not right for the sake of the Roman Catholic population, over whom he is to exercise the influence, at least, of character and conduct, to exhibit the minister of the establishment in a degraded and humiliated condition. On the influence to be exercised by ministers of the Established Church over the Roman Catholic population, on the importance of placing those ministers in a state of comfort and independence, I can appeal to high authority. “I will ask,” said this high authority, “whether another important effect will not be produced by this measure?” The measure to which this high authority alluded, was one which proposed to place in every parish of Ireland a minister of the Church of England in the possession of a competent stipend: “I allude,” said he, “to the effect which it will produce on the Catholic population of Ireland, connected, as that population is, with the respectability of the Protestant Church in that country. If any improvement is to be effected in the condition of Ireland, it must be effected through the instrumentality of the church, through the residence of a parochial clergy. I consider the permanent residence of a parochial clergyman on his living to be most beneficial in its results. I speak not from any personal observation of my own, I speak on the authority of those who have long considered this question: and I can assure the House that the utility of having a Protestant minister permanently resident among his flock, even though he may not be the minister of religion to the majority of his parish, will be beyond all calculation. The Protestant clergyman will be to his parish a minister of peace, for he will, by his station and his constant residence, have constant opportunities of conciliating their good will, by sympathising in their cares and distresses, and by doing them a variety of good offices. If we strip the Protestant parochial clergy of all those causes of irritation which exist as to the exaction of tithes; if we relieve the establishment from the odium attached to it in consequence of the collection of vestry cess; if we are enabled to do this, and to place in every parish in Ireland men of independence as parochial priests, we shall establish a firm link of connection between the Protestant clergy and the Catholic population, which will be found most advantageous to the Established Church, and which will lead to the welfare and happiness of the people of Ireland.” Those were the opinions, I trust and believe they continue to be the opinions, of a great landed proprietor in Ireland, who now holds a conspicuous situation in the councils of the Crown. They were the opinions of the Marquess of Lansdowne, who thought that the interests of all classes of his Majesty’s subjects in Ireland, Protestant and Roman Catholic, would be promoted by spreading over the face of it a body of resident Protestant clergymen, and by securing to each and all of them a respectable stipend. I believe that those opinions are correct and just. I believe that if you consult the true interests of the establishment, which even by this bill, and by its authors, is admitted to have the first claims upon its own revenues, you will, after correcting every abuse, and redressing every grievance, apply its revenues in that mode which is best suited to promote its efficiency.

I regret that I have troubled the House at such length. I have tried to fulfil the promise which I gave the House at the commencement of my address. I have attempted to rely on the force of argument and of evidence. I have not borne in mind that the last time on which this question was discussed, it was selected as the arena on which a great political contest was to be decided. I have not brought to the present discussion any feelings of personal mortification or of disappointed ambition, connected with political defeat. I have not mixed up with it private interests or party motives. I have not attempted to gain strength by appeals to passion or to prejudice. I have not decried the religious creed of those who differ from me on the most important topics for human consideration. I have attempted to rest my case on the paramount and undoubted claim which the Established Church has upon the justice of parliament to protect her, at least, in the continued possession of her own property—so long as that property is not more than sufficient for her own legitimate wants. You may take one of three courses with regard to this question. You may assert the unquestioned right of the Established Church to her remaining property. You may profess your readiness to correct every abuse in that church, and to redress every grievance connected with the levy of tithe. Having done this, if you are satisfied that the revenues of the church are not more than sufficient for the legitimate purposes of an Established Church, of a church which you mean to maintain and defend as the Established Church—you have a perfect right—you, I mean, who contend most strenuously for the power of alienation in case of a surplus—you have a perfect right to resist alienation in the present case with such evidence and such information before you. You have the right to declare, that, having made a great deduction from the revenues of the church by the Temporalities' Bill—having thrown all the onus of supporting the church on the funds of the establishment—having relieved the Roman Catholic population from what they considered the obnoxious and odious payment of church cess—having released the public revenue from every claim for building new churches—having liberated the occupying tenant from direct contribution to funds paid to a clergy from whom he derives no spiritual consolation—having given to the landlords a bonus of three-tenths, or rather of five-tenths, when every deduction shall have been made—after doing all this—after making all these concessions—here you will take your stand and steadily insist on the application of the whole of what is left to the interests, the well-considered interests of the Established Church. This is one course. There is a second, pregnant indeed, with fatal consequences, a most rash, most unwise, most impolitic, but still an intelligible and consistent course. You may pronounce that the Roman Catholic religion ought to be established in Ireland. You may say—"We can struggle no longer against the force of events and of overpowering numbers; we will go the whole length which is demanded from us, and will establish the Roman Catholic religion on the ruins and at the expense of the Protestant Establishment in Ireland." There is a third course—the course recommended by the government—which is intermediate between the two others. It neither maintains manfully the principle of the Protestant Establishment, nor does it recognise openly the claims of the Roman Catholic Church to direct participation in ecclesiastical revenues. It professes, indeed, to maintain the church as at present established; but infuses a slow and certain poison, which will ensure its ultimate destruction. I say to his Majesty's ministers—"If you mean to maintain the Protestant Church in Ireland, openly avow the principle, and consistently act on it—if you feel satisfied that its revenues are not more than sufficient to provide for the decent maintenance of the ministers of the church, announce the fact, and the public mind will be set at rest on the subject. The course you are now taking towards the Church of Ireland is simulated protection, but real hostility. You are destroying the independence, the respectability, and the usefulness of the Protestant clergy, by making them mere stipendiaries of the government, and by holding them out to the people as intercepting the rights of the poor, and the blessings of education and knowledge, by the selfish retention of funds which are the property, not of the church, but of the community at large. You place them in a most invidious position, in the position most calculated to involve them in personal odium, most calculated to paralyze every exertion on their part to diffuse the just influence of the Protestant religion. You exhibit them not in the light of ministers of an Established Church, receiving an independent maintenance from revenues to which they have an unquestionable right, but in that of usurpers and intruders, every shilling of whose stipend is an encroachment upon the reserved fund.

Against this course, not less fatal in its ultimate results to the permanence and stability of the Established Church than one of more direct and avowed hostility, I enter my decided protest, and I call, not only on those who agree with me in general principles, but on those who demanded information as to the condition of the church, who required evidence as to the extent of its spiritual wants, the amount of its revenues, and the number of its members, to judge from that information, and to decide on that evidence. If they will do so, if they will efface erroneous impressions founded on misstatement and exaggeration—if they will refuse to be bound by resolutions, entered into in the absence of that information and that evidence of which they are now possessed, I have not a doubt that, in pursuance of their own principles, in conformity with their own recorded declarations and admissions, they must accede to the justice of the motion with which I shall now conclude. The right hon. baronet concluded by moving, “That it be an instruction to the committee to divide the bill into two bills.”

After a long discussion the debate was adjourned, the amendment being ultimately negatived by a majority of 37. The House went into committee pro forma, and resumed. Committee to sit again.

AUGUST 3, 1835.

The House went into Committee on the Tithes Committee (Ireland) Bill, and several clauses were agreed to.—On clause 50 being read, which provided for the remission of the million advanced to the Irish Clergy,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL was glad to have the means of refreshing the memory of the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Hume), by referring the hon. gentleman to a speech made in a former parliament, when there was a prospect of repayment of the sum proposed to be granted. The hon. member now said, “Enforce the law,” and blamed him as having set a bad example on that former occasion. [Mr Hume: You were the first to propose such a grant.] On what grounds did the hon. gentleman then refuse to acquiesce in the grant? Why because he thought that it was impossible it could be repaid, and yet the hon. member charged him with having set a bad example in remitting what could not be levied; whilst the hon. gentleman said, that it was clear that the money was lost to England, and that any attempt to recover it would only tend to bolster up the church in a contest against the people. At any rate he trusted the House would not follow the government in their mad career. That speech established the hon. member's fame as a prophet—his abilities as a logician were known and appreciated; but here the circumstances had vindicated what he foretold, when he refused to be a party to the grant of the million; and strange to say, the right hon. and learned member for the University of Dublin, and the hon. and learned member for Dublin, concurred with him in his prophecy; and why should the hon. gentleman then charge him with the blame of the fulfilling of his predictions? The hon. member asked also in his speech, whether it was just that the House should be driven into such a course by the imbecile folly of a government, who proposed first one thing and then another, whilst it was clear the landlords would not repay their part. They had not paid it at this time, and yet the hon. gentleman turned round on him, and accused him of having set a bad example. Why, he agreed that in regard to the clergy the money should be advanced, but he must confess that he was not at all sanguine of its repayment either by the landlord or the tenant, for he considered that, with respect to the question of Tithes in Ireland, it was impossible for any government to attempt to settle it, without including in the plan many details, open to objection when viewed abstractedly; and therefore, after he had had the experience of the measures proposed and adopted by previous governments, when he was at the head of the administration, he felt that it was impossible to recover any arrears of tithes that were due, at the point of the bayonet, and he therefore virtually proposed a remission of them. But his hon. friend had asked, Were defaulters and those who had submitted to the law, to be placed on the same footing?—and he had also said, that when the bill was brought in, a distinction between those classes of persons should have been established. If the man who had submitted to the law could be placed in a position contradistinguished from that of the man who had broken the law, he should be most anxious to follow such a plan; for the principle was just. But its practicability must be proved before the distinction could be drawn; and even if its practicability were made out, he should be inclined to doubt the policy of acting upon it, if the result should be, as he doubted not it would be, an expenditure of double the amount recovered in the attempt to recover it. On the other hand, there remained another great difficulty in the way—the making the landlord liable to the whole amount, and thus compelling him to pay, not only what it is but just possible he might recover from the occupier who was in possession when the grant was made—but also what he could not justly recover from those whose occupancy was subsequent to that period. Between those classes there should necessarily be a distinction drawn, and that he was afraid would be a very operose proceeding; but he admitted entirely the justice of the principle, and if any one would provide a machinery by which it could be carried into effect, he should be most willing to adopt it; but, as to the remission of this grant of the million, he said, once for all, that he was inclined to doubt the policy of drawing a distinction between the different parts of the kingdom; and to this effect, when he was in office he had intended to propose, on the principle which had been suggested by Lord Althorp, that the occupier of land in England should be relieved from the burthen of paying the church-rates, and, in lieu of it, that £250,000 or £300,000, should be paid from the public revenues of the country. He might be told, that Ireland would derive no benefit from such a measure, as it was not burthened with church-rates. That was perfectly true; but he nevertheless considered that when important arrangements of this nature were to be carried, they were not to be balked because it subjected another part of the kingdom to a portion of the price to be paid for its removal. If, then, peace were likely to be conferred on Ireland by the measure now before the House, he should not consider the remission of the million an insuperable object to it, although England must necessarily bear her portion of the loss; but his intention was to have connected three pecuniary benefits together—namely, an advance to the Church of Scotland, an advance from the public funds to relieve England from the church-cess; and to meet this on the part of Ireland, he should have proposed, as a bonus, to release that country altogether from her obligation in regard to the million. It certainly could be shown, that in taking this course the three parts of the kingdom would not receive each of them its proportionate share of benefit, but he considered them as one empire; and unless that were the principle by which the measures of the legislature were guided, the same objection would arise in respect to every proposition of relief, and to every attempt to abate the grievances which might exist in any one part of the kingdom. Under all circumstances, then, he could not accede to the proposition to negative the clause, for if this course were adopted the treasury must recover the money; the law gave no indemnity to the treasury, and as the proprietors of the land could not be applied to, the onus must therefore fall upon the clergy; the treasury would have no other remedy but to proceed against the clergy, and the clergy would necessarily say—we must apply to the occupying tenant; and thus the police and the military would be again put in requisition, and new distractions of the most injurious tendency must be created; he therefore could not consent to negative the clause. A great portion of the debate had been expended upon the principle of this bill, and the prospect of its being a final settlement of the question it involved. His experience lessened his hopes of this every day, and his expectations that a surplus would be obtained, had been completely annihilated, for an advance of £50,000 from the public revenue was required for the purposes to which a surplus was to have been appropriated; but he had been led, by the example of other members, to allude to the principle of the bill. As to the question immediately before the House—if government despaired of recovering these arrears, as the remission of them corresponded with what he had intended to propose, he should support the clause.

The committee divided on the clause, Ayes, 252; Noes, 25: majority, 227.

The remaining clauses were agreed to, and the House resumed.

ORANGE LODGES.

AUGUST 4, 1835.

Mr. Hume moved a series of resolutions condemnatory of the existence of Orange Lodges generally, and more particularly as regarded their connection with the army.

SIR ROBERT PEEL was most anxious to state very shortly to the House the view which he had taken of this question, because on Tuesday next he might perchance not have the opportunity of stating the conclusion to which he had come upon the question, previous to the speech made by the noble lord opposite, and to which conclusion, notwithstanding that speech, he was still inclined to adhere. He had understood the object of the special report of this committee had been confined to the matter of the existence of Orange Lodges in the army; and he thought it would have been better if the resolutions and debate had been confined to the military question alone. He thought it was premature, when further evidence was to be had, for the House to enter into resolutions, when the whole of the evidence taken, or to be taken by the committee, was not before it. His construction of the resolutions was very different from that put upon them by the noble lord. He thought the first six or seven resolutions referred to the institution of Orange Lodges generally, and their civil consequences, and the last three or four he understood to refer to Orange Lodges in connection with military discipline. He should be disposed in the first place, to urge the postponement of the general question, on the ground that the report was not complete, but, without any distinction, he must on other grounds protest against the House acquiescing in these resolutions. These resolutions consisted of a mere declaration of fact—without expressing any opinion—without stating any expectation—that a law would be brought in to check such practices; and yet they concluded with a declaration, that along with the evidence taken before the committee they should be laid before his Majesty. Now, this was a novel course for the House to pursue; he meant to come to resolutions of fact, and to lay them before his Majesty without any opinion of the House thereupon. What was the answer which the Crown could give in reply? The Crown could not pledge its acquiescence to the opinion of the House, for the House had expressed none. This, therefore, was an inexpedient and an ineffectual course, and he had expected that the noble lord would have had the moral courage to make a statement to that effect. If the noble lord meant to state that it was necessary to have an explanation of the constitution of Orange Lodges as a preliminary groundwork for other proceedings, that would alter the effect of the resolutions, and would diminish his objection to assenting to them. But in that case the resolutions should be nothing but explanatory. It was indifferent to him what course the House might be inclined to pursue, but still he must say that the course now adopted was novel, considering that there was not a sufficient statement of the premises on which it was founded. He hoped that the House, before it affirmed these resolutions, would be certain of the accuracy of the premises on which it was based. [Oh! Oh!] “If the hon. gentleman is tired,” said Sir Robert Peel, “who makes these interruptions, he may retire. He has no right to interrupt me in my address to the House. I have already said, that I will not take any advantage of a number of hon. members having left the House, under the impression that no division will take place to-night upon this motion. No man who knows any thing of my parliamentary conduct for many years now past, has a right to say, that I am likely to take any unfair advantage of my political opponents. I am not the man to take an unfair advantage of any accidental conduct on the part of my political opponents to ensure to myself a mere temporary triumph; and my consciousness of that fact induces me to say, that any man who is tired of my observations had better to retire, and leave our debates to proceed without interruption." The right hon. gentleman proceeded to state, that with respect to the connection and interference of the Orange Lodges with the military discipline of the army, he had no hesitation in condemning it in as strong language as any that had been used by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. The existence of such societies, as secret societies, must be unknown to the officers of the regiment in which they were formed; and, being unknown to them, must be subversive of all military discipline and subordination. It led, of necessity, to the formation of other societies of an opposite political character. Whether such societies were known under the denomination of Orange Lodges, or any other denomination, it was impossible to defend their existence. He had been prepared to take a course which he thought would have closed these proceedings without much difficulty. He had thought that the noble lord would have proposed that the evidence taken before the committee should be presented to the Crown; and that he would then have asked the Crown to institute an inquiry into the existence of Orange Lodges in the army. He thought that their existence at present was not sufficiently notorious. If any of the facts asserted in these resolutions were incorrect, the House of Commons must be responsible for that incorrectness. In his opinion, hon. members ought to examine the wording of these resolutions with great circumspection, in order to be certain that they were borne out by evidence in affirming them. For undoubtedly it lowered the character of the House of Commons to affirm resolutions without being master of the facts upon which they were grounded. He would call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the seventh resolution, which affirmed—"That it appears by the books of the Grand Lodge of Ireland, produced by its Deputy Grand Secretary before the Select Committee of this House, that the undermentioned warrants for constituting and holding Orange Lodges have been issued to non-commissioned officers and privates of the following regiments of cavalry and of infantry of the line, at home and abroad; to non-commissioned officers of the staff of several militia regiments; to members of other corps, and to the police." Then came proofs of the allegations in detail, extending to every regiment. The allegations as to the regiments were affirmed by proof, but there was no proof as to the existence of such Lodges among the police.

Mr. Hume (interrupting).—I stated facts, which it is impossible to contradict, respecting the formation of Orange Lodges among the Limerick police.

Sir Robert Peel: The hon. member has also made the same charges against "other corps," as, for instance, the Sappers and Miners.

Mr. Hume: Yes, and I proved it by reference to the evidence of Francis Kennedy.

Sir Robert Peel: The officer in command at Malta denies it in toto.

Mr. Hume: Let him deny it again, if he pleases. I produced the certificate and number of the lodge held at Malta, and the right hon. baronet, had he been in the House, might have seen it.

Sir Robert Peel: If you can establish that fact, I say at once I have no objection to agree to this resolution. But when, as is notorious, nine-tenths of the House which I am now addressing, have not examined the evidence taken before this committee, there is a great inconvenience in affirming such a resolution as that to which I have been adverting.

Mr. Hume: I copied out with my own hand the parts of the evidence which advert to this resolution; and, to prevent the possibility of any mistake, I cut out part of the evidence which is in print, and attached it to my resolutions.

Sir Robert Peel: When I am called upon to affirm facts which implicate thirty regiments, I should have certain and irrefragable evidence that such a formal resolution is not open to objection on account of its inaccuracy. Suppose, for instance, we had affirmed this resolution as to the colonies. It had been shown that evening, and fortunately in time, that the assertion of such a principle would have been incorrect. Had hon. gentlemen taken the trouble of considering that this was an inconvenience to which the House ought not to be exposed? The course which he would acquiesce in was this; he would vote for a general resolution descriptive of the constitution of the Orange Lodges—in a word, for that resolution which had formed the groundwork of the second resolution moved by the hon. gentleman, and which would answer every purpose contemplated by the hon. member for Middlesex. He should then be prepared to acquiesce in the motion, That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, praying that he would be graciously pleased to allow evidence which had been taken, to be laid before him. He should then have been prepared to acquiesce in a resolution that his Majesty be pleased to direct his Royal attention (that by-the-by was a new form of address) to the nature and extent of the formation of Orange Lodges in his Majesty's army.

Mr. Hume: That would be dictation to his Majesty.

Sir Robert Peel was aware that it was quite impossible that loyalty so sensitive as that of the hon. gentleman could easily be satisfied. In future, when he heard any reflection cast upon the hon. member for Middlesex, either for want of loyalty or for want of decorum, he should always be ready to state, that when he had proposed to ask the Crown to grant a certain species of inquiry, the hon. member had significantly shaken his head and cried out "No, no," and declared that such a course of proceeding would be dictating to his Majesty. He acquiesced in the motion of the hon. member calling for the number of the lodges in which these warrants had been registered, and must concur with him in asking how these warrants had reached registration. He should protest against any special reference to the conduct of the Duke of Cumberland, and yet he should not desire to exempt that illustrious duke from an inquiry instituted by the Crown. He thought that the objection of the noble lord was well founded, and that it was impossible to name any individual in these resolutions without implying some censure upon him. Now, to imply censure on persons who had not been heard in their defence, was clearly inconsistent with justice. At the same time, he would say, that the course pursued by the noble lord was also open to objection. The noble lord had proposed a short adjournment of the debate, as if to give the Duke of Cumberland an opportunity of vindicating himself from the charges brought against him. Now, if that proposition were founded on the ground that the House was not in a condition to decide on the course which it ought to pursue, he had no objection to make against it. He trusted that that was the ground on which the noble lord had put this question. He thought, however, that the mere proposal of giving the Duke of Cumberland an opportunity of going before the committee to vindicate himself, implied a degree of censure against that illustrious individual. He confessed that he was prepared for one of two courses—either to continue to the present committee the power of making the inquiries which they were now instituting, or to postpone it altogether. An hon. gentleman had said, that he had no objection to extend this inquiry to the examination of the existence of Orange Lodges in England, and he would make no objection to such a proceeding. He had heard with great satisfaction, the opinion, that the result of this examination would be to provide for the termination of all societies of this character. Such a conclusion would be most satisfactory. He, therefore, hoped that all persons of influence would exert themselves to counsel the abandonment of these institutions. He admitted that no good purpose would be served by Orange Societies, but he was not prepared to sanction a string of resolutions condemning them on imperfect evidence. He never recollected such a course as that of the hon. member for Middlesex, who supplied every thing from his own report which tended to support his resolutions. If there were Orange Lodges in the army, that was in his opinion ground for a special report. But to propose a regular string of resolutions, without one tittle of proof to confirm them, was a course not hitherto warranted by parliament. He was not ready, however, to oppose the question of adjournment. In conclusion, the right hon. baronet stated, that he would not acquiesce in any resolution which in the present state of things implied censure on any party whatever.

The debate was then adjourned.

CHURCH (IRELAND).

AUGUST 7, 1835.

The House having gone into Committee—Mr. Hume proposed that a clause should be inserted, with a view to the repayment of the million proposed by the Bill to be remitted to the Irish landlords.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the hon. gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Harvey), commenced his speech by declaring, that it was extremely painful to him to enter upon a second discussion of this subject, having so very recently addressed the House upon the same question. Notwithstanding this announcement the hon. gentlemen had entered at considerable length upon the subject, and at a considerable sacrifice of his private feelings, and, labouring under great personal suffering and pain, had addressed the House for nearly half an hour. Whether this suffering were real, or whether the hon. member's description of it might be taken as a specimen of that "rhetorical candour" he had spoken of in the latter part of his speech, he certainly might be allowed to have his doubts. With respect to the topics alluded to by the hon. member, he (Sir R. Peel) had certainly intended to have proposed, what the noble lord opposite had since intimated his intention of carrying into effect, namely, the remission of church cess in England. This would relieve the people of England from a payment amounting to about half a million, a substitute being provided to the amount of about £200,000 out of the general public funds. This proposition, however, did not originate either in himself or the present government, but in the noble lord, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer. In that intention of the noble lord he certainly concurred. The hon. member for Middlesex need not shake his head. He was not going to enter upon a discussion of the principle of church cess at present. Whilst, therefore, this relief was extended to Ireland, it should be recollected that when the church cess was remitted in England, Ireland should have to meet her share of the public burthen imposed in its stead. The hon. gentleman said, that the church cess of Ireland had been remitted two years ago. Very true; but then the people of England were not called upon to make any payment, or to take part in any payment, in its stead. England was not taxed for the Irish church cess; the English cow was not milked; but the cow resorted to on this occasion was the church of Ireland, the established church which made all the sacrifices. The substitute for the Irish church cess was entirely paid out of the ecclesiastical revenues of Ireland. The hon. member thought it would be unfair to allow the landlords a premium of 30 per cent. out of the tithes. Thirty per cent. might certainly appear a large bonus; his proposition was, to give 25 per cent. It was only a question of amount, for he thought there could be no difference of opinion as to the propriety of allowing some consideration to the landlords, for the new burthen which was about to be imposed upon them without their consent. He did not think the House could, with any fairness, call upon the landlords to pay the whole amount of the tithes payable on their land, a burthen which was not due from them, and then tell the landlords to remunerate themselves by getting the tithes from the occupiers as they could. Some remuneration, he thought, the House was bound to give the landlord, and, whatever it might be, it was only a question of degree. The hon. member for Southwark asked how hon. members could go back to their constituents, and justify their conduct in having opposed the motion which that hon. member had brought forward the other night on this subject. He (Sir R. Peel) thought they could go to their constituents with the best grace possible for having so done. The fact was, the hon. member had so blundered his motion that it would have been impossible for the hon. member himself to have carried it into effect if he had been allowed. The hon. member said, he would not trouble himself to propose any substitute for this clause, but that he would leave it out altogether. What would be the effect of that? Why, that the treasury would have been obliged to call upon the clergymen in Ireland for repayment of the sums advanced. The clergy would then be obliged to apply to the occupying tenants for payment of the arrears of tithe lawfully due to them, and, in default of succeeding, would be entitled to call upon government for assistance to recover those arrears; so that, after all, the treasury would have to make good the payment. How would the difficulty be aggravated also in cases where the occupying tenant, under whom the arrears fell due, was since dead! Considering all these difficulties, he for one, as an English member, was content to remit this million, in the hope of restoring peace to Ireland.

Mr. Tooke then proposed an amendment, which was negatived, and the clause agreed to. A discussion then ensued on certain clauses proposed by Mr. Bingham Baring:—

Sir Robert Peel thought, that the valuable part of the discussion was the admission of the right hon. gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He had understood the right hon. gentleman to admit, that he was ready to assent to the principle of clauses which would appropriate the revenue of every parish in Ireland, except the 860 particularly described in the bill, to purposes connected with the Established Church. The right hon. gentleman distinctly acknowledged that principle, because he talked of the fund to which the clauses referred as an unappropriated fund. He (Sir Robert Peel) apprehended that the people of England would make no objection to the principle of providing a fund for the education of the people of Ireland. There were some difficulties no doubt; but the principle being agreed upon, he did not believe that any objection would be made to a grant for the purposes of education. The proposition now made was, that they should provide a sum of £40,000 for education purposes—that an increase of the grant was required. The noble lord (Morpeth) in dealing with this subject, talked first of a reserve fund; but finding that he could create no such fund, he then came down, and asked for £50,000 to realize the expectation he had held out. He hoped his hon. friend would not precipitate a vote on the question, which certainly required a more mature consideration than it would then be in the power of the House to bestow upon it. To any distribution of Ireland into districts, he should decidedly object. At the same time, he should be sorry to give a direct negative to the proposition before the House.

The clauses were negatived, and the House resumed.

CORPORATION REFORM.

In the discussion arising out of the consideration of the Lord's amendments to the above bill,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL observed, that the noble lord (Lord John Russell) in the speech which he had just delivered, was pleased so far to compliment him, as to express some satisfaction at his being present for the purpose of taking a part in their deliberations on that occasion; and if that satisfaction was founded in the belief that he should aid in making a settlement of this question (so far as his humble powers might enable him so to do)—that he should aid that settlement, which was perfectly consistent with the honour, the dignity, and the independence of both Houses of Parliament—the noble lord did him but justice in attributing to him such motives. He did feel it to be his duty to be present at the discussion, because he did entertain a hope that there were elements for a satisfactory arrangement on this subject. He appeared there also for the purpose of resisting, in case it should be made—though he did not expect it would be made, and the tone of the noble lord's speech almost convinced him that it would not be made—he appeared there for the purpose, he repeated, of resisting, if it should have been made, any measure or resolution calculated in the slightest degree to interfere with the honour or independent character of the House of Lords as a branch of the legislature. In the maintenance of that independent action he believed the prosperity of this country and its good legislation to be intimately involved: and he also believed that any attempt to subvert the one would terminate in the speedy ruin of the other. He did not, however, hesitate to pay the House the willing compliment of believing that, notwithstanding the menaces and denunciations of the press, their superior judgment would prevail, and that a vast majority of them would refuse to be a party to any proceeding calculated to destroy, or which at least would afford a precedent for the ultimate destruction of, that happily mixed and temperate form of government under which the empire had so long flourished. Much of the noble lord's speech, he was bound to say, he had heard with great satisfaction: but he was bound also to say that there were some parts of it which he wished were omitted, because they interrupted what, but for them, would have been perfectly harmonious. There were some parts of the noble lord's speech, referring to the other House, which he considered hardly justifiable. He repeated, that he thought the language of the noble lord not justifiable, if it were only that the tone and temper which characterized the part of the noble lord's speech in which he alluded to the House of Lords were not in concurrence with the sentiments expressed in the remainder of it, and appeared to be the result of a departure from its general tenor. It was scarcely in his opinion necessary to allude so minutely to the proceedings of the House of Lords, or to throw upon the House of Lords the responsibility of expressions used by counsel at their bar. (Interruption.) He was stating his opinions, and he trusted not exaggerated opinions, upon the noble lord's speech, and he would not be deterred from so doing by any interruption with which gentlemen opposite might choose to meet him. It was his right, as a member of the House, when he concurred with the noble lord's sentiments, to express, in such terms as he chose to employ, that concurrence; and it was equally his right, when he differed from the noble lord, and whenever he thought proper to censure any part of any speech he might make, to claim and use a similar liberty. Freedom of speech was his privilege as a member of the House, and that privilege, considering it to be the key to freedom of discussion, he was determined to assert whenever he saw it in the most trivial degree assailed. He contended that when the House of Lords once determined to hear counsel at their bar—and let him remind the noble lord that one of the most powerful supporters of this bill, and one who once occupied the woolsack, was himself a party to the proceeding by which counsel were heard at the bar—he did not stop to consider whether it were a right or wrong course to hear counsel; but one of the most determined supporters of the bill was not only a party to the hearing of those counsel, but the person who selected them; but he contended that when the House of Lords had determined to hear counsel at its bar, it became an exceedingly difficult, if not impossible matter, to place any restrictions on what they might please to express. Nothing could be more dangerous or more unjust than to attempt to limit counsel in the choice of that course which they might think it right to take, or in the use of those expressions which they might consider it for the interest of their clients to employ. They might, if they pleased, have refused to hear counsel at all; but having once permitted them to appear at their bar, it was indisputable (and in this assertion he would be supported by every member of the profession) that no counsel would exercise the privilege of pleading if interruptions were permitted, or if it were allowed to the tribunal before whom he was suffered to plead, on accusations affecting judicial rights, to delineate the course which they should be bound to pursue. There had been, at former periods, bills before the House of Lords—bills, for instance, of pains and penalties—upon which counsel were heard, who indulged in observations distasteful to the majority of the House of Commons, but on those occasions no attempt was made to dictate to counsel what course they should adopt, or what language they should employ. He was not saying too much in asserting that such an attempt would have met with a signal resistance from some of the very party who now so vehemently exclaimed against the latitude allowed to counsel in the case of the measure under discussion. In his opinion, it is much better for tribunals on all occasions to protect that great principle, which after all was the mainspring of free discussion, and to permit to counsel charged with the defence of the interests of their clients, the free choice of their topics, and, at the same time, of the language in which those topics should be expressed. But let him entreat the noble lord, on the present occasion, to recollect, as against the language and course adopted by the counsel in the House of Lords, the fact—and it was a fact for which he could vouch—that out of deference to the wishes of the House of Commons many of the peers waived objections they entertained to the bill, their object in so doing being the preservation of those two great principles upon which the House of Commons set so much value—he meant those of popular control over the proceedings of councils and of annual elections. Let the noble lord recollect that those were considered by this House the main principles of the measure, and let the noble lord, at the same time, bear in mind that, notwithstanding any of the amendments introduced into it by the other House of Parliament, these still continued the most prominent features of the amended bill. It was hardly necessary, he conceived, for the noble lord to have made any apologies for the concessions which he was willing to make, when he bore in mind that these two great principles of popular control and annual election had been confirmed by the House of Lords. He thought, indeed, that the noble lord and the House of Commons should feel a stronger inclination to regard in a favourable light those amendments which had been made by the Lords, and from which they (the House of Commons) might, abstractedly speaking, be inclined to dissent, when they reflected that the House of Lords, habituated to take a different view of charters—yes, he repeated, habituated to take a different view of charters and vested rights, had relinquished those motives by which, under ordinary circumstances, they were actuated, from a desire to establish not only a good system of municipal government, but a system founded on such principles as they thought the House of Commons would be likely to approve. In estimating the amount of concession, he could never forget that it was an impossibility that both Houses should agree in every particular, and that it was nothing but intolerance and tyranny to deny to either the power of recording a sound and deliberate judgment on the measures which were submitted to its consideration. It was but acting in compliance with the true dictates of wisdom for each House to make such concessions as might be granted without the sacrifice of principle, and for both to join in following that course which might lead to the utmost mitigation of evil, and to the attainment of the greatest amount of good. If they could not effect that object, they must use their greatest possible efforts to accomplish it; but, above all, do not let them act on the presumptuous principle that they must be right, and all others wrong, which was the foundation of all intolerance. So much he had said as to the general principle of the amendments which were made by the House of Lords, and he would next pass to the speech of the noble lord. There was nothing, he was bound to admit, either in the tone or temper of the noble lord's speech, or in the propositions which he laid down, or in those which he meant afterwards to submit, which should prevent the House of Lords from carefully reconsidering the amendments which they had introduced into this measure. He meant to assert his own right of private judgment; but, whether he agreed to the amendments of the Lords or not, he should be ready and willing to consider them as the effect of decisions arrived at by a large majority of the other House of Parliament. He would then proceed to express his opinion as well as he could with respect to the more important proposals which the noble lord had submitted for their consideration. The first was with reference to the amendment which directed the selection of aldermen for life. He believed he should most effectually (if he could do any thing towards conciliation) promote the possibility of a perfectly honourable arrangement on this subject, by expressing clearly and decidedly his own opinions on this amendment. As he said before, he should with equal boldness express his concurrence in, or his objections to, the views which had been taken by the noble lord. On that principle, then, he did not hesitate to say, that he did not consider the introduction of aldermen for life an improvement to the bill. He felt bound further to say, that if that proposal were made in the House, strong as his objections were to many parts of the bill, he did not think he could have supported such an amendment. He did believe that the selection of a certain number of existing aldermen, by the existing councillors (existing, at least, in some cases), and constituting them by law a part of the new council, to the amount of one-fourth, would imply a distrust, without conveying any security; and it appeared to him that it would place those aldermen so selected for life in a permanent minority, and would countervail those advantages of character and station which would secure their return as members of the council, if placed upon a footing with the rest of the community; but which, under the proposed arrangement, would be more than counterbalanced, and even rendered completely nugatory by the fact, that these aldermen were forced into the corporate body without the consent of the community whose affairs they were to manage. It seemed to him also, that the placing for life those aldermen to be selected by the existing councils amongst the new bodies, was not in conformity with the general provisions of this measure. The noble lord did not propose to reject altogether the amendments made by the House of Lords, but that a certain number of the council should be elected for six years—an alteration which, as it coincided with the principle of the present amendment, and with that of the bill, would meet his approbation, and he thought it was one to which the House of Lords ought to agree. With respect to the town-clerks, the amendment respecting whom the noble lord seemed to consider of the greatest importance, he felt obliged to express his disagreement from the opinions expressed by the noble lord. The noble lord was obliged so far to admit the vested interest of the town-

clerks in their office as to grant them compensation for the loss of it. [Lord John Russell: The town-clerks were to receive compensation only in case of removal.] Yes, but was it not infinitely better to retain the individual who was able to perform the duties of the office, and to oblige him to fulfil those duties, rather than remove him for the purpose of making room for another to whom the same amount of salary would, in all probability, be paid, while the town-clerk who was deprived of his situation was granted a considerable sum in the shape of compensation? He might refer to the authority, not only of the noble lord, but to the unanimous authority of parliament, in confirmation of his opinion on this point. So lately as the year 1832, subsequently to the reform in parliament, when a measure of the most extensive reform in the corporations of Scotland was introduced, although many of the principles on which that measure was founded were more extensive than those of the present bill; yet probably from a provident knowledge of the Scotch, and the consequent conviction that they would infinitely prefer paying the existing clerk for performing the duties of his office, to giving him compensation for his removal from it and putting another in his place, who would be paid the same salary, parliament paid the just and merited compliment to the people of Scotland of expressly providing that it would be lawful for the town-clerk who held office at the time the bill came into operation, to continue to hold it ad vitam aut culpam. The third point in the noble lord's speech related to the nomination of the justices. He considered the amendment of the House of Lords in this particular part of the bill to be one attended with great advantages. As they sent the bill from the House of Commons these justices were proposed to be invested by the Crown with certain local jurisdiction, but that the candidates for the office should be selected and nominated by the town-council. It was argued that this practice was in conformity with the ancient and continued practice of corporations, by which the justices were always chosen and appointed; but those who took this view of the subject forgot that by the ancient practice the magistrates were really ex officio, for the charters which constituted the corporations were granted by the Crown, and under these charters they were enabled to act ex officio, the appointment conferring on them judicial functions. By this bill, however, as it passed the Commons, the council was empowered to present a certain number of individuals to the Crown, and to confine the Crown in its selection to the persons whom they had chosen. A most invidious task was thus imposed on the Crown of rejecting a certain number of those submitted for appointment. He thought, therefore, that the unrestricted choice which was now allowed to the Crown was preferable; for where responsibility existed at all, it was infinitely better that it should be undivided, than that it should be shared upon two separate parties. He must say, then, that it was a course which was more respectful to the Crown, and more likely to ensure a judicious selection of magistrates, that the choice should be perfectly free, and not restricted to a limited number nominated by the town-council. He considered it quite right that the management of, and control over, local affairs should be intrusted to those chosen by the inhabitants; but it did not necessarily follow that justice would be better administered by those who owed their appointment to the men on whose rights and property they were called upon to adjudicate. This power was, in his opinion, properly vested in the Crown, which was constitutionally and justly considered the fountain of all justice. With respect to the division of the towns into wards, he saw no objection to the proposal of the noble lord on this head, by which the King in Council was empowered to sanction the award of the revising barristers. He considered it desirable that in matters of this nature a power to amend or alter decisions made by revising barristers, who might be frequently young men of little practical knowledge on such subjects, should be granted to the King in Council. The noble lord proposed to adhere to the principle of qualification, though by what mode that principle should be carried into operation he intended to reserve until to-morrow. He apprehended that the qualification of £1,000 in large places, and £500 in small places for members of the council, would be agreed to. With respect to that qualification which was proposed, by making those only eligible to become members of the town-council who belonged to the one-sixth class of rate-payers, who paid the highest amount of rates, he thought it one to which, if it stood alone, great objection might fairly be taken. If these two qualifications, however, were joined, it might add considerably to the number of those who would be eligible to be elected to the town-council. If in addition to this change, a clause were introduced in conformity with the suggestion which he had formerly offered to the House that the candidates for the council should be required not to undergo an examination into their pecuniary affairs before the revising barristers (an ordeal which, sooner than submit to, they would, he believed, not wish to become councillors at all,) but to make a solemn affirmation instead of suffering an inquisition into their property—if these changes were made, he repeated, they would, he thought, be likely to answer the views of all parties. With respect to the tolls, the noble lord complained that a great act of injustice had been done to the House of Commons by the amendment introduced by the House of Lords. If any one had a right to complain of these alterations it was he, for the noble lord had read an extract from a speech of his which was very accurate, and which conveyed his opinions in at least as good language as he could express them, and the noble lord admitted that the principle of the appropriation of tolls was there clearly laid down, and should have been adopted. The House of Lords, however, were not of the same opinion; and he could conscientiously say that the change which they had effected in this part of the measure, he did not consider to have cast the slightest reflection upon him. He thought it wholly unnecessary to impute, as the noble lord had done, injustice to the House of Lords, because they had altered the preamble of the bill for reasons which they stated, and in conformity with their views on the subject. He really did not feel so extremely sensitive as to impute to the House of Lords an act of injustice to that House, and desire for spoliation, because they made alterations in that part of the bill which the noble lord had stated to be in perfect keeping with his expressed opinions. “I hope I may be allowed to say,” continued the right hon. baronet, “in perfect good humour, that I cannot help entertaining a slight suspicion that the comments of the noble lord on this part of the amendments introduced by the House of Lords were made by way of compromise with some of his more ardent supporters, and that he conceived that three or four hard words spoken against Sir Charles Wetherell, and the unjust preamble of the House of Lords, would reconcile these gentlemen to the adoption of the propositions which he laid down when they found the noble lord so exceedingly vigorous in his denunciation of the other House of Parliament.” With respect to the rights of freemen, the House of Lords, he found, took a different view from the majority of that House. He was perfectly willing to admit, as he had already said in the speech quoted by the noble lord, that in many instances he should not object to the resumption of property by the commonalty, taking especial care that every legal and vested interest should, in the most scrupulous degree, be protected. He quite agreed too with the noble lord, that after giving compensation to individual interests, or even by buying up the tolls if necessary, every member of a trading community should be placed upon a perfect equality in all commercial concerns. The noble lord proposed to alter the clause which confined the power of appointment to benefices under the control of the corporation to members of the Established Church. There he totally differed from the noble lord; and while he consented to the adoption of the principle that no distinction in point of religion should be made where any secular office was in question, or where civil rights, or rights of trading, or any thing in the nature of civil employment or emolument were concerned, yet when the qualifications of the ministers of the Church of England was the matter to be determined, if the right were to continue in corporations, it was only proper and just to reserve it to the members of the Church of England who belonged to that body; and he could not see the slightest reflection on the Dissenters in disqualifying them for deciding on the capabilities of a minister of the Established Church. A cry of want of toleration was raised against this principle; but really there ought to be toleration towards the Church of England as much as towards the Dissenters. The toleration of the noble lord was unilateral, and he ventured to say, that if certain chapels belonging to Presbyterians, Unitarians, or Independents, were endowed in this country, and that it was proposed that the choice of their ministers should be vested in him, it would be denounced as a proposition of the grossest intolerance, and it would be most justly and fairly charged against him that he had no right whatever to appoint ministers of whose qualifications he could not possibly be a competent judge. Such an amendment, when proposed by him in that House, even the hon. and learned member for Dublin assented to. The noble lord, too, who he believed took an active part in those discussions respecting the veto, must recollect those passages in Burke, in which he referred to the members of one Church deciding on the qualifications of the ministers of another, and of the control over the Greek bishops existing at Constantinople; and the general principle which he laid down was, that dissentients from that Church could not have the same interest in securing good ministers; that they had not the same means of judging of their requisite qualifications; but above all, that their appointments would never challenge the respect or win the affection of the great mass of the members of the Church over which such a power was exercised. He believed he had now referred to most of the important points in the noble lord's speech, and he should not have felt justified in taking up the time of the House on matters of detail, particularly when there would be in all probability a separate discussion on each amendment, if the noble lord had not taken a collective view of the whole of them; a course which he felt compelled to follow. He could not conclude without expressing an anxious hope that the perfect independence which they claimed for themselves would be willingly extended to others, and that all being at perfect liberty to consider these amendments, they might arrive at the desired conclusion, that in the present session of Parliament this question should be finally settled. He believed it to be the prevailing and unanimous wish of the country, wearied by political discussions and dissensions, that this measure should pass into a law. They might depend upon it, that in supporting the other branch of the legislature in its independent character, they would best preserve their own dignity. The points on which they were at variance were comparatively immaterial; the great principles of popular control and annual election were approved of by both branches of the legislature. After the bill having been sent down by the House of Lords, if this question were not now settled, it must be settled in the course of the next year; and he believed that the measure would prove the more satisfactory to the inhabitants of the whole kingdom if it were completed now, and thus prevent that excitement and those party differences in every town in which it was intended that a new municipal body should be established. There was an additional reason for the settlement of this question. There were clauses in the bill, which led many of the existing corporate bodies to believe that a serious encroachment on their rights would be attempted; and the consequence was that an opinion prevailed, which he considered to be one of great injustice to these bodies, that they would oppose every improvement as an ingression upon their rights and privileges. This impression, though unfortunate, was an additional reason why this question should be settled. Under these circumstances, his first wish on that occasion was, that they should uphold the perfect independence of the House of Lords with the same zeal as they would defend and protect their own privileges; and, if his second hope, that he might be somewhat instrumental in promoting an amicable settlement of this question, were realized, and if he should effect that object, he should certainly not regret his presence at their deliberations that night.

The House then proceeded to consider the amendments seriatim; several amendments proposed by Lord John Russell on the Lords' amendments were agreed to, and the House resumed.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1835.

Lord John Russell proposed to take £1000 as the qualification for town councillors in boroughs with four wards, and £500 in boroughs with less wards than four.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the principle of qualification having been conceded by the noble lord, he (Sir R. Peel) was clear as to this point, that the simplest test as to qualification that could be proposed would be by far the best. He did not think that the selection of one-sixth of the highest rate-payers was a good test. It certainly had the advantage of simplicity, but it was at the same time fraught with an infinity of disadvantages, that counterbalanced completely all the benefit derivable from its simple nature. In the jury bill, where a qualification was required, he had selected the simplest as the best test, and a man who occupied a house with fifteen windows was qualified to serve on juries. They could not have such a test here, but they should be guided by the same principle of simplicity in selecting one. The noble lord proposed only one test—namely, £1,000 in real or personal property for boroughs with four wards, and £500 for boroughs with a less number of wards. Now, he (Sir R. Peel) thought it would be a great advantage to give an alternative test. He repeated, he had no objection to abandon one-sixth of the highest rate-payers, as he regarded it as a bad one. He would propose, however, to superadd to the possession of property rating to a certain value or amount. He would propose, that in the first class of towns parties rated at £30 a-year, and in the second class of towns parties rated at £15 a-year, should be eligible as town-councillors. He could very well conceive the case of a man of respectability, of integrity, and consideration in one of those towns—a man possessing the confidence of his fellow-townsmen—occupying premises of a certain value and paying rates to a certain amount, and yet who might find it difficult to declare that he was worth £1,000. He could conceive the case of such a man, occupied in expensive but safe and lucrative speculations, as to whose wealth there could be no doubt amongst his fellow-townsmen, and yet who might have a scruple to declare that he was actually worth £1,000. Besides, there would arise this consideration—was it £1,000 free of all debts and incumbrances? Now he would meet cases of that kind by this alternative, test of rating. It was a thing easily ascertained, and about which there could be no doubt.

In consequence of a remark which had fallen from the hon. gentleman, (Mr. Ward) he felt called upon to restate what he had already stated yesterday—namely, that in what he said with regard to these amendments, he was only giving expression to his own opinions, and not expressing the opinions of others. To the opinions which he entertained before these amendments were made, he was still ready to adhere, but at the same time, he was prepared, as far as possible, to acquiesce in any amendments, besides those which he himself suggested, which would have the effect of leading to an amicable arrangement of the question. He proposed the qualification of rating not in lieu of the other, as seemed to be imagined by the line of argument which had been adopted, but concomitantly with the pecuniary qualification, and for the purpose of widening the sphere from which the town council was to be selected. Hon. members threatened a division. Well, then, were they to divide upon the qualification, or were they not? If a division were resolved upon, the sooner it was resorted to the better; but in his opinion, notwithstanding all the absurdity that had been attributed to the qualification, there would be still more in pressing a division which hon. gentlemen would go to with a trembling hope that they might prove unsuccessful.

In reply to Lord John Russell—

Sir Robert Peel said, that the proposition he made was, that the £1,000 qualification should have a concomitant one of a rating of £40, and that of £500, one of £20. He had since considered and inquired on the matter, and had been induced to take a lower rating, namely £30 and £15. Below this he was not prepared to go.

Mr. Roebuck proposed as an amendment that a rating of £10 should be the qualification in all cases.

Sir R. Peel said, that hon. members seemed to think that he had proposed his amendment with a view of restricting the constituency, when in fact his proposition of taking the rate as the qualification would enlarge it. He did not consider his proposition very unreasonable. Hon. members argued as if the House had been unanimous upon the subject. Now, when the bill was formerly before the House, he moved as an amendment that the qualification should be £40 and £20, and upon that occasion he divided the House, when the numbers for his amendment were 204, the number against it being 262. Yet, notwithstanding that, he voluntarily came forward, and proposed that it should be reduced to £20 and £15. He thought that a moderate proposition; considering that he had so large a minority as 204. As to the rating in provincial towns he apprehended that it was higher than was generally supposed. He had called for returns from the Portsea district, and he found that both there and in Portsmouth it was very large. He saw no evil which could result from the adoption of his proposition. Besides, as they had adopted the principle of qualification, it was desirable, as the noble lord opposite had stated, that they should also adopt such a scale of qualification as was likely to be adopted by the other House.

Clause M (after clause 63), which had been inserted by the Lords to provide that members of the Church only should appoint to vacant benefices, &c., in the gift of corporations, was then taken into consideration.

Sir Robert Peel wished that the advice as to conciliation, which had been urged by several hon. members, had been sooner followed; for motives were attributed in the strongest terms to the House of Lords, for the amendments which they had made, which were not, he was persuaded, justifiable. Even the hon. gentleman who spoke last said, that the amendments of the House of Lords cast an opprobrium on the Dissenters. Now he must declare, that he did not believe the House of Lords had the slightest intention of fixing or implying any opprobrium on the Dissenting body, by the introduction of the amendment which they had made. He, for one, would never consent to take any part, either directly or indirectly, which would frustrate the effects of that political and religious equality which had been established by the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts; but he must say, that the clause which prevented the members of one spiritual creed from appointing the ministers of another, did not, in his opinion, interfere in any way with the beneficial consequences of the abolition of such laws as the Test and Corporation Acts. If by act of parliament, the nomination of Unitarian or other Dissenting ministers were placed in the hands of members of the Church of England, such a legislative provision would be reprobated by all parties. It was no answer to that position to say that the parties who in such cases would be selected would in all probability be well qualified and proper persons. He was, at the same time, ready to admit, that the existing law did give Dissenters, who were members of the corporations, the right of taking a part in the appointment to the livings which were in the gift of those corporations. It was, however, clearly the principle of our law, before the passing of the Test and Corporation Acts, that the members of corporations should be members of the Church of England, although an annual bill of indemnity was agreed to for the purpose of relieving those who violated that law from being subjected to its penalties. In many cases in which there were numerous livings in the gift of corporations—such, for instance, as Bristol and Norwich, it was clear that the majority of the members of such corporations might be Unitarians or other Dissenters, and that the whole right of presentation would be vested in them. Now, he never could be persuaded that an arrangement by which such a state of things could be produced, would be satisfactory either to the possessors of the patronage themselves, or to the members of the Church of England who were more immediately affected by it. In limiting the right of presentation, therefore, to those members of the new corporations who were also members of the Church of England, he was convinced that the House of Lords had not intended any disrespect to Dissenters, and had not manifested the intolerant spirit which had been imputed to them. It should be remembered that there was a wide distinction between a civil trust and a spiritual trust. He could never admit that the House of Lords, in what they had done on this subject, had justly subjected themselves to the odium which was attempted to be cast upon them of wishing to affect the great principle which had been established by law of a perfect equality of civil rights. With regard to the proposition which had been made by the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it was one of very great importance; and he thought that it would be more satisfactory to all parties if the discussion on the clause under consideration were postponed until they saw the mode in which the right hon. gentleman meant to develop that proposition. At the same time, it was exceedingly desirable that the whole subject—the clause in the bill which it was proposed to omit, and the provision which it was proposed to introduce—should be taken into consideration at the same time; and he, therefore, thought that it was not advisable to dispose of the clause to-night, and to take the right hon. gentleman's proposition into consideration to-morrow. He confessed, too, that on a matter of such importance, introduced for the first time to the House, although he was not in a condition to state that he entertained any serious objections to it, he was still desirous of reserving to himself the power of deliberation, before he yielded to it his assent. He certainly was not prepared at the moment to give to the proposition the unqualified approbation which had been given to it by his hon. and learned friend. In the first place, he should have been glad if it could be found practicable to avoid an absolute compulsion by law on the corporations to dispose of their Church patronage. It might be, that in many cases they were by far the fittest persons to exercise it. He would rather wish to avoid compelling, by law, either corporations or individuals to sell property of that description. Whether, however, the right hon. gentleman's proposition would be preferable to leaving the nomination to livings in the hands of Dissenters, was a question on which he was not prepared at once to decide. Some of the corporations possessed very extensive Church patronage. The corporations of Bristol and Norwich, to which he had before alluded, had, he believed, no fewer than twenty-two livings in their gift. At so short a notice, he did not think the House ought to be called upon to deal with so considerable a property without due consideration. Many points must be considered. Within what time were the corporations expected to dispose of this property? If the legislature recognised it as the property of the corporations, they certainly ought not to compel the proprietors to dispose of it under circumstances which would not allow them to realize its value. The suggestion of the hon. member for Shaftesbury, that the property in question might be purchased by the Crown, and the nomination placed in the hands of the bishops, would, perhaps, be a better mode of dealing with the subject; but, at the same time, he readily admitted that it would not be wise to encumber the bill at present with such a proposition. He hoped, however, that his Majesty's government would not preclude themselves from considering the suggestion at a future opportunity. He trusted that the noble lord would postpone the further proceeding with the clause in question, until time had been afforded to take into consideration the proposition of the right hon. gentleman. He had been too much in public life not to know the value of four-and-twenty hours in deliberating on any great public subject.

Clause postponed. On the 96th clause being read, Lord John Russell moved the re-insertion of the words omitted by the House of Lords.

Sir Robert Peel thought, that the alteration made by the Lords in this part of the bill was a very great improvement, and he should cordially support the proposition of his learned friend (Sir W. Follett) for retaining that alteration. He thought the amendment of the Lords drew the proper distinction between political and judicial functions. He thought that the Lords in making that amendment had acted upon the principle recommended by the bill itself, which did not leave the recorder, or any other judicial officer, of any corporate city or town, to be popularly elected, but enabled the Crown to appoint, arbitrarily and at once, without reference to the town-council, or to the constituency of the town-council. It was hard that they could not discuss these subjects without having motives imputed to them. The hon. member for Liskeard was not justified in attributing to them interested motives, a new-fangled loyalty, or in fact any thing but a desire to improve the measures which were brought before them for their consideration. If the hon. gentleman's principle were correct, why did he not allow the council to appoint the Recorder, and other judicial functionaries; and if he were so satisfied that the people would always make a proper choice of magistrates, why did he not allow the people, who elected the council, to appoint the magistrates? Why did he leave any intermediate body at all? The right hon. gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, had said he was sure no one could breathe a suspicion against the justice and discretion of the new corporate bodies, as regarded the recommendation of fit and proper persons to sit as magistrates. Surely that observation came strangely from one who said that the new corporate bodies were not to be trusted with the distribution of Church patronage. Under all the circumstances, he regretted that the noble lord (Lord J. Russell) should seek to interfere with what he conceived to be the very judicious and very proper amendment of the Lords.

The House divided on Lord John Russell's motion: Ayes, 164; Noes, 69; majority 95. Several other amendments were agreed to, and the House resumed.

SEPTEMBER 2, 1835.

On Clause 47, which imposes a penalty of £50 on any person, not qualified, acting as mayor, alderman, or councillor; Lord John Russell proposed after the words, "not qualified," to add the words "or during his continuance in office."

SIR ROBERT PEEL observed, that it was fruitless to divide now upon the principle of qualification. The noble lord opposite, for the purpose of facilitating the settlement of the question, had stated what were the points he was disposed to concede. Of these the principle of a qualification was one. He had supported that principle, and he did not think he should raise himself in the opinion of any hon.

member, if he were now to get up in his place and say, that he did not think any qualification necessary. But when the noble lord consented to a qualification, he was bound to make it as good as possible. For his own part, it would quite have answered his purpose if the clause had stood in the form in which it was originally framed; but, when the Attorney-general inserted words which made it necessary for a person to have a qualification at the time of his election to office, it also became necessary to add the words, "or during his continuance in office." The clause was certainly better as it originally stood, but it would now be necessary to have the double amendment. He thought that the practical difficulties which would result from this amendment had been greatly exaggerated. A similar proviso was inserted in a great many local acts, and no advantage was taken of it. The chance of retaliation would, in his opinion, practically control vexatious proceedings in the first instance. Besides, this objection of vexatious proceedings being likely to be instituted, would only apply to those cases where the qualification was on account of property, and not on account of rating, and this would narrow the sphere of inconvenience considerably. It was now asserted, though little of this was heard last night, that the parties would be influenced by political excitement. Why, that was what he said last night when the question of the choice of magistrates by the council was discussed. He had said, "they will be acted upon by political feelings—they will be politicians." Now that was admitted, and if so, and a party should be influenced by political animosity to bring a vexatious action against another, it would be right to avoid the danger of occasional qualification, as the prevalence of the same feelings might influence persons to qualify for the occasion, with the intention of evading the penalties of the act. He thought that the penalties could not safely be diminished. There could be no doubt that a continuous qualification must be retained, if there was to be any qualification at all. He had no objection to confine the power of bringing these actions to the burgesses of the towns, and he should wish to diminish the time within which these actions were to be instituted. If the hon. and learned Attorney-general would give up his amendment, the object of the noble lord's amendment would be realized, but he did not see how that could otherwise be done.

Amendment agreed to.

Lord John Russell then proposed that the House should proceed to the consideration of the clause disqualifying members of the council not belonging to the Church of England from interfering with the patronage of livings in the gift of corporations. He believed the most convenient way would be to take Clause L in conjunction with Clause M, and to discuss the principle of both at the same time.

Sir Robert Peel thought it was necessary on occasions like the present to overlook minor difficulties, and although he saw undoubtedly great obstacles in the way of compelling sales of property of this nature, yet considering that the proposal of the right hon. gentleman would relieve them from the pressure of considerable difficulty on both sides in the way of a satisfactory settlement of the corporation question, he was content for the present to waive all such objections. The adoption of the right hon. gentleman's proposition had met with the willing consent of several of his hon. friends; and he was bound to say, that the transfer of this patronage to individuals, if it could have been effected with the entire consent of the corporations, would be a good thing for the church; because it would put an end to that sort of canvass which was unavoidable, where the members of a popular body had a voice in the nomination, and which was so peculiarly odious and objectionable in the case of spiritual preferment. Apart, therefore, from the consideration of the principle of property, and looking at the question abstractedly, he thought the nomination by individuals subject to individual responsibility would, on the whole, be an improvement; but believing that the proposition of the right hon. gentleman would tend to remove considerable difficulties in the way of an amicable arrangement with regard to this whole measure, he would not in the slightest degree oppose its adoption. He must, however, be allowed to insist, that the Lords in introducing this clause had no intention or design whatever of trenching upon the great principle of perfect civil equality between Dissenters and members of the Church of England. He did not wish to provoke any discussion on the subject; but when so much had been urged as to the establishment of "new distinctions," he begged leave to say that so late as 1833, a bill was introduced by his Majesty's present government, with respect to the Church of Ireland, wherein certain commissioners were appointed, and in the very first clause they were required to make oath as follows:—"I do hereby solemnly declare, and in the presence of God, testify and declare that I am a member of the United Church of England and Ireland as by law established. Witness my hand." That was in a bill introduced by the Whigs, but it was not his object to provoke discussion, and he, therefore, would make no further remarks on the clause, but give his assent to it.

This clause, with several others, was agreed to: and a committee appointed to draw up the reasons to be assigned why that House disapproved of some of the amendments which their Lordships had made on the bill. The conference between the two Houses took place on the 7th of September; and on the 8th instant, Parliament stood prorogued till Thursday, Feb. 4, 1836.

THE ADDRESS.

FEBRUARY 4, 1836.

The Speaker having read to the House a copy of His Majesty's Speech on the opening of Parliament, and Sir John Wrottesley having moved the Address,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL spoke as follows:—The speech which has been delivered from the throne this day naturally suggests, as preceding speeches have done, many considerations, which press for the decision or upon the attention of parliament, connected with the foreign and domestic policy of this country. I will reverse the order in which those great topics for our consideration were referred to in the speech of my hon. friend, the member for Staffordshire, who moved the address, and will briefly direct attention, in the first instance, to those parts of the royal speech which refer more immediately to the foreign policy of this country. I rejoice to hear that his Majesty entertains a confident hope of a continued maintenance of peace. I rejoice, also, to hear that his Majesty is enabled to congratulate himself on the continued maintenance of a good understanding with his powerful neighbour, the king of the French. I consider the maintenance of that good understanding to be essential to the best interests of both countries, and certainly a great security for the continued tranquillity of Europe. I hope, indeed, that all the countries of Europe are so deeply impressed with the importance, nay, the moral obligation of maintaining peace, unless war be necessary for the vindication of national honour, or the protection of some essential interest, that, even if the continued good understanding between England and France did not afford a strong guarantee for the continuance of peace, the breaking out of hostilities in Europe would be an event not likely soon to occur. I trust also that the increased commercial intercourse between this country and France will still confirm their common interest in maintaining the relations of peace and amity with each other. Another source of satisfaction to me—which, however, I derive not from the speech from the throne, but from intelligence I have lately received in common with the public—in the prospect of an amicable termination of the differences which have for some time existed between France and America. Both those countries ought to understand that the great parties, and indeed all intelligent persons in this country, who take a more enlightened view of what is really for the interest of the country, than superficial observers gave them credit for, are unanimous in wishing that the differences between them may be speedily and amicably terminated. I believe there is no party, and scarcely an individual in this country who would contemplate with any feeling but that of pain, the commencement of hostilities between France and America. I think there is no man—I speak thus generally, for it is my belief that the observation will apply almost universally—who does not think that any petty advantage which this country might derive from the commencement of hostilities between two such powerful parties would be dearly purchased by the hazard which would occur of a general war, and the common injury which the interests of industry, humanity, and morality, must thereby sustain. With respect to Spain—I do not quarrel with the terms in which that country is alluded to in the speech from the throne, or the address in answer to it, although I dissent from the policy which our government is pursuing towards Spain. I cannot concur with the hon. member for Sheffield in congratulating the House on the manner in which our interference in Spanish affairs has taken place—I, for my part, regret that his Majesty's subjects have been permitted to enter as parties into the conflict now going on in Spain. I do not perceive that such interference on our part has in any way had any tendency to diminish the shameful and disgusting practices (I care not by which party committed) which have cast a stain upon the national character of Spain. I perceive, however, that his Majesty's speech contains a reference to Spanish affairs, which I certainly did not expect. It contains a direct reference to the conduct of another government towards its own subjects. The speech undertakes to pronounce an opinion upon the prudence and caution of the course pursued by the government of the Queen of Spain. I am most certainly surprised to find such a paragraph introduced into a speech framed by the present government, because I recollect that when, so lately as 1830, reference was made by us to the course which had been pursued by the King of the Netherlands, a most severe censure was passed upon it. We were asked whether we had not enough to attend to in looking after our own affairs—and significant allusion was made to India and Ireland—without passing an opinion upon the conduct of a foreign government with respect to its own subjects, and we were forewarned—and it seems with good reason—that the precedent then established would hereafter be followed. The introduction of the words which I have alluded to, shows the character of the part which we are acting with respect to Spain; it shows that we are becoming daily more and more parties to the contest—parties not directly by the manifestation of open hostility; but it is a fact that, with respect to Spain, we have, without intending to incur the risk of war, departed from a principle which I thought was held sacred by hon. gentlemen opposite; namely the principle of non-intervention in the internal affairs of other nations. The cause of quarrel could never be taken into consideration upon the principle which I thought hon. members opposite were determined to support, and therefore, by lauding the conduct which the queen's government has pursued, they are establishing or confirming, if they please, the precedent of interference in the domestic affairs of other nations. Notwithstanding the confident assurances of the continuance of peace which are contained in the royal speech, there is, it appears, to be an increase in the Naval Estimates. I presume that the increase will be considerable, since mention is made of it in his Majesty's speech. It is not absolutely necessary that this should be so; but I presume, that if it were intended to make only what might be considered an ordinary increase in the estimates, no direct mention of the circumstance would be made in the speech from the Throne. Some of my friends near me think that this passage in the speech is intended as a reflection upon the government which preceded the present. We have little time to scrutinise documents of this description; but, from my own observation, I do not consider that the passage in question bears that imputation. When I and my hon. friends prepared the Navy Estimates last year, I have no hesitation in saying, that we considered it to be our duty to reduce them, as well as every other estimate, military and civil, to the lowest point consistently with the protection of the honour and the true interests of the country. I apprehend, however, that the reduced estimates which we framed, met the general assent. The hon. member for Middlesex, it is true, complained that the reduction had not been carried further; he proposed, I believe, a reduction of ten thousand men. My right hon. friend behind me doubted whether reduction had not already been carried further than was consistent with the true interests of the country; but I did not understand that the House generally entertained any doubt as to the propriety of the reductions proposed, and, therefore, I differ from those of my friends who think that the passage in the speech which refers to the proposed increase of the naval force can be meant to imply a reflection upon the government which preceded the present, that it neglected the naval honour; and I am glad to perceive that my impression is confirmed by the assent of the right hon. gentleman opposite. As there are so many other topics of urgent domestic interest adverted to in the speech, I shall postpone for the present all further reference to what it says respecting the foreign policy of the country, and shall proceed to offer a few remarks upon the principles which it is said are to govern its domestic administration. We are told that material changes, which are called, "better provisions," are to be effected in the departments of law, especially in the Court of Chancery. To the manner in which these changes are recommended I do not object. It implies no pledge, but leaves every one at liberty to act on his own views of the nature and extent of the proposed reform. Without, therefore, pledging myself to any future line of conduct, I will say that, if I should be compelled to come to the conclusion that it is important to make an alteration in the high and distinguished office of Lord Chancellor of England, by separating its judicial from its legislative functions, I shall come to that conclusion with great pain. It will, however, require a great deal to convince me that it is either right or expedient to divest so high a judicial officer of all his political functions, especially when it is well known that it is those functions which secure to the Lord Chancellor his pre-eminence as a judge. I thank the hon. member who seconded the address for the candour with which he had admitted that there had been a great failure in the appointment of commissioners to exercise the powers of the great seal. Indeed, that failure must be admitted by everybody who knew that the arrears in the Court of Chancery had mounted up to 800, from 200, during the period in which the commissioners had presided over that court. [Mr. Parker twice said a few words in explanation.] It may promote the convenience of the hon. member to interrupt me as I proceed, but it will promote the convenience of the House still more if the hon. member will not interrupt me again until I have concluded my speech. The salary of £10,000 a-year, allotted to the Lord Chancellor, had been given to the three commissioners, the hon. member has explained how they have divided the business to delay it, has he also inquired whether the commissioners have not divided that sum among them? Now, as they have increased the arrear of business ["No, no," from Mr. Parker]—as they have done no good whatsoever, according to the hon. member—[Mr. Parker had not used any such language.] Have they, I asked last year, and I repeat the question now, have the three commissioners, who have done no good, according to the hon. member, except it be a good to increase the number of arrears, have they divided among themselves the salary of the Lord Chancellor? For my part, I wish to see the important office of Lord Chancellor maintained upon its present footing, and the same high and independent confidence reposed in it by the bar that was reposed in it at present. It is not for me to inquire why the confidence of the Crown was not continued to Lord Brougham, the late holder of that high judicial office. It is enough for me to know that another arrangement was made. That arrangement continued almost up to the meeting of parliament, and was not altered until after the appearance of a pamphlet by Sir Edward Sugden. The appointments subsequently made might not stand in the relation of cause and effect to that pamphlet, but to the world it appears as if never pamphlet had been more efficient, for it seems to have conferred three offices, and to have created three peerages. His Majesty's Speech also refers to the measures which are to be introduced into parliament on several matters of important domestic interest. It refers to all of them, with one exception, in a manner which is not calculated to invite any opposition. With respect to the commutation of tithe in England and Wales, it suggests the propriety of taking it into immediate consideration. It lays down no principle on which the measure is to be founded—it calls for no declaration of opinion from the House as to the mode of dealing with it. I introduced into parliament last session a measure founded on the principle of voluntary commutation. The noble lord opposite dissented from the principle of that measure, and declared that no measure would be satisfactory which did not include a compulsory obligation to commute the tithes. In my opinion, it will be a matter of difficulty to reconcile the principle of compulsion with justice to the tithe-payer and to the tithe-owner. If the noble lord can reconcile that principle with the just claims of those two parties, I shall be ready to give to the noble lord's plan all due consideration, as I am convinced that the time is come when a permanent settlement of the tithe question must be made. I will pass over many of the points referred to in the speech, not wishing to excite a desultory conversation, which can lead to no results, upon matters which require, and must undergo before long, full discussion. I will only say, that whatever opinions I may entertain upon many of the measures which it is the intention of his Majesty's government to lay before Parliament, I have no objection to urge against the manner in which they have been mentioned in the speech from the throne. There is one point, however, a solitary exception, as I have before stated, to the rest of the speech on which I wish to say a few words, in order to guard myself, in future, from misrepresentation. On that point my suspicions are awakened, not only by the terms in which the subject is referred to in the speech, but also by the singular contrast which exists between these terms and the terms in which every other topic referred to in the speech is mentioned. Whatever difference of opinion may prevail on political questions on the two sides of that House, the evil effect of that difference can only be increased by members allowing themselves to become, through negligence, or, still, worse, through intention, parties to any deception on the public. The particular subject to which I referred, and to which I only refer, for the sake of guarding myself against misrepresentation, is the subject of the intended reform in the municipal corporations of Ireland. I do not wish to enter at large into that question at present, which would be an inconvenient time for such a discussion; and the time will speedily arrive when such a discussion must be entertained, and when the House must devote itself to its full consideration. I do not refer to this subject so much on account of its own merits, as on account of the pledge, which, unless I am much mistaken, the speech and the address both called upon us to give. The terms in which the reform of the Irish municipal corporations are referred to are briefly these:—"We assure your Majesty that being already in possession of the report of the commissioners appointed to inquire into the state of the municipal corporations in Ireland, we entertain a hope that it will be in our power to apply to any defects and evils which may have been shown to exist in those institutions a remedy founded upon the same principles as those of the acts which have already passed for England and Scotland." It appears to me, that if we consent to that passage in the address, we shall pledge ourselves to apply the same principles of municipal reform to Ireland as we have already done to England. I might hereafter say, that I did not put that construction upon the passage which I have read; but I am desirous not to be a party to any misconception upon the point. If it be meant that, by agreeing to these words, I shall give the pledge which I have described, I, on the truest grounds, object to being called upon to do so. I object to being called upon to give such a pledge, because (apart from the merits of the question) I think it unfair that I should be placed in that position at an hour's notice. I assume that it is intended to involve me in a pledge—that if I should assent to this part of the address without protesting or moving an amendment, hon. gentlemen opposite would say, hereafter, when I objected to their measure, "You are too late; you pledged yourself on the first day of the session to apply the same principles of municipal reform to Ireland as have already been applied to England and Scotland." I say that it is unfair and unjust to call upon me, at so short a notice, to pledge myself with respect to so important a matter. The calling upon me to give that pledge, supplies you with no advantage for the ultimate decision of the question, unless it is meant unfairly to entrap me, and thus fetter my future conduct. You should have contented yourself with a simple notice, that the subject was to be brought under consideration, and then we should have come to the discussion with the same advantages which you yourselves possess; but instead of that, a speech is delivered from the throne this day, upon which an address is afterwards founded, of whose points no person is cognizant but yourselves, and then you call upon us, without notice, and meeting in London now for the first time after the recess, to pledge ourselves to adopt a most important course of proceeding. I say that this is unjust, and inconsistent with the course which has been pursued upon all similar occasions during the last twenty or thirty years, by all governments and almost all oppositions. I maintain that, during the period I have stated, it has been an object to avoid calling upon an opposing party to give such a pledge as that now required; and the speech from the throne, and the address (which is the material point for us to consider) have been so framed, that although the intentions of government upon subjects of the utmost importance, and referring to measures of the first concern, have been clearly exhibited, the necessity of moving an amendment has been imposed upon the opposition. I think there is a great advantage in our being able to meet on the first day of the session without a division. So far was I from advising any preconcerted amendment upon the present occasion, that the advice I gave, as my friends know, was, that they should move no amendment on the first day of the session to the address to the throne from both Houses of Parliament, unless the necessity for doing so should be imposed upon them, contrary to usage. I declare sincerely, that to call upon the House to give a pledge upon this point, is contrary to the practice observed during the last twenty years. I do not undervalue the measure which is about to be proposed, but I assert that measures of at least equal importance, and with respect to which the most violent opposition was expected, have been referred to upon former occasions, and yet the address has been so framed as to dispense with the necessity of an amendment. When the measure for relieving Roman Catholics from civil disabilities was referred to in the King's Speech, in 1829, it was done in such a manner that the party who opposed that measure did not feel it necessary to propose an amendment. The right hon. baronet opposite (Sir J. Hobhouse) says that the government was not strong then—and I suppose he intended me to hear the observation; but whatever I may think of the correctness of his opinion upon that point, he surely will not deny that the government which brought forward the Reform Bill, after the dissolution of parliament in 1832, was strong enough to have been able to have carried an address, pledging their opponents to the principle of that measure; and yet they abstained from doing so. I say, therefore, that against the course now proposed to be adopted I have the experience of all past addresses during the last twenty or thirty years, which, though referring to important matters upon which the minds both of the ministers and their opponents were made up, exacting no pledge from any party. I further refer, as a proof of the injustice contemplated by that part of the address which I deprecate, to the remainder of the address itself. It touches upon other points, with respect to which no pledge is demanded—namely, tithes, alterations in the Court of Chancery, and the introduction of poor laws into Ireland. With respect to these topics the address confines itself to saying what I wish to be said upon the subject of Irish Corporations—that the House is prepared to give to any measures proposed by the government impartial consideration; upon the point of Corporations in Ireland alone does the address go further, and declares that such consideration only will be given provided that the measure proposed be founded upon the same principles as the acts which have already passed with reference to Corporations in England and Scotland. Looking upon the speech from the Throne as the speech of ministers, I, with great respect, protest against their right to prescribe to me what shall be the principle of the measure about to be introduced. “Leave that,” I will say, “to the fair consideration of parliament—state that it is your intention to introduce certain measures—state that you feel the necessity of applying a remedy to certain grievances—but state that you leave the consideration of that remedy to parliament.” Upon other points his Majesty is made to express his firm expectation that they will be so treated “as to increase the happiness and prosperity, by promoting the religion and morality of my people;” but the subject of municipal corporations in Ireland is specially excepted, and we are not only told that we must consider of a remedy, but the principle upon which that remedy shall be founded is prescribed. Again, I protest against the justice of this proceeding apart from the consideration of the merits of the question. Fair notice ought to have been given; and if it were intended to introduce this pledge into the address, we ought, at least, to have had the advantage of the practice which prevailed in former times, and been allowed twenty-four hours' consideration, and not twenty-four minutes, before we were called upon either to acquiesce in a declaration by which we should hereafter be bound, or to protest against it by moving an amendment. I can appeal to another authority in favour of the view which I take of this subject—namely, to the experience and good sense, and sense of justice of the gentleman selected as the mover of the address; for in the speech in which he recommended the adoption of the address, he distinctly told the House that he anticipated no objection to it, because it called for no pledge. If the hon. baronet's interpretation of the address be correct—if ministers adopt his honest suggestion on candid admission, they cannot object to clear up all doubt upon the point by acceding to a verbal alteration: for the last thing which I wish is, to be under the necessity of moving an amendment; but at the same time I am resolved that I will not incur the risk of exciting expectations which, in all probability, I shall feel myself called upon to disappoint, nor embarrass my future proceedings by unnecessary pledges. It may, perhaps, be said that there is a distinction between the question of Irish Corporations and the other matters referred to in the speech—such as the question of English tithes, reform of the Court of Chancery, and the introduction of poor laws into Ireland, because a measure has passed through the House of Commons with respect to the first, which is not the case with regard to the others. When the bill respecting Corporations in Ireland was introduced last year, I protested against being called upon to consider it at that time. I stated that at the time it was introduced I had no opportunity of reading the report of the commissioners. I read neither the report nor the bill, and I reserved to myself the right—whatever might be the decision of the House respecting the measure—of acting as I thought proper, with regard to it, if it should be again introduced during the present session. The distinction, however, which I am supposing might be attempted to be set up, on the ground that the bill for altering Irish corporations received the assent of the House of Commons, does not avail. What course has been taken with respect to the appropriation principle? That was a principle to which the majority of this House assented, and not only assented, but recorded their opinion that no settlement of the question of Irish tithes would be satisfactory, or conduce to the peace of Ireland, of which the principle determined on should not form an essential part; and yet in your address you have not called upon us, the minority, to assent to that principle. And wisely have you abstained from doing so. I am not referring to this omission by way of taunt. However firmly your own minds may be bent upon carrying that principle into effect, and however essential it may be deemed by a majority of this House, I think you have acted wisely in not provoking disunion on the first day of the session, by calling upon the minority to affirm it. If, however, you pursue this course with respect to the appropriation principle—if you feel that there is decorum in not calling upon us to acquiesce in that principle—why do you not act in the same way with reference to Corporations in Ireland? It may be said that the report of the commissioners has been presented; and so it has; but it is only ministers, or members immediately connected with government, who have cognizance of the address intended to be moved; and no person from reading the report of the commissioners could suppose that it was meant to call upon the House for the pledge contained in the address. At half-past two o'clock the speech from the Throne is delivered, in which parliament is called upon to consider the subject of Irish Corporations, and at four o'clock we are required to pledge ourselves to the precise principle of the measure intended to be introduced. I find that the commissioners themselves have, in their report, studiously avoided suggesting any principle upon which a measure should be founded. If the commissioners, after full deliberation, had suggested a comprehensive remedy for the evils complained of, I can conceive that there would have been some ground for calling upon us to acquiesce in their plan; but the commissioners conclude their report by expressly remarking, “We have not thought ourselves authorized to recommend specific measures of improvement in our reports, save so far as the notice of, and necessary observations upon, the defect and cause of evil, tend to suggest the remedy. But we feel it to be our duty humbly to represent to your Majesty, that the early and effectual correction of the existing evils, and the prevention of future mischief, are anxiously desired and essentially requisite; and that these benefits can be attained only by means of a general and complete reform of the constitution of the municipal corporations in Ireland.” If the commissioners, after the fullest consideration, abstained from suggesting any measure, is it consistent with justice that, at an hour’s notice, we should be called upon to pledge ourselves, not only to the application of some remedy, but even to the principles upon which the proposed remedy shall be founded? Another very important subject—namely, the introduction of poor-laws into Ireland—is referred to in the address; and let the House contrast that part of the address which relates to municipal reform in Ireland, with the phraseology in which poor-laws for Ireland are referred to, and you will find the variance so strong, the distinction of expression so remarkable, as to strike one forcibly on hearing it. If, with a knowledge of this difference of expression, I were to consent to the pledge now proposed, I may be told at a future day, when rising to oppose any details of a bill for the reform of the Irish municipal corporations, “You are too late—you committed yourself to the principle of the measure by acquiescing in the address, and you cannot now oppose it.” It would be added, “See what was said relative to Irish Corporations; a specific principle was pointed out; while in the case of poor-laws, parliament was simply invited to approach the subject with caution, proportionate to its importance and difficulty; but no particular measure was recommended." It would be said, that we had raised expectations with respect to Irish Municipal Reform which we could not fairly disappoint, and it would be urged that the same principle should be applied to Ireland as to England and Scotland. This argument would be strengthened by a reference to the manner in which poor-laws for Ireland are adverted to in the address. I am aware that various opinions have been entertained on that subject, and that the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer himself has hitherto, I believe, been opposed to their introduction. Why do I advert to this difference of opinion? Simply because the opposition which has been offered showed that, in the opinion of some gentlemen opposite, a principle esteemed good for England is not, as a matter of course, necessary for Ireland. The terms in which ministers speak of poor-laws for Ireland are cautious and measured, and simply suggested to parliament the propriety of looking to the experience of the effect already produced by the act for the amendment of the laws relating to the poor in England, but in no respect fetters our opinions, or seeks to tie us down to any fixed principles. The address proposes to thank his Majesty for the information that a further report of the commission of inquiry into the condition of the poorer classes in Ireland will speedily be laid before the House, and to assure his Majesty, that parliament will approach the subject with the caution due to its importance and difficulty, and impressed with a conviction, that the experience of the salutary effect already produced by the act for the amendment of the laws relating to the poor in England and Wales may, in many respects, assist our deliberations. Why may we not claim the humble privilege of being allowed to apply the same cautious deliberation to a subject of equal importance and difficulty? Why not treat the question of Irish municipal reform in the same manner as is here suggested in reference to Irish poor-laws? Your own address is evidence against the impolicy and injustice of prematurely pledging the House on one point while you abstain upon another. Do I propose that there should be no reform in Irish municipal corporations? Far from it. Am I prepared to defend the exact principle on which they exist and operate? I am not. But I wish not to enter upon the question upon this occasion, not doubting but full opportunity will be afforded for discussing it. I content myself with stating my objections to being pledged beforehand to a particular course. I am asked, and so is the House, to promise to apply to Ireland the same principles of municipal reform which have been already applied in England and Scotland. What are those principles which, without exception or reservation, we are called on to affirm? The destruction of self-election in corporations might be a principle; but can any thing be more difficult than to define its precise limits and operation? You say that the destruction of self-election is one of your principles; but I repeat it is hard to define those principles exactly, and where a latitude is allowed, gentlemen may be entrapped into pledges and concessions they never contemplated. In England the rate-payers at large, in Scotland the £10 householders, are the constituent body. If I assent to the address, and afterwards see reason to move, on the introduction of an Irish municipal reform bill, that in Ireland £50 householders should vote in the election of the corporate bodies, am I to be taken as adhering to, or departing from, the principles now referred to? If I assent to the address, reserving to myself the right and power to alter the details of the proposed bill as I please, am I not, in point of fact, encouraging delusion? I am prepared to give the important subject of municipal reform in Ireland full and fair consideration, but I reserve to myself the power of applying my mind unbiassed and unfettered to the question. I admit that there must be extensive alterations in the Irish municipal system, but I am not going to enter into the merits or details of the subject. I reserve to myself the right of considering the subject maturely in all its bearings, uninfluenced by fanciful and merely plausible analogies. I intend to look not at words but things. I will consider the bearings of this question on all the interests of the empire. It is not necessary for me to defend abuse—it is not necessary for me to maintain self-election—it is not necessary for me to attempt to vindicate exclusion from offices connected with the administration of justice—it is not necessary for me to contend for the misappropriation of funds, or to refuse to take effectual security against future misappropriation; but when I come to consider this question, I will look at the whole state of Ireland, and I will ask myself whether,

under the pretence of removing one exclusion, I shall not be confirming another. I will look to whom power will be given, and I will look to what objects the power so given will be directed. If I believe that power will be conferred in such a way as to conduce to the strengthening of the connexion between the two countries—if I believe that it will confirm those ancient settled institutions constituting the government, which my hon. friend, the member for Staffordshire, says he is determined to maintain, then I will consent to give it; but I will not be deceived by any plausible analogies, where no real ones exist—I will not be bound to apply the same principles with respect to municipal corporation reform in Ireland which have been applied in England, unless I am certain that they will be employed in the same manner and for the furtherance of similar ends. Having received no assurance that it is not intended to bind me by a pledge, and being most anxious to guard against any possible misconstruction—feeling, too, that the course now taken is contrary to that pursued in other parliamentary addresses, and inconsistent with parliamentary usages, I propose to move the omission of the objectionable words; substituting for them others which, so far from excluding a measure of municipal reform for Ireland, will leave the question open for every one of the most extreme opinions to approach as he may please. In taking this course I entertain a confident hope, although I find it necessary to propose an amendment, that there may be no division on the address, and I entertain that expectation because ministers may concur in my proposition without relinquishing a firm determination to bring forward their own principles, and enforce them in any measure which they might propose to the House. I will read the words of the address as it stands at present, and then propose an amendment. The clause to which I object is to the following effect.—to assure his Majesty, that being “already in possession of the report of the commission appointed to inquire into the state of the municipal corporations in Ireland, they entertain the hope that it will be in their power to apply to any defects and evils which may have been shown to exist in those institutions, a remedy founded upon the same principles as those of the acts which have already passed for England and Scotland.” I move that those words be omitted, for the purpose of inserting the following,—“to assure your majesty, that being already in possession of the report of the commission appointed to inquire into the state of the municipal corporations in Ireland, we will proceed without delay to the consideration of any defects or evils which may have been proved to exist in those institutions, for the purpose of applying such remedies as may obviate all just causes of complaint, and insure the impartial administration of justice.” I have purposely framed my amendment in a way which will render it possible for gentlemen opposite, though retaining their own opinions on the subject of Irish municipal reform, and determined, when the proper time comes to enforce their principles to the utmost of their ability, to adopt it, to avoid an appearance of disunion on the address by concurring in my proposition.

STATE OF AGRICULTURE.

FEBRUARY 7, 1836.

In the discussion arising out of Lord John Russell's motion, “That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the state of agriculture, and into the causes and extent of the distress which exists in some important branches thereof”—

SIR ROBERT PEEL wished sincerely that he could participate in the expectation entertained by some of his hon. friends as to the practical advantage to result from the appointment of the committee. He did not, however, entertain that expectation: his belief was, that when the committee sent in their report, probably at the close of the session, the result would prove to be not very different from that of 1833, namely, a strong opinion expressed by the committee, and as firm a conviction on the part of the House, that legislative interference would not afford the means of relief or prosperity to the agriculturists. At the same time he thought, whenever there was a strong and general feeling subsisting among a particular class admitted to be distressed, that an inquiry into their condition was desirable, and might be advantageous. He thought that, under such circumstances, those who doubted the utility of the investigation were nevertheless bound to consent to it, and thereby obtain the moral advantage to be gained by the inquiry, whatever might be the result. If he thought that the committee was appointed with a view to promote an alteration in the standard of value, and if he believed that the result would be to alter it, he for one would not consent to the proposition. He felt as deep an interest in the prosperity of agriculture as any man—his interest in the question was perhaps stronger than in another; but with this feeling he was assured that the true friend of the agriculturists was not he who flattered them with fallacious expectations, but the man who frankly stated what he believed to be the truth as to their condition and prospects. If the committee were about to undertake the task of ascertaining the effect produced upon agriculture by the alteration of the currency in 1819, or if it were appointed for the purpose of investigating the various causes of depression to which that interest had been exposed, it was about to enter upon a task which, pursued in the usual manner, would necessarily end in disappointment. If the committee even took evidence and inquired into various circumstances of agriculture, in widely different parts of the country, with a view of assigning to each particular depression its peculiar cause, it would engage in a task which could not be accomplished by any committee. To select particular cases of distress and depression from particular parts of the country would be fruitless, and would not prove satisfactory to the rest. At the same time he admitted, that if a committee were to be appointed, it was wise not to restrict its powers closely within the limits of a particular subject. But, so far as the interests of agriculture were concerned, he thought they would be best promoted by the committee addressing itself to practical remedies. Possibly some assistance might be derived from a reduction of the land-tax, a mode of relief not of late rendered available. If the committee addressed itself to practical subjects, it might obtain the means of administering, if not extensive relief, at least material alleviation, to the agriculturists. As to an inquiry into the causes of the depression of the price of agricultural produce, it could not be attended with any benefit, or produce any practical result. They found a depression of prices admitted; he hoped, if the committee thought it necessary to go into the cause of it, that they would not confine themselves merely to the alteration in the currency, but would also consider the effect of a cessation of war, of a return to peaceful habits and pursuits, and of improved and increased means of production. Cases ought not to be selected from particular portions of the country. If the committee were going to ascertain the real causes and condition of agricultural distress, they must not take the cases of a heavy soil, where the production of wheat was necessarily expensive, but they must look at the subject as a whole, and not merely look at the condition of agriculture, but at the other interests involved in, and connected with it. He could not help thinking that he saw, in the great prosperity of our trade and manufactures, a more encouraging prospect of an improved condition of agriculture than in any other definite cause. However, one thing appeared self-evident—it was clearly as much for the interest of agriculture as for that of commerce and manufacture that we should adhere to the present standard of value. He might here observe, that, in common with other gentlemen, he considered the condition of the labouring classes highly important; but he was surprised to hear the hon. member who preceded him state, that there was no improvement in their circumstances within the last few years. The result of the inquiry made in 1833 was, that though agriculture was not in such a state as could be wished, yet that there had been a material improvement in the condition of the labouring classes as compared with their state in former but recent periods. Gentlemen might entertain a different opinion, but he was only saying that the committee of 1833 had so reported. There was a universal impression on the part of the committee, that the state of the labouring classes was materially improved. [Mr. O'Connell: "In England?"] He meant in England. He agreed with the committee in this opinion—it was his sincere conviction that the condition of the labouring classes had improved; that they were earning at least an equal money amount of wages as at former periods, and that they possessed a greater command over those commodities which were essential to existence. That consideration afforded him consolation for the pain he felt at the complaints made (some of them not without justice) with respect to the alleged injurious effects of the currency bill of 1819. He believed in his conscience it was essential to the national security that the condition of the labouring classes in this country should be improved; and he believed that the first necessary step to that improvement consisted in the selection of some one permanent standard of value. Hardly, therefore, as the measure might bear on some persons, on the labouring classes it had operated favourably, and the paramount advantage of that circumstance in some degree countervailed the pain he experienced at the prejudice which the bill of 1819 might have caused to other classes. With respect to practical and local measures of relief, it might be worth while to consider whether there was not a possibility of diminishing, in some degree, the amount of payments required from united agricultural parishes, on account of the building of workhouses under the poor law amendment act. He thought the interest payable for the advances was greater than in other cases where public money was advanced. Here was a practical case, admitting an easy remedy. As the noble lord found that the security in those and other cases was equal, and that less interest was demanded on advances in other instances, he hoped the noble lord would consider the subject, and that the appointment of a committee would not preclude the government from affording practical relief; for it would be a disadvantage to the agricultural interest if the inquiry to be made into its condition should suspend any favourable intention that might have been entertained towards it. Believing as he did, that great benefit would result to the agricultural interest from the alteration in the poor-laws, and having done what he could to enforce the improvement in his own neighbourhood, he nevertheless thought, that we must take care not to overrate the future permanent reduction of expense, from the circumstance of the act coming into operation at a time when there was a greatly increased demand for agricultural labour on account of various improvements, including the extension of railroads and other public works. He was not going to say one word against the effect or operation of the poor-law amendment act; but he cautioned gentlemen not to expect an extensive and continued reduction of expenditure in future, arguing from what had already taken place, to which they ought to bear in mind that other causes had contributed. With respect to the strong language used by the hon. member for Birmingham, he felt unwilling to enter upon the subject—this was not the time to do so; but he should apprehend that the very precise, close, and practical reasoning of the hon. member that night, must suggest to the committee that the hon. member was one of the earliest witnesses to be examined before them. He hoped he might promise the hon. member that he should be examined more in detail upon the facts than on former occasions, and he trusted there would be none of what the hon. gentleman called, “tomfoolery;” but that he would receive every opportunity of showing that an alteration of the currency was the best cure for agricultural distress. When he recollected the prophecies he had heard from the hon. gentleman as to the impossibility of maintaining the present standard of value, and continuing to carry on our trade and manufactures in a degree at all proportionate to their ancient prosperity, and looked round him and saw the condition of those great interests, he now might be excused for doubting the hon. member’s present predictions. When he found that it was consistent with the hon. member’s proposed alteration of the currency, nay, a part of his plan, that extensive assistance should be granted by joint-stock banks to persons producing security for the advances he asked, why could not this method be resorted to at present? When the hon. gentleman admitted that our commerce and manufactures were prosperous, and that their prosperity co-existed with a gold standard, he could not understand why the same standard should be less favourable to another great interest, or why it could not also co-exist with agricultural prosperity. His firm belief was, that the permanent welfare and prosperity of this country, agricultural as well as commercial and manufacturing, were deeply involved in the maintenance of the present fixed monetary standard.

COMMUTATION OF TITHES (ENGLAND).

FEBRUARY 9, 1836.

Lord John Russell moved for leave to bring in “A Bill for the Commutation of Tithes in England and Wales.”

The question having been put—

SIR ROBERT PEELE stated that he did not rise for the purpose of urging any preliminary objection in point of form to the present proceeding, but he nevertheless thought it important that the law of Parliament should be distinctly defined and adhered to in the course to be pursued with respect to tithes; otherwise there would be a variety of conflicting authorities and precedents on the subject. The authority of Lord Althorp would be quoted for having introduced his Tithe Bill in a Committee of the whole House.

Lord John Russell: Lord Althorp took two courses: he first introduced his bill, as has been now done, and afterwards moved the House into committee, and introduced the bill again.

Sir Robert Peel was aware a mistake had been committed by the noble lord, who might therefore be appealed to as an authority on both sides, either for proceeding by bill or committee. Gentlemen might quote himself as an authority for proceeding last year by resolution in committee of the whole House, and that precedent might be met by the authority of the noble lord, who had proceeded at once by bringing in a bill. Thus, there had been four adverse precedents as to the manner of introducing the tithe subject within two years. It would be of advantage, for the purpose of preserving regularity and uniformity in their proceedings, to determine whether it was right to proceed by way of resolution in committee of the whole House, or by an original motion for leave to bring in a bill. He did not say this by way of objection on the present occasion, but because he thought it of importance that the law and practice of parliament should be settled, and because he considered it an advantage to the public, where a question of importance like the present was to be introduced, that the bill should originate in the usual form, in a committee of the whole House; for it was obviously of consequence that prejudices and doubts arising from ignorance of the details of a plan should be met immediately by explanations from the individual proposing it, and this could be most conveniently effected in committee. He apprehended that the noble lord had made considerable advances towards an agreement with him on the subject of tithes in some important respects. He did not urge that circumstance as an objection against the noble lord; so far from it, that he thought the noble lord perfectly right in admitting the force of objections which he found to be insuperable, and adopting another plan which he might hope to find more satisfactory than those which he had previously advocated. The noble lord felt the objections against the mode of estimating the real value, and taking the averages of seven years, as formerly proposed, and he also now felt the objection to Lord Althorp's plan for establishing a certain proportion between rent and tithe, things quite different in their nature, but in respect to which gentlemen had been deceived by an apparent but fallacious analogy. Tithe was a payment founded on the basis of actual produce, but rent was not; therefore the two charges were incommensurate; and this being the case, any attempt to establish a proportion between rent and tithe must necessarily end in failure and disappointment. The nominal rent of two farms might be the same, yet afford no criterion of the actual productive value of the land; for in one case a man might pay for farm buildings and superior personal accommodation, and in the other the amount of rent might depend on the superior fertility of the soil. He quite agreed with the noble lord, therefore, that it was proper to abandon the attempt to establish a proportion between rent and tithe. The noble lord had adopted the whole machinery proposed to be introduced into his (Sir R. Peel's) tithe bill of last session—he did not complain of the plagiarism, far from it; he wished sincerely that the noble lord had adopted the whole bill, and carried out its principle, as well as the machinery, in his own measure. Even now the noble lord seemed willing to admit of alterations in his bill, and rather to invite contributions and suggestions for perfecting it. Encouraged by the tone of the noble lord, he felt almost inclined, if he could find his own bill of last year, which had never been presented to the House, to ask leave to bring in a measure by which he proposed to effect a voluntary commutation of tithe. That was the principle of the bill of last session, and in the present measure the noble lord did not exclude it. He would not now enter upon the noble lord's plan of a minimum and maximum of rent-charge, ranging between sixty and seventy-five per cent. of the gross value of tithe, because he found it infinitely better to abstain from any attempt to decide the question, not on the sight of the noble lord's bill, but merely on the statement of its author. It would be better for every gentleman to reserve his opinion on the subject of the plan, till he had enjoyed an opportunity of examining the bill itself. The difference between the noble lord's proposition and his own consisted in the principle adopted, not in the machinery by which that principle was to be worked out. He (Sir R. Peel) proposed that a commission should be appointed, consisting of a superintending board, with functionaries acting under it; and whatever principle parliament might finally adopt as the basis of commutation—whether a compulsory principle, as now proposed, or one of a voluntary nature, as suggested last year—he doubted exceedingly whether, without the aid of such functionaries, the necessary local inquiries and arrangements could succeed, or a satisfactory settlement be obtained. He believed, however, that the noble lord had adopted the mode of proceeding, waiving the principle, proposed last year—the only mode, as it seemed to him, of acting with effect. That plan consisted, as he had said, in the establishment of a superior central board of commissioners, in correspondence with sub-commissioners, using their persuasions on the spot, in order to effect a settlement of tithe, affording information to those who required it, and assisting the parties interested with their advice. The difference between the principle of the measure now proposed by the noble lord, and that formerly explained to the House by himself, was simply this—that he had proposed, that for a certain period the parties interested in the payment and receipt of tithe should be invited by one of the travelling commissioners to meet him for the purpose of considering the question, and attempting to come to a voluntary agreement for a permanent commutation of tithe; while the noble lord, though he still proposed to allow for the operation of the voluntary principle a certain period—he had mentioned six months—at the expiration of that time introduced a compulsory commutation, and now stated the principle on which it was to be applied. It was true the noble lord did not seek to bind himself or the House exactly to the space of six months, though he had mentioned that period as the term to be allowed for voluntary commutation; but neither did he (Sir R. Peel) mean ultimately to exclude the compulsory principle, if he had found its adoption necessary. If a voluntary commutation had failed, it was still open to him to resort to a compulsory provision. Meanwhile, the advantage of this plan over that of the noble lord consisted in this—that, whereas the noble lord now proposed, without having any experience of the working of the principle of a voluntary commutation, to prescribe at once, in precise terms, the manner in which his principle of compulsory commutation should be exercised; he proposed not to adopt the compulsory provision till he had tried the voluntary plan. He thought it impossible for the noble lord at this moment to lay down any such principle precisely, with a well-founded assurance that it could be carried into effect; yet, if parliament were to prescribe principles upon which a commutation was to be effected, it was of importance that the country should understand that those principles would be strictly adhered to; but this, he repeated, was absolutely impossible in the present instance. The tithe payers and receivers would be utterly at a loss to understand how they were to proceed to a voluntary commutation, unless they felt assured that the principle now laid down would be firmly adhered to in all cases; but it was impossible to be certain of that, for the noble lord, though he talked of seventy-five per cent as a maximum, and sixty per cent as a minimum, said very plainly that he would not bind himself to that proportion. [Lord John Russell meant to adhere to a progressive scale between sixty and seventy-five per cent.] He confessed he did not think this a whit more satisfactory than the noble lord's original statement. Parliament would find it very difficult to determine with exactness what the proper proportion should be in all cases. He was glad to observe that great progress had been made towards voluntary commutation, on the principles of the plan which he proposed last session; and his firm conviction was, if the parties were once brought to an approximation, under the guidance of impartial persons able to answer every question of law, and inquiries as to the effect of the system adopted in other parishes, from the moderation and good sense of both receivers and payers of tithes, there would, no doubt, be evinced throughout the country the strongest inclination to adopt the voluntary system. If government only said, "We will exempt the instrument by which all this is to be ratified from any pecuniary charge, we will exonerate from stamp duty those who avail themselves of the opportunity thus afforded, but, that opportunity neglected, our indemnification will no longer be available," a sense of direct personal interest would greatly facilitate an immediate voluntary commutation. Considering the peculiar nature of tithes—considering not only the great variety of laws on the subject, but also the various circumstances affecting different parts of the country,—the variety of soil, the various ways in which different parishes were subject to that impost; some to rectorial, others to vicarial tithes, and some in which there were various recipients of tithes to different amounts, he could not help thinking this was precisely the case in which a voluntary agreement was most likely to succeed; and, so far as they could call in voluntary agreement as a substitute for law, no doubt a great advantage would be gained. If in future payers of tithes in any particular parish knew that the arrangement made had been come to by a voluntary agreement of both parties, under the superintendence of an impartial man, and that it had not been ratified till the superintending board in London had given their consent to it, he could not help thinking there would be a greater prospect of satisfaction with their award, than if a commissioner, according to the plan of the noble lord, in case voluntary commutation failed, should go down with his proposition of sixty or seventy-five per cent. The experience acquired by voluntary commutation would afford the best indication of what should be the best principle hereafter to be adopted. There might be some cases in which difficulties would present themselves to a voluntary commutation; but from an ample review of all those in which it had taken place, it would be easy to extract a much more satisfactory principle to regulate compulsory commutation, than could well be devised in total ignorance of the subject after only six months being allowed for voluntary commutation. The noble lord said, he wished every parish to be placed on the same footing, and that hereafter one should not be able to say it was placed on a different footing from its neighbours; but that would by no means be the case. One parish would have to pay only £60, while another, perhaps the immediately contiguous one, was paying £75 per cent, not with respect to the actual value of the tithes, but founded on the payments for the last seven years, and dependent in a great degree on the forbearance of the clergy. The object of the noble lord being to secure uniformity as far as possible, equality of payments, on account of tithe in every place where voluntary commutation was not effected, his own bill would defeat that intention, and present in parishes in immediate juxtaposition a different amount of payment on account of tithe. Whatever plan was to be adopted on this subject, which was so extremely complicated, would be best recommended by simplicity. There were many points connected with the noble lord's plan, which, he feared, had not been sufficiently explained to make it perfectly intelligible to the House; and probably it could not be well understood until the bill itself were present; but if, on seeing that bill, there should appear great practical difficulty in the way of the adoption of a compulsory principle, or if there should appear to the House good reason to believe, that the experience of an attempt at voluntary commutation would supply much most valuable information how the compulsory principle might be best applied, he hoped he might be permitted to bring in his bill, so that if, after proceeding a certain way, difficulties were found to present themselves in the noble lord's plan, the House, without reference to party distinctions, would not feel indisposed to make, this session, a fair experiment on the principle of voluntary commutation.

Leave given to bring in the bill.

CONSTABULARY OF IRELAND.

FEBRUARY 18, 1836.

Lord Morpeth having moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Acts relating to the Constabulary of Ireland:—

SIR ROBERT PEEL rose principally for the purpose of confirming, which he did with great satisfaction, the testimony which was borne by the noble lord (Russell) to the high character and great military reputation of Colonel Shaw Kennedy. His first communication with Colonel Shaw was at a time when he had no personal acquaintance with him whatever; although he knew that he was distinguished in the highest degree for his gallantry in the field, and remembered that he had superintended the whole of the extensive arrangements which it was necessary to make on the return of the British army of occupation from France. On that occasion, too, he recollected that Colonel Shaw had exhibited so nice a power of arrangement, and so ready a talent of combination, as greatly to add to the military reputation he had previously acquired. Aware of these high qualities, when the police force in the metropolis was constituted, the first person to whom he applied to undertake its direction and control was Colonel Shaw. The regret which he felt at Colonel Shaw's declining the appointment was greatly mitigated by the acceptance of the same office by the gallant officer, who now, in conjunction with Mr. Mayne, superintended the constabulary police force in the metropolis. It was, however, with the utmost satisfaction that he now heard from the noble lord that Colonel Shaw was likely to accept the command of the police force in Ireland. He would venture to say, that no man could be found who would execute all the duties of that important trust with greater impartiality, or with more complete freedom from all party feeling. He, however, would suggest, that when appointed to the head of the force, Colonel Shaw should have the appointment of all the officers employed under him, and for whose conduct he was responsible. He believed it to be of the highest importance that the police force in Ireland should be kept perfectly free from the influence of party animosity and party excitement. The appointment of police officers, therefore, was a trust which, if honestly administered, he thought had better be intrusted to the hands of the representative of the Crown than to any local authority. But he made that admission on the assumption that the trust was to be administered with perfect honesty. If it were otherwise—if the power conferred by the trust were perverted to other purposes, and were employed to gratify party animosities, or to confirm political advantages, then he should say the efficiency of the bill would be totally destroyed. He thought that the noble lord should adopt the same rule in Ireland as had already been adopted in the metropolis, and that those who were responsible for the good conduct of the men should have the appointment of them; and that the government ought in no case to interfere in the nomination of officers for the purpose of gratifying any of its political friends. If Colonel Shaw were to be appointed to the head of the force, let him have the nomination of the men; and if he (Sir R. Peel) knew any thing of that gallant officer, he would undertake to say, that he would exercise the power thus confided to him with honesty and discretion, and that, in a much less time than could otherwise be hoped for, a well-disciplined and efficient police force would be established in Ireland. And he felt bound to say, with great deference to the opinions of his hon. friend, who had taken a different view of the subject, that he thought if the police force in Ireland were appointed and directed upon this principle, there would be a much stronger guarantee for its sufficiency, and freedom from all local and party prejudices, than could possibly be the case if the appointment of the men of whom it was to be composed were intrusted to the local authorities. Therefore, he was not unfriendly to the principle of the present bill, always assuming that the powers to be intrusted to the Lord-lieutenant should be exercised with impartiality, and for no other purpose than that of improving the police force. But the principle of the bill, good as it was, was of more extensive application than to the mere improvement of the police force. Suppose he (Sir Robert Peel) had been asked, upon the first day of the present session, to agree to an address to the Crown, pledging him to apply precisely the same principles to the administration of justice, or to the formation of a constabulary force in Ireland, as were known to exist in England—supposing that he had said, “Do not ask me on the first day of the session to give such a pledge; there may be peculiarities in the state of society in Ireland which call for the application of a different system, and which may render it right or necessary to place the whole power of the police in the hands of his Majesty's government. As a general principle, it may be right not to transfer such a power from the hands of local authorities to those of the King's Secretary of State; but there may be such peculiarities in the state of Ireland, in the state of the population, in the state of property; above all, in the unfortunate state of religious animosities, which make it better to trust the representative of the Crown, than to allow the power to remain in the hands of the local authorities, however respectable.” Suppose, having such an argument in his mind, he had said he would not give the pledge required of him—suppose, although most anxious to administer justice in Ireland on the same principles of impartiality as in England, he had said, that he doubted whether he should effect that object by pledging himself to apply precisely the same principles to a totally different state of things—suppose he had said, with the hon. and learned member for Dublin, “Beware of local animosities and jealousies—beware of village partialities—do not trust local authorities—do not trust irresponsible bodies. Place these appointments in the hands of the Lord-lieutenant of Ireland. If he abuse them, he is more tangible than any local authority.” He admitted the justice of the principle on which the bill proceeded; but if that principle were good for the police of the country, why was it not equally good for the police of the town? And why, because it might be fitting to intrust the appointment of the municipal police to the corporate authorities in England, why might it not follow, or why might they not choose to subscribe at once to the inference, that therefore it should be good to place the same power in the same local and irresponsible bodies in Ireland? He found, therefore, in the speech of the noble lord, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and also in that of the hon. and learned member for Dublin, a complete vindication of the justice of the course which he had pursued in the first night of the present session, and in which he was joined by a powerful minority of the House. The amendment he then moved to the address was founded on this principle, that whilst he was prepared to concede to Ireland the absolute right of having impartiality in the administration of justice secured to her, yet he desired that he might not be fettered by a pledge that he would apply the same principles which had been adopted here to another part of the empire, whose society was differently constituted, and whose circumstances were by no means the same.

Leave given to bring in the bill.

COMMUTATION OF TITHES (ENGLAND.)

FEBRUARY 22, 1836.

In the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the House were to consider whether there had been such a prima facie case made out in favour of the principle of the bill as would warrant them in permitting it to be read a second time. Its leading principle was, that in certain circumstances compulsion might be admitted. To that he did not object, provided it was arranged upon principles perfectly just and equitable towards both the landowner and the tenant. In the course of the bill's progress through the committee, the hon. gentleman opposite would have the power of fulfilling the declaration he had made, and of moving an amendment to the effect that one-tenth of the gross produce should in every case be taken from the occupying tenant, since it appeared that nothing less would satisfy him—that no deduction from the amount of the sum which in strictness of law the occupying tenant should pay, would satisfy him. The hon. gentleman also proposed that a portion should be set apart for public purposes; but, even with that appropriation, he doubted whether the measure would give satisfaction to the occupying tenant. He had listened to the lucid speech of his Majesty's solicitor-general, but he could not say that the argument it contained was so conclusive to his mind as to induce him to join in the unqualified panegyric passed on the bill by the hon. gentleman. He would, however, give his consent to the second reading of the bill; when it reached the committee, he should facilitate, by any suggestions which occurred to him, the passing of the bill, upon principles which should appear to him fair and reasonable. The argument of the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Harvey) was fatal to any attempt at a commutation of tithes upon any principle whatever, and he must say he never heard reflections more unjust than those thrown out by the hon. member against the landowners who had seats in that House, merely because they were willing to consider the subject freely, with a view to attempt a satisfactory settlement of this intricate question. As to whether 75 or 60 per cent. were a proper sum to adopt as a maximum or minimum, he would give no opinion whatever, and, should he see grounds for coming to a different conclusion, it would be perfectly competent for him to propose the adoption of any other sum in committee. The hon. and learned member opposite (the solicitor-general) had stated that the bill included the two principles of voluntary agreement and compulsion, and seemed surprised that any objection should be taken against a measure which combined both. Now, there might be cases in which voluntary agreement might be proper, and cases in which compulsory agreement might be proper; but it did not follow that a bill which united both should receive unqualified assent. The hon. gentleman said, that the bill which he had formerly proposed must fail upon this account—that the prospect of voluntary settlement held out by it was so vague, that it must necessarily prevent the question from being speedily set at rest. Now, he had said nothing whatever against the ultimate adoption of the principle of compulsion; but what he did say was this,—he thought when they came to apply that principle, the experience they would have then gained, by the previous attempts to effect a voluntary agreement, would suggest better principles of compulsion than they could at first lay down. He believed, the peculiarities of various parishes, with respect to tithe, to be so great, that it was difficult to prescribe in what cases the principle of compulsion could be with advantage applied; but expecting, as he had expected, that there would be many cases of voluntary agreement under the bill which he had introduced, if he did not define at first the principle of compulsion to which he meant to have recourse, it was because he thought that they might afterwards discover those principles which would be most consistent with equity, and most suit the infinite variety of complicated cases they would have to consider. The noble lord said, that this bill first allowed a voluntary agreement, at the option of the parties interested, and then, in the event of that being rejected, made the commutation compulsory. Now, could the noble lord show him any case in which there could be a voluntary agreement under this bill? The compulsory principle was to come into operation at the end of six months. Certainly this arrangement would favour one of the two parties, the tithe-owner or the tithe-payer. Why should either seek to come to a voluntary agreement when he knew that in six months another principle would be enforced which would be attended with results much more profitable to him? How very improbable, then, that the voluntary principle would be adopted in precisely the same terms as those laid down by the bill. If a compulsory settlement were effected, one party would be benefited at the expense of the other; how, then, could they be expected to consent to a voluntary settlement? So far from the compulsory principle being likely to lead to a satisfactory adjustment, if the principle to be eventually applied were uncertain, that very uncertainty would be much more likely to lead to a voluntary adjustment in the mean time. The next proposal which the bill made was, that there should be parochial agreements, and that the consent of a certain proportion of the tithe-holders should bind the rest. In his opinion this was the best part of the bill. That failing, the main principle of the bill, that of compulsion, was next to be applied. This part of the bill, though far the most important one, he did not exactly understand. He thought the object of the noble lord had been to provide some principle by which, ultimately, the payment of tithe would be abolished. But that object it was impossible the present measure should effect. The bill did not, strictly speaking, apply compulsion. After six months have elapsed, the commissioners would not be entitled to proceed, unless there should be an application from some party in the parish. Should this not be made, the tithes would remain precisely upon their present footing. He confessed he thought the noble lord meant, that upon an application from a certain number of inhabitants, possessing the greater part of the tithe property, the commissioners should be authorized to proceed to the valuation of the tithe upon whatever principles they might agree to adopt. But the plan of the bill was this:—After the expiration of six months, if no voluntary agreement, and no parochial agreement, in consequence of the decision of the majority, should be effected, the powers of the commissioners would then come into operation. And in what manner? Any landowner might write to the commissioners and require, not a compulsion for the whole parish, but a compulsory arrangement for his individual holding in it. The parish might consist of 10,000 acres, and any man holding a single acre might apply for a compulsion to it. So that, though he admitted he was supposing an extreme case, it might be that this principle of compulsion might be applied only to a single acre. Supposing half the parish agreed in applying to the commissioners, in that case the principle of compulsion might be employed with effect. There might be proprietors in a parish whose land, now subject to a corn tithe, had not been arable for the last six or seven years. The tithe-owner would then apply to the commissioners to have the compulsory principle applied, and would select the cases in which it would be for his interest to obtain it. But what confusion and disputes would arise from these applications of individual landholders! It would be infinitely better, if the noble lord had determined what proportion of the holders of land interested in tithe should have had the power of obtaining from the commissioners the application of the compulsory principle to the parish. But the case of selecting individual landholders, and applying it to each, did appear to him to be introducing into each parish an anomaly in tithe, and he feared that, instead of reconciling conflicting opinions, it would lead to greater animosities than before. In every instance in which the award of the commissioners was objected to—in every case there must be a valuation of tithe, a just principle in itself; but did the noble lord consider what the difficulty would be in the great majority of cases of compulsion? How could the gross amount of tithe paid within the last seven years be discovered? If it had not been paid in kind, there might be a record; but where this had been the custom, he did not see how they could proceed to determine its gross value for that period. In order to form a just valuation, the commissioners must know the nature of the crop of every year, the produce of the land; and if their decision were not in conformity with justice, their award must necessarily produce great dissatisfaction in the parties subject to it. In every case where the award was not satisfactory, he did not see how the noble lord proposed to ascertain the value of the tithe on an acre of land during the last seven years. These were the principal doubts he entertained with respect to the measure before the House, which might be removed on further application and further inquiry, but of which, some hon. members having already alluded to them, he had not yet heard any satisfactory solution. He advised the noble lord not to be too sanguine that his measure would meet with universal approbation. The extreme difficulty there was in coming to a satisfactory settlement of this question, induced them to receive with favour any attempt to overcome these obstacles made in the spirit of fairness. The measure before them had at first appeared to him exceedingly plausible, but when he came to examine it minutely, defects presented themselves that had escaped a more cursory observation. For instance, with regard to the power of levying tithe in kind for non-payment of tithe as the landowner possesses the right of distress for non-payment of rent, since the former right was not affected by this bill, the liberty of levying tithes in kind might be continued for a long series of years. The bill had, in the course of the debate, been denounced by some hon. members as the Clergyman's Bill, by others as the Landowners', and he confessed he heard the first objection with much more satisfaction. He did hope that no bill would receive the assent of that House which did not render full justice, in every particular, to the rights of the clergy. It would be not only inconsistent with justice, but also detrimental to the honour and character of parliament, if this bill passed without containing some such provision as that which he had just recommended. Considering our peculiar situation as landlords, and also considering that the parties interested are the clergy, who have no direct representatives amongst us, it is required, no less by a due sense of our own interests, than by a proper regard to the protection of the rights and privileges of the clergy, that we should not appear to sanction any principle which we are not satisfied is consistent with justice. To require the whole 100 per cent. for the Church would be an insuperable bar to any commutation whatever. He had no hesitation in declaring that a fair deduction from the nominal amount of tithe must be made, for it was evident that to exact the whole 100 per cent. would be unjust both to the landlord and to the occupying tenant. He did not wish to have it understood thereby that he meant to agree entirely to the proportion fixed by the noble lord. As he said before, he would not oppose any objection to the principle of the measure, but would hold himself at liberty to modify it hereafter, as might seem most desirable to his sense of justice; for the main consideration by which he was actuated was a desire to satisfy the Church and the country that, in attempting the commutation of tithe, the House did not intend in any way to affect the interests of the clergy.

The bill was read a second time.

ORANGE LODGES.

FEBRUARY 23, 1836.

Mr. Hume brought forward the subject of Orange Lodges, and moved a series of resolutions with a view to their suppression.

Lord John Russell moved as an amendment, "That an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, praying that his Majesty will take effectual measures for the discouragement of Orange Lodges, and of political societies generally."

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the refusal of the noble lord (Russell) to comply with the request of his noble friend (Lord Stanley), would not alter the tone and temper of the few observations he should make. He was sure that it would be for the tranquillity of Ireland that an end should be put to all secret societies in that country. The existence of any of them was an evil, inasmuch as it held out a bad example to others. His opinion and his wish were, not only that an end should be put to all such associations, but he also wished to see the spirit in which they originated entirely and effectually suppressed. If the spirit remained, they would gain little by the suppression of its external forms. But he did regret that the noble lord should not have given way to the suggestion of the noble lord's friend (Lord Stanley); for he owned that, though he was prepared to assent to the noble lord's amendment, it was not without great sacrifice of opinion. He objected to proceeding by resolution; he thought they ought to indicate the will of the legislature by a law rather than by a resolution of one branch of it. They ought studiously to avoid a course by which a dominant majority of that House could denounce any party. They should be cautious in denouncing by a majority of that House any proceedings of any bodies, which, though they might be objectionable in many respects, might still not be against any law of the land. The resolutions of that House had no force except such as the prerogative of the Crown might give them; they had not the force of law, and this was the first time that he had heard of establishing the precedent of a resolution of that House, disqualifying for office on the alleged ground of conduct, the legality of which was at least questionable. However, he waived all those objections, for he perceived that all in that House were prepared to address the Crown to put an end to all secret societies. Independently of his own feeling on the subject, he objected to the words which had been used, that Orange Societies were illegal. The hon. baronet who had seconded the resolution, had declared that all those societies were contrary to the law of the land, and added that the Attorney-general had nothing to do but to institute prosecutions, in order to have them so declared by the courts of law. Now, if that was so, it was a powerful objection to this resolution, because if they believed that the members of Orange societies ought to be prosecuted, and were amenable to the law, they ought not to send them to trial loaded with the declared opinion of that House as to their guilt. In fact, the only ground on which the resolution before the House proceeded was, that these societies were not contrary to law; the noble lord was, therefore, right in not sending them to another tribunal, for if the issue of such a trial should be a declaration of their legality, the noble lord would find it much more difficult to put them down on a future occasion. If, then, there was a doubt as to the illegality of those societies, that was a reason why they should not be specifically mentioned in the resolution. It was not, as he had before said, to the mere Orange lodges that he objected, but to the spirit in which they had originated. He admitted that the words of the resolution did virtually include Orange lodges, even without naming them; and he saw no advantage which they could gain by those societies being specifically mentioned. The acquiescence of that (the opposition) side in the resolution of the noble lord, was not that of a reluctant minority; they had come to the House prepared to acquiesce in a resolution couched in nearly the same words as that of the noble lord. They had not expected his amendment; they were prepared to oppose the criminatory resolution of the hon. member for Middlesex; but when they heard the expressed declaration of many hon. members, that they were prepared to give up all connection with such associations, on hearing an expression of the will of the Crown to that effect, they thought that the object of that House, and of the government, would be sufficiently answered by the resolution which an hon. member (Mr. Wilson Patten) had expressed his intention of moving, which was, that an humble address be presented to his Majesty, praying that his Majesty might be graciously pleased to take such steps as to his Majesty might seem most desirable, to discountenance all secret societies, having secret signs, and excluding persons on account of differences in religious sentiments. This was the address to which they were prepared to agree, before they knew the course which the noble lord intended to take; and, after what had been stated by hon. members at that (the opposition) side of the House, he thought the most effectual mode of suppressing secret societies would be, by withdrawing words which were found offensive to those from whose example and influence they might expect co-operation in their great object. That great object was to restore tranquillity to Ireland. His hon. and gallant friends on that side were disposed to make a great sacrifice of their opinions for that purpose. They expressed their readiness, not only to withdraw themselves from those associations, but to induce all others over whom they had any influence to follow their example. It would, therefore, be prudent and politic in the House not to awaken the influence of those from whom they had reason to expect such co-operation. In conclusion, he felt bound to observe, that after what he had heard of the intention of his hon. and gallant friends to co-operate with them in their views—after what he had heard of the sacrifices they were willing to make of their prejudices and feelings—he thought it incumbent on the House not to allow any word to remain in the resolution to wound the sensibility of any one hon. member. If those hon. members who objected to the wording of the resolution as proposed by the noble lord, did not choose to press their objection, they might save the House a division; but if they did, he felt that, after the declarations they had made, he could not abandon them. He must, therefore, vote with him.

Lord John Russell's resolution was agreed to.

AFFAIRS OF SPAIN.

FEBRUARY 26, 1836.

Mr. Maclean, in a masterly speech, brought before the House the subject of our intervention in the affairs of Spain, and moved, "That the papers which the noble lord, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, intimated his intention of bringing forward on a former occasion, be laid on the table of the House."

Rising after Viscount Palmerston,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL remarked, that the noble lord began his speech by a facetious allusion to the surprise which a stranger suddenly spirited into that House would feel at hearing the present discussion, after having observed the anxiety with which the motion was pressed forward. But what proof does the noble lord advance of the probable surprise that would be felt by the stranger? Why, this: that a debate, involving important questions of foreign policy, had been suffered to take precedence of a debate on some matters relating to the Municipal Corporation of Poole. If that stranger was a person who took no interest in any other subject, and was entirely engrossed by the question of Corporation Reform, I might possibly be able to understand his astonishment; but to suppose that the stranger would feel surprise that, after a month since the assembling of parliament, an humble member should think it right to call the attention of the House to an important subject of foreign policy, is to suppose such stranger more grossly ignorant than I would be willing to suppose any stranger of common sense to be. The noble lord says, that the stranger would feel surprise at the anxiety that there was manifested to press this discussion; but if the stranger were made acquainted with our forms, he would see that this discussion did not arise on the proposition of my hon. friend, but on the noble lord's opposite, and if the stranger were impartial, he must acquit my hon. friend; for though the noble lord, as well as myself, was absent from the House last night, yet his duties as leader of the House must make him perfectly aware of what occurs, and the public must have been fully acquainted with what had taken place. The noble lord (Lord J. Russell) was the person who moved that the Order of the Day for the House going into Committee of Supply be read, and he certainly could not have done so for the purpose of postponing the present motion, but, on the contrary, for the express purpose of inviting this discussion, of which repeated notice had been given, and to which allusion was made at the time; and it was not until the hon. member for Poole reminded the noble lord of the adjourned debate on his motion, that the noble lord interfered. The hon. member for St. Alban's has expressed some surprise that his hon. friend has not brought forward his motion in the shape of a specific resolution, as the motion involves a censure upon the government. But if he refers to the practice of this House, both in ancient and modern times, he will find that it has always been considered a most convenient and proper time to enter upon discussions of this nature when the House is about to go into a Committee of Supply. The hon. gentleman will find that in some of the most recent periods, as well as at various periods of the history of parliament, some of the most important discussions on questions of foreign as well as of domestic policy have taken place on the motion for going into Committee of Supply. We are now about to vote the Ordnance Estimates, and I certainly do not think that there could be a more proper occasion for such a motion as the present to come before the House. I find in this printed paper a statement of all the stores that have been furnished for the service of the Queen of Spain. I do not want to go into any question as to whether the government were bound to furnish those supplies or not. On that subject there can be no altercation. Government were certainly bound to furnish those supplies, and the first part of them was furnished last year by the government over which I had the honour to preside. But it is quite another question to consider the extent to which those supplies should be furnished. I hold in my hand a paper containing the following statement of the supplies that have been furnished. I am surprised to see the hon. member for Middlesex reposing whilst a question of this particular nature is under discussion. [Mr. Hume (rousing)—I was sent to sleep by your speaking half an hour to little purpose.] The hon. member tells me that I have been speaking very little to the purpose for the last half hour. Now, the fact happens to be that I have not been upon my legs for more than the last five minutes, so that for the other twenty-five minutes of dulness and inapplicable reasoning it is not I but the noble lord opposite who is answerable. I thought when I was adverting to the Ordnance Estimates, that I touched a chord to which the hon. member for Middlesex would respond. I own I did not expect the hon. member's attention to any general observations on a question of foreign policy; but I hoped, without intending to be guilty of any unfairness, to waken the attention of the hon. member when I talked of a Vote of Supply. The Order of the Day is a Vote of Supply on the Ordnance Estimates; and here I may notice that this is the first time in my experience in which the vote for the supply of the Ordnance has preceded the vote either for the army or the navy. The Order of the Day being, as I said before, a Vote of Supply for the Ordnance, nothing could be more appropriate, or indeed more germane to the matter, than that those who doubt the policy of the course which the government is pursuing, should invite a debate on our interference in the affairs of Spain. The right hon. baronet read the items of the Ordnance Estimates to which he had alluded, from which it appeared that 220,000 muskets, 10,000 swords, 10,000 carbines, 3,000 rifles, 3,000,000 cartridges, 900,000 lbs. of powder, with a number of guns, besides the articles furnished to the Auxiliary Legion, constituting a large supply of military stores, were sent to the assistance of the Queen of Spain. The value of those stores was £386,777, of which not a single farthing has been received by the Ordnance Department. Now (continued the right hon. baronet), admitting that such an expenditure could be justified as consistent with sound policy, that this country should be put to an expense of nearly £400,000, without a satisfactory proof that such an expenditure would be made good to this country—now, did not this justify my hon. friend, if there were nothing more, in bringing forward his motion? The noble lord, in the course of his speech, referring to an argument used in the course of the debate, has talked of the impartiality of fogs. I confess I never heard a speech to possess more of the effect of fog than the speech of the noble lord, for under the veil of its obscurity he has been enabled to withdraw from the chief points of the discussion. The question is, whether it was just to interfere in a civil contest—a contest for the succession to the throne of Spain. To enter upon that question, it is necessary to consider the whole policy of the Quadruple Alliance. That treaty, Sir, I admit, having been once ratified, must in all its articles be to the letter fulfilled. It is the bounden obligation of every government of this country—they are bound in duty and in honour—to fulfil the treaty. No government would be warranted by any technical objection whatsoever to found thereon a non-acquiescence with the articles of that treaty; but neither should any government, through political motives, go beyond those articles. No matter what party might hold the reins of government in this country, they are bound by honour even more stringent than written law to adhere to the treaty. Sir, in accordance with that treaty the late government did advance arms and ammunition to the Queen of Spain, nor did it seek immediate payment for the stores thus advanced. But the noble lord opposite has laid down principles of intervention more extensive than ever yet were attempted to be upheld by any party in this country. Sir, if the principle of the noble lord were once to be generally adopted, it would justify the intervention of any government which might think proper to interfere with the internal relations of any other country, that government constituting itself the judge of the necessity for such interference. The noble lord says, that it is the duty and the interest of a free government to interfere for the advancement of free institutions. Why, Sir, the very same argument might be advanced by despotic powers desirous of suppressing the nascent principles of freedom, and of crushing states which sought to establish more popular forms of government. Prussia or Austria, for instance, might allege, “Our interests are opposed to the establishment of democracy, or to the maintenance of popular government, in the neighbourhood of our territories; and on the same principle on which England, possessing a popular government, and a free constitution, has interfered in Spain to secure the establishment of a similar political system in that country, do we justify ourselves in promoting a system of despotism, and in crushing the first attempts to establish a just and rational liberty.” It was quite beside the question to enter, as the noble lord had done, into a consideration of the policy of the Quadruple Alliance. With equal facetiousness the noble lord upbraided my hon. and learned friend for having allowed so much time to elapse without calling the attention of parliament to the order in council relaxing the foreign enlistment act. My hon. and learned friend was reproached with having taken six or eight months for deliberation. I must, however, remind the House, that when the noble lord last appeared upon the stage as the defender of that order in council, he appeared not only in the character of a logician, but also in that of a prophet. The present object of my hon. and learned friend is not to show that the ratiocinations of the noble lord were illogical, but that his prophecies had not been fulfilled, and it was necessary that there should be some lapse of time to contradict the noble lord's predictions. The noble lord's arguments were all answered and refuted at the time. The only advantage which the noble lord obtained, if indeed he obtained any, was derived from his being in possession of official communications, which could not be in the possession of hon. gentlemen on his side the House. From the implicit reliance with which the noble lord appeared to rest on those communications, and from the confident tone in which the noble lord then spoke, I certainly entertained hopes that the contest in Spain would have been terminated, and that the British Legion would have returned home before this time. The noble lord complained that great disparagement had been very unjustly cast upon the British Legion, and upon its gallant commander, Colonel Evans. I have not heard one word uttered in this House derogating either from the character or the gallantry of Colonel Evans. Neither have I been any party to the aspersions which have been thrown upon the soldiers under his command. Whatever may be the cause in which they are embarked, it is impossible for me not to feel a deep sympathy in the fate of a large body of my fellow-countrymen engaged in a foreign land in the support of a cause which they deem to be in accordance with their principles. With regard to the British Legion, though it is not in our service, though it is commanded by those from whom we on this side of the House dissented widely on political questions, the noble lord may be assured that he will not hear one word from us in disparagement of our fellow-countrymen who compose it—that he will not hear one expression of doubt as to their maintaining the honour of the British name—that he will not hear one reflection cast upon their gallantry and courage. Suppose that they fail; suppose that sickness and privations have thinned their ranks; suppose that want of discipline has prevented their energies from being perfectly effective; suppose that the rivalry of foreign commanders has impeded the display of their native gallantry—is that any reflection on them? No; but it is a reflection upon those who have committed them unnecessarily in the struggle, and who have committed along with them the name of the British nation and the honour of the British character. If the Quadruple Treaty requires that a foreign expedition should be sent from this country to Spain, that I admit would be a sufficient justification for the government in sending it forth; but I contend that, by the Quadruple Treaty, no obligation is imposed upon us to interfere in the contest now waging in Spain by recalling the prohibition contained in the foreign enlistment act. The recall of that prohibition made us substantially a party in that contest. The noble lord admits that it did. Well, then, the Quadruple Treaty specified what we should contribute to the common cause. If that treaty required from us military intervention, the government is justified in using such intervention; but the question is, “Did that treaty impose on us the obligation to repeal the prohibition contained in the foreign enlistment act, by the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown in favour of one party?” If it did not, I am at liberty to question the policy of that repeal as much as if that treaty had never existed. I freely admit to the noble lord that we are bound by that treaty, but I am now inquiring whether a particular act, which we have committed, was required from us under it. The noble lord says it was; but that I am equally prepared to deny; and if my denial be founded on right principles, I have a right to question the policy of government. I remain, then, up to this moment, after all that I have heard from the noble lord, totally unconvinced that we are called upon by the Quadruple Treaty to permit an English army, not under the control of English officers appointed by the Crown, to go to Spain, as an auxiliary force. We have not taken—we cannot take any security for its success. This suggests another consideration—does the noble lord consider that the Quadruple Treaty requires from us still more coercive measures against Don Carlos, supposing the present measures to fail, as it appears probable that they will? The permission to enlist is not sufficient. We have already given the Spanish government permission to enlist 10,000 men in this kingdom; are we to give it permission to enlist 10,000 more? or are we to support the British soldiers now under General Evans by a more marked exhibition of the military vigour of England? You have begun by a grant of arms and ammunition; you have followed that up by permission to enlist in your dominions; are you prepared to go still further? The noble lord attempts again to carry us along with him, by giving us, as of old, the most flattering hopes of success; but how can we repose credit in them, knowing, as we all do, that we are in a worse position now than we were on the last occasion on which the noble lord dazzled our eyes with delusive visions of success? “But,” says the noble lord, “if you doubt our policy, you identify yourselves with the policy of Don Carlos.”—Sir, I do no such thing. I do with all my soul abominate and abjure the cruelties and excesses in which both parties in this sanguinary contest so wantonly indulge. I am not, I never have been, a partisan of Don Carlos. All I wish is, that we were not parties in this contest, and that we were not in our present painful position. “But,” says the noble lord, “have we not interfered elsewhere, and have we not interfered with success? We interfered in Greece, in Belgium, and in Portugal—and has not our interference been productive of good?” To this I reply—the case of Portugal is separate and distinct from all others. We stand to Portugal in a very different relation from that in which we stand to any other country. We are bound to that country by treaties of a very special nature, and our interference in the concerns of Portugal, either with a naval or a military force, rests upon grounds very different from any which exist between us and any other nation. I will ask the House to consider how we interfered in the case of Belgium. The noble lord said that we had interfered with the domestic concerns of Belgium. How? The inhabitants of Belgium, for reasons best known to themselves, refused to submit to the yoke of the King of Holland. After that refusal broke out into open resistance, a question might have arisen, whether, under treaties then in existence, we were not bound to protect the King of Holland in his rights or dominion over Belgium. Right or wrong, we declined to interfere. The right hon. member for Nottingham (Sir John Hobhouse) will recollect the case of Belgium well. Upon the opening of parliament, objection was taken to that part of the King’s speech which referred to the domestic affairs of Belgium. [Lord Palmerston: I did not use the expression domes-tie affairs].—No? Why the whole question we are now discussing turns upon the right which one state claims to interfere with the domestic concerns of another. Don't I know that if you have a defensive alliance with another country, and that country is attacked by a third party, you may be called on, and if called on, you must interfere and assist it in that foreign quarrel? But is it a foreign quarrel in which the government of Spain now calls on you to interfere? The objection to our interference in Spain is, that we, professing principles of non-interference, except in a peculiar case of danger arising to ourselves from vicinage, or from the undue preponderance of a third party—the gravamen of the charge against us is, that we have undertaken, when there are two parties struggling for the succession to the Crown of Spain, to interfere in behalf of one of them, and to say that the claims of the inhabitants of the Basque provinces are not founded in justice. There never was a country in less danger from foreign aggression than Spain is at this moment. Portugal is friendly to her; France is friendly to her. If they were not, I would admit that our interference in her domestic concerns might be justified. The gravamen of the charge against us, I repeat, is this—that we, being interested in the establishment of free constitutions, have made ourselves parties in the domestic dissensions of Spain, by endeavouring to establish a free constitution there, in a way not justified by the Quadruple Treaty. For my own part, I doubt the ultimate result of the war which we are now assisting the Queen's government to carry on. If we succeed in establishing her dynasty by the assistance of a foreign force, I fear that we shall do little good. If the Queen's government cannot repress a mountain insurrection without the aid of a foreign force, I cannot bring myself to believe that a government which rests for support on foreign intervention can be permanently successful. Again, let us look to our interference, as it bears on the domestic policy of England. For my own part, I doubt the policy of letting a large force of British soldiers enter into the service of a foreign power in the way in which the British Legion has entered into the service of the Queen of Spain. If it is defeated, it injures the national character, and damps the national spirit. If, in consequence of that defeat, you increase its numbers, and raise it to 20,000 men, and if upon that increase its exertions become triumphant, and it returns to England flushed with feelings of victory, I will not conceal from you the apprehensions of danger which I entertain from your having two different armies in your dominions, both belonging to the same country, but connected with their officers by different ties. The right hon. baronet, after some other observations, which the lateness of the hour prevents us from reporting, concluded by declaring, that entertaining as he did the views which he had just declared respecting our foreign policy, he was compelled to object to the course adopted by the noble lord. He did not, however, feel himself justified in supporting a vote of censure against the government, but he did feel himself justified in demanding his right to be heard, whilst he questioned, on a vote of supply, the policy of his Majesty's government.

Motion acceded to.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND).

FEBRUARY 29, 1836.

On the question being put, “That this Bill be now read a second time,”—

SIR ROBERT PEEL was desirous to rise at that stage of the bill, and at that early period of the debate, in order that he might have an opportunity of laying before the House the views which, in common with many others, he entertained with respect to this important measure. He wished to speak at that early period of the discussion, in order that he might be enabled to present those views in a less disultory, in a more connected, in a more dispassionate manner, than he might be able to do if he were to rise at a later period of the debate, amid the excitement of political contention, and after the introduction of topics calculated, from their connection with party interests, to disturb a calm review of the abstract merits of any particular measure. He wished to rise at that stage of the bill for the purpose of presenting his views to the House at a period when it was not necessary to pronounce an immediate decision. Feeling fully convinced of the justice of those views, and believing that their adoption would conduce to the impartial administration of justice, and the general good government of Ireland, he was most desirous that a final decision should not be pronounced till full opportunity for the most mature deliberation had been afforded. The matter under discussion was not one of merely local or municipal concern; it did not merely relate to the peculiar interests of certain communities in Ireland, but involved considerations of the utmost importance respecting the administration of justice, and the efficiency of the civil power; it had reference to many matters deeply affecting the feelings and interests of that country, and the permanent cause of general good government. Before noticing any parts of the speech of the right hon. gentleman opposite, which he would refer to as they occurred in connection with his own arguments, he would briefly allude to the general position of the corporations of Ireland. The right hon. gentleman had justly remarked, that the corporations now actually in existence there, amounted to about sixty in number. At the time the legislative Union between Great Britain and Ireland was effected, the number was ninety-five, but since that period it had been reduced, by the decay of several, to the present number of about sixty. The report of the commissioners who conducted the inquiry into Irish corporations, bore reference to two distinct eras. The first related to that portion of time which intervened between the reign of Henry II. and the accession of James I.; and the second, from the accession of the latter monarch to the present period. Of the ninety-five corporations which existed in Ireland at the period of the Union, eighty were governed by charters of a date subsequent to James I. In the statements which he was about to make, he should take for granted the accuracy, as to facts, of the report from which he quoted. Of the ninety-five corporations, eighty were governed by charters subsequent to James I.; of the other fifteen, four claimed to be governed by prescription, nine by charters earlier than James Ist, and two by statute. The right hon. gentleman had promised, in the beginning of his speech, that he would show that these Irish corporations were originally founded on enlarged and liberal principles of municipal government; but that promise he had not attempted to fulfil. Speaking of the period before James I.'s accession, it would indeed be rather difficult to prove that charters granted in that early period of Irish history were intended to support popular principles of municipal government. It would be much more consistent with the truth to describe them as mere outworks and defences for maintaining English authority amid a rude and hostile people. He believed that the learned member for Dublin had formerly contended that some corporations claimed to have been governed by prescription, at a period anterior to Henry II. The evidence in support of this claim was exceedingly slight and unsatisfactory, but the point was not one of much importance. The first charter granted by Henry II. was dated in 1772 or 1773, at Dublin, and was granted "to the men of Bristol, of his city of Dublin, to inherit and hold of him and his heirs, all liberties and free customs which the men of Bristol had at Bristol and through all his territory." The commissioners in their report admitted that the early charters gave no definition of who were to be members of the corporate body, nor prescribed how they were to be elected, and that it was difficult to point out with precision the rights to corporate franchise, as they existed in those ancient communities. The commissioners also stated, "That it would appear that at a very early period the right to claim admission as a member of the corporate body became subject to conditions and regulations, probably as its commercial value increased; and we cannot refer to any corporation created before the reign of James I. in which we have evidence, beyond what may be inferred from the terms of the charters as above alluded to, that mere inhabitancy, at least unconnected with the tenure of property, constituted a sufficient and recognised title to admission." So much for the charters granted previously to the accession of James I.; with respect to those granted subsequently to that accession, the right hon. gentleman had made a faint effort to prove that they were not, in point of fact, intended for the maintenance of protestant ascendancy. His own strong impression, from some acquaintance with Irish history, was, that forty-six or forty-seven of the charters granted by James I. and subsequently, had for their exclusive object the support of Protestant interests; and to remove all doubt on this head, he begged to refer the House to an authority more recent than that of Sir John Davies, an authority which the gentlemen opposite would respect, for it was to their own commission that he should refer. Two members of that commission, Messrs. Moodie and Pigott, in their report upon the City of Londonderry, stated, that "in the year 1613, a parliament was assembled in Ireland after an interval of seven years, during which no parliament had sat, and during which seventeen new counties had been formed, and forty new boroughs had been created. The creation of these boroughs appears plainly to have been designed to increase in the new parliament the influence of the Crown, through the persons who had received those large possessions from its bounty, and to give to the settlers who formed the heads and free burgesses of the new corporation, or rather to the owner of the soil on which the borough was created, direct influence and power to the legislature. They were, in fact, close boroughs, exclusively Protestant, and sending into parliament a large body of new members, whose presence King James required to control the party then adverse to him, and possessing considerable power in the Irish House of Commons. These close boroughs continued, until the Union, the property of the landed proprietors on whose estates they were situated; and they were made the subjects of pecuniary compensation when the parliamentary patronage of them was abolished. "As far," say the commissioners, "as we are able to state, they were close corporations (except Derry and Coleraine), and were framed to exclude all influence but that of property." This description of Irish corporations, established during the reign of James I., was at direct variance with the statement of the Attorney-general, and with the preamble of his bill, which assumed, as it was convenient for his purpose to assume, that Irish corporations were all originally framed upon some enlightened principles of municipal government. It recited, "Whereas divers bodies corporate at sundry times have been constituted within the cities, towns, and boroughs of Ireland, to the intent that the same might for ever be and remain well regulated and quietly governed." Now if this preamble had made an exception in respect to near fifty corporations, and had recited that they were close boroughs, exclusively Protestant, and intended to be so, this would have been more consistent with the fact, and with the report of the commissioners, than that the object was to provide good government on enlightened principles for the corporations of Ireland.

The truth was, that this bill, whatever the right hon. member might say to the contrary, amounted to a complete extinction of the ancient corporate bodies in Ireland. If they looked at the original object for which the existing corporations were instituted, and the exclusive principles upon which they were founded—if they looked at the principles upon which the new bill was framed, the extensive constituencies to be called into operation by it, and the objects it was to achieve—if these were compared together, it would be wholly impossible to deny that the ancient corporate system in Ireland was marked out for entire and complete extinction, and that a new and totally different system of corporate government was erected on the ruins. It was mere affectation in the right hon. gentleman to deny it. What said the bill? "That so much of all laws, statutes, and usages, and so much of all royal and other charters, grants, and letters-patent, rules, orders, and directions, now in force relating to the several boroughs named in the schedules A. B. and C., or to the inhabitants thereof, or to the several bodies, or reputed or late bodies corporate named in the said schedules, as are inconsistent with or contrary to the provisions of this Act, shall be, and the same are hereby repealed and annulled." What single law, statute, or usage now in force, was consistent with the provisions of this Act? Not one. All, therefore, would be swept away, and for the right hon. gentleman who presented this bill of forfeiture and extinction, gravely to get up and profess a holy reverence for ancient institutions, and a horror at the destructives who should contemplate their extinction, was sheer affectation and mockery. Oh no! the House will not be deceived by this pretended respect for ancient rights and franchises. It will feel that the extinction of the old corporations by the new bill was quite complete; and whether the right hon. gentleman erected his own system upon their ruins, or annihilated the former system without providing a substitute, the destruction in each case was the same—as effectual as could be; there would be no more connection or analogy between the old corporate bodies and the new, than between the present departmental system of government in France, and the old divisions of that country into provinces.

At the same time he did not deny the necessity of an extensive change in the system of local government in Ireland. The question is, how shall that change be effected? Shall we attempt, by partial modifications, to reform the existing corporations—or shall we extinguish them altogether—or shall we assent to the plan of the right hon. gentleman? If we dissent from it, and extinguish the corporations, how shall we provide for the performance of the necessary municipal function? These were the practical points for consideration. For himself he had never thought it possible to amend the corporate system of Ireland as it exists at present; nor should he advise a partial modification for the purpose of propping up a system which was radically bad. They might enlarge the number of freemen, or make new regulations in respect to the admission of freemen, and cure some of the evils which were inherent in the present system; still they could not, in his opinion, overcome by such means the grave objections which applied in principle to the continuance of that system, even modified by these slight alterations. A system which presented so limited a number as but 13,000 corporators out of a borough population of 900,000, was too exclusive in respect to number. The basis was not sufficiently wide. Super-added to this was the consideration, that the corporators were almost entirely of one form of religious faith. Political feelings were thus unavoidably mixed up with the administration of justice; and even though that administration of justice might be perfectly pure, still the suspicion of partiality precluded satisfaction with the awards of those who were looked on as political partisans. He had listened with attention to the objections made by the right hon. gentleman to the present municipal system, and to many of them he assented. One of these related to the misapplication of corporate funds. He was as unwilling as the right hon. gentleman could be, to connect himself, or the party with whom he had the honour and satisfaction to act, with the sanction of any such abuses. As to the facts stated, he had not the same means as the right hon. gentleman of ascertaining whether they were in every point well-founded. He had no hesitation in saying, that where abuse of such funds existed, or where there was a possibility of its occurrence, that the abuse ought to be corrected, and security taken against the future repetition of it. He was persuaded that the original intention of the granters of corporate property must have been, that it should be applied to the public benefit, and not be perverted to private advantage. He had no hesitation in saying further, that there were other and more comprehensive grounds on which he could not advise the maintenance of the existing corporate system in Ireland, or any partial modifications of it. He considered the system inconsistent with the principles and fair legitimate consequences of the act of 1829. That act established, in respect to civil offices, a perfect equality among all classes of his Majesty's subjects. The object of that act was to make civil worth the test of qualifications for office, and not religious faith; and if there were a system which deprived a Roman Catholic of free access to corporate privileges, and conferred such privileges on others, simply because they professed the established religion, he cared not whether that distinction were established by the operation of a particular law, or existed practically and almost universally without being enjoined by law, he was of opinion, that it was at variance with the principle of the act of 1829, and ought to be put an end to. If this reasoning were admitted, they must come to the conclusion, that it would not be wise to amend in order to continue such a system. The next consideration, then, which demanded their attention, was, the nature of that system of local government which should be proposed in lieu of the present; and he trusted the House would give him its indulgence while he stated his views on the subject. He would first examine the plan proposed by the right hon. gentleman. If he should mistake any part of that plan, the right hon. gentleman would have the goodness to correct him. He certainly should not misstate any part of it intentionally. After providing for the demolition of the existing corporations, the bill went on expressly, and by name, to provide for the government of fifty-four towns; and to forty-seven of these it gave a household franchise of £5. In point of population, it descended exceedingly low; for in the town of Middleton, with a population of 2,034; and of Belturbet, with a population of 2,026, it established a local government, consisting of a mayor, four aldermen, and twelve town councillors. All this cumbersome and not inexpensive machinery for towns with a population of only 2,000! The bill also gave to the Lord-lieutenant a power of applying the provisions of the bill to any town in Ireland he pleased to select, without any necessary reference to its population. The bill also contained a provision—a most extraordinary one—a provision which, like many others in the bill, varied not only in words, but in substance, most importantly from the corresponding provisions of the English bill. The English bill provided, that if the inhabitant householders of a town petitioned the King to grant them a corporation, the King shall be at liberty to do so, and the Irish Corporation Bill of 1835 contained a similar clause. But, under the present bill, any of the inhabitant householders of a town might invoke the Lord-lieutenant to grant them a corporation; and his lordship was empowered to do so without reference to the number of petitioners. Why this marked departure from the English bill, unless it be intended to extend the new corporations in Ireland indefinitely? The right hon. gentleman said, that the object of the government is, by means of this bill, to call one uniform system into operation in all the corporate towns in Ireland. Be it so; but where was the necessity for encumbering towns like the two which he had mentioned—towns the population of which did not exceed 2000—with such a ponderous instrument for managing their domestic concerns? He admitted that these two towns had nominally corporations at present, but there was nothing in their constitution, or in the circumstances of the towns, so peculiar as to call for the establishment of new corporate authorities on the extinction of the old ones. There were many towns which now had corporations, to which it was not intended to give new corporations. The bill had not adopted the rule that every town having a corporation should continue to have one; the rule the bill apparently adopted was, that towns now being corporate, and having more than 2000 inhabitants, should continue to have corporations. But, surely, the main point to be considered was, whether a corporation was or was not a benefit to a small town? If a benefit, why limit it to towns which happen to be now corporate? If an evil, why inflict it on them because they are corporate? The bill must assume that a corporation is, in the abstract, a benefit to a town which has 2000 inhabitants, and this assumption must be considered a rule to guide the Lord-lieutenant in the exercise of the discretion given him by the bill. The House of Commons would virtually, by this bill, declare that 2000 inhabitants constituted a proper limit, and that towns with a population above 2000, ought to have corporations. He had ascertained that there were 126 towns in Ireland, with populations consisting of 2000 and upwards; he had, therefore, full right to infer, that the minimum of incorporated towns would be 126. On the maximum on the increase of the number of corporations there was no limit. If any town having 1000 inhabitants, for instance, petitioned the Lord-lieutenant to be incorporated, he was not bound to comply with that petition, but he would have a perfect right to comply with the petition if he chose. If, however, the inhabitants were more than 2000, looking to the principles of this bill, and to the rule laid down by it, such town would have a fair right to expect that the Lord-lieutenant, acting on the principles laid down by the bill, would grant them a corporation. Each of these corporations, so constituted, was to have the power of making by-laws—such by-laws as to them should seem meet for the good rule and government of the town. Those by-laws would require the sanction of the Lord-lieutenant, and he presumed they must not be at variance with the law of the land. In general, a provision was inserted in measures empowering chartered companies to make by-laws, that such by-laws should be consistent with the law of the land, but no such provision would be found in this bill. There was, of course, no necessity that the by-laws of different towns should be in conformity with each other, so that there might be 126 towns in Ireland having each a different system of by-laws and regulations established by the town-council of each borough. Offences against these by-laws might be tried by the corporate justices of the towns. In each of these towns there was to be a mayor who was to be a justice of the peace for the borough, and who was to take precedence of the county magistrates in those towns. One of the complaints in the Report was, that the corporate justices of Ireland were at present independent of the Crown, and not subject to that control of the Lord Chancellor to which county magistrates were subject; but the corporate justices created by this bill were, he apprehended, to be entirely independent of the control of the Crown, and of the Chancellor. In the counties of cities of Ireland there was to be a town-council by whom the sheriff was to be elected. In reference to the appointment of a separate commission of the peace in certain boroughs, such commission could only be issued on the requisition of the town-council; but surely the Lord-lieutenant would be a better judge than any local authority, whether it would be for the interests of public justice that a separate commission of the peace should be issued for any particular district or town in Ireland. If he had fairly described the provisions of the bill, he would attempt to show, in answer to the challenge of the right hon. gentleman—that the bill was not likely to conduce to the improvement of the administration of justice in Ireland; and that the principles which they themselves had laid down in preparing other measures connected with the civil force in Ireland, were at direct variance with the principles which this bill would establish. Before he reviewed the arguments of the right hon. gentleman he would refer to one of his positions, which, if correct, was a bar to all argument, which rendered all discussion useless. He maintained that justice to Ireland absolutely required that the same measure of corporate reform which had been adopted here, should be extended to Ireland. No matter what would be its practical operation in Ireland, it would be, according to the right hon. gentleman, an insult and a wrong to refuse to Ireland what had been conceded to England. But he could show this position to be untenable, and he would cite against it the authority of the right hon. gentleman himself; for the right hon. gentleman had said, that if he thought the effect of this bill would be to transfer power from the hands of one party to those of another, he should be found amongst the most determined and active opponents of it. The right hon. gentleman then claimed for himself the liberty of examining the operation of this measure, and stated a case in which he himself should be prepared to disregard the argument, that because you had passed a certain measure in England, you must necessarily apply that identical measure to Ireland. The right hon. gentleman alluded to a speech of the noble lord the member for Lancashire. What was the nature of that speech? It was made with reference to parliamentary reform. It might be unwise to place the inhabitants of two countries on a different footing with respect to the exercise of political power; but if it could be shown that any principle adopted in England or Scotland, or in any other part of the habitable globe, and leading to beneficial results there, would work in Ireland to defeat the ends of justice, he cared not for their vaunted principle of assimilation; he would boldly reply, that the interests of public justice were infinitely higher than nominal uniformity in the public institutions which administer it. If the application of that uniformity was incompatible with justice, then, according to the admission of the Attorney-general, determined opposition to this bill was perfectly justifiable. Now he would examine the bearing of the enactments of this bill, as they related to the administration of justice—as they related to the efficacy of the civil power by the due administration of the police, and as they related to the management of the corporate funds. He would take first the administration of justice. The right hon. gentleman said, that there were many imperfections in the administration of justice by the municipal corporations in Ireland; that there was great dissatisfaction, and that there existed concurrently an exclusive system of self-government. Admitting all this to be as stated, the right hon. gentleman proceeded to argue, that all he had to do was to introduce popular election and remove the evil. Now he admitted that in many respects the system of popular election might be a check on abuse; but he must at the same time say, there was a gross fallacy and a fundamental defect in the argument which asserted, that the selection by popular choice of the functionaries intrusted with the administration of justice would naturally ensure, that justice would be administered satisfactorily. Under this bill there would be the counties of cities, with their sheriffs, elected by the town-council; there would be also the corporate towns, having a separate session of the peace, with elected town-clerks necessarily acting as clerks of the peace. In both of these instances the officers appointed by the corporation would have the summoning, in one case, of the grand and petit juries, in the other of the petit juries. Now he would call the attention of the House to the objections urged in the report of the commissioners against the administration of justice by officers appointed by corporations. The commissioners said in their report:—“In the corporations of counties, cities, and towns (and in one case, that of Londonderry, for the county at large), the sheriffs appointed by the municipal corporations possess and exercise important functions in reference to the administration of justice, both criminal and civil. * * * A large proportion, frequently the majority of the Grand Jurors, is empanelled from the members of the governing corporate bodies,—an arrangement which, as these bodies are at present constituted, practically vests and preserves in limited corporate councils the extensive powers of local taxation given by law to the grand juries. The composition of the grand juries, which ought to be generally and impartially taken from the inhabitants at large, is thus directly and effectively that of the corporations, and partakes of their defects and unpopularity. The corporation and grand juries of Dublin afford striking instances of this connection between the two bodies. In Waterford we find a singular arrangement made to guard against the practice, by an agreement between the corporation and the inhabitants, that no more than a certain number of the common council should be on the grand jury. The exercise of this branch of their functions by the corporate sheriffs in the return of petit juries on occasions of interest to the corporations, or affecting their influential members or supporters, obviously affords the means of giving an important advantage to parties in their interest, or professing the same local or general political views." That being the imperfection, the groundwork of complaint, he wished to be told how they would remedy it, by making the popularly elected sheriff and clerk of the peace, the officers who were to summon the jury in those towns, and counties of towns, which it could not be denied were in a state of discord, springing from religious difficulties and political animosity. In all these towns, with corporate officers holding their appointments independent of any control on the part of the Crown, and nominating the juries, there was to be, in addition to all other causes of discord, a perpetual system of agitation connected with municipal elections. First, an annual registration of persons qualified to vote; then one-third of the town-council would annually go out of office, and others must be elected in their place; then would come the election of the magistrates; then the election of the town-clerk and other officers; and thus almost the whole year would be spent in elections, or in proceedings preparatory to elections. Did they mean to say, that under such a state of things party spirit would not prevail? Would they say, that parties would not be pitted against each other—that there would not be active canvassing—that clubs would not be formed to include in the corporations one set of members and to exclude another—that the town-councils would not be elected with reference to political interests—that the sheriffs and other officers appointed by the town-councils would be free from political bias? Could they, then, infer that the administration of justice would be more satisfactory, for the single reason, that the officers mainly instrumental in it would owe their appointment to the predominance of a party, and the acts by which popular elections were determined? While listening to the speech of the right hon. gentleman, he marked the important admissions which escaped from him, with respect to the administration of justice, and he would ask what more security for the pure administration of justice did this system afford than they had in the system for which it was a substitute? The right hon. gentleman said, that his charge against the present sheriffs was the intimate connection they established between the corporations and the grand juries. What was there in the bill before the House to prevent such a connection from continuing to exist? An intimate connection between the corporations and the grand jury! This was the grievance. But where was the remedy that this bill applied? If the present sheriffs marked their respect for the present corporations, why should the new sheriffs show less of deference to the popularity-elected corporations, from whom they were to receive their appointment? What was there in the principle of popular control—admirable as it might be as a check on abuses of a certain class—what was there in popular control, as exercised over the sheriff, tending to diminish his sense of obligation to the party to which he owed his election? That would be the party which would exercise the supposed control, and which would have a common feeling with the sheriff in favour of promoting their common interests. The right hon. gentleman said, that a difference of opinion in politics ought to form no ground of challenge as to the eligibility of persons to be elected as corporate officers, or corporate jurors. The sheriff might be a political partisan. He might return men with political opinions corresponding to his own to serve on the grand jury, and there would be no ground of disqualification or challenge on this account. But would there not be the very same ground for complaint that there now is against partial officers and partial juries? The right hon. gentleman urged as a conclusive argument against the present system—against the selection of the grand jury by a corporate officer—the abuse which had occurred in some proceedings at Limerick. He brought forward the case of some fishermen who were fired at by the watermen of the corporation; in consequence of which firing death ensued. The corporate sheriff returned the jury, and the corporate jury, acting in support of the corporate rights, acquitted the watermen, and convicted the fishermen of homicide, though they were the party sustaining the loss of life. That was a grievous case, no doubt; but would the right hon. gentleman say what provision there was in his bill which would make it the interest of the grand jury, appointed by the corporate sheriff, instead of supporting the corporate rights, to administer justice impartially? Would the right hon. gentleman say in what single respect popular election, and the party spirit connected with it, afford a security that justice would be done in a case which involved corporate rights or party interests? So much for the administration of justice.

He would now state to the House the outline of the proposal which he was inclined to make. In the case of the counties of cities and counties of towns, he would at once place the nomination of sheriffs for those counties of cities and counties of towns in the hands in which the nomination of sheriffs for counties was placed. The right hon. gentleman interposed his clumsy and ineffectual contrivance of the veto of the Lord-lieutenant on the nomination of the town-council. Such a check would be quite ineffectual. Why establish a divided responsibility between the parties? The right hon. gentleman proposed that the town-council should name the sheriffs, and the Lord-lieutenant should have a power to reject. If the sheriff had been guilty of any gross offence—if he had distinguished himself by any very marked or violent political opinions, it was just possible that the Lord-lieutenant might exercise his power of objecting to the individual. The town-council, irritated perhaps by the rejection of their first nominee, would then recommend another, and an unseemly conflict might arise between the Lord-lieutenant and the local authorities. What possible objection could there be to conferring the appointment at once directly on the Lord-lieutenant? Observe the course pursued by the government, with regard to the nomination of the county sheriffs by the judges. The government had in some cases refused to take the recommendation of the judges. Let them apply their own principles to the present case. If the country was so divided by religious opinion, if it was so divided by party feeling, that the government found it necessary to refuse to sanction the nomination of the judges—what security could they have that a town-council, elected possibly after a turbulent and severe contest, would discharge the duties of recommendation impartially? Why should they have more confidence in the integrity of the town-council than they had in that of the judges? Why should they fetter the Lord-lieutenant in his discretion? Why not leave the matter to his decision, which must be looked on as more impartial—be his political opinions what they might—than the judgment of local and conflicting parties? Why not trust him with the same power in respect of sheriffs in corporate towns, as he had always exercised with regard to the sheriffs of counties?

He would next address himself to the administration of the civil power—to the superintendence of the police. He presumed that the right hon. gentleman was prepared to repeat his challenge—and would again demand, whether any man could be found bold enough to maintain that the same principles with respect to police were not to be applied to Ireland that had been applied to England? What—would they insult the people of Ireland by telling them that, whereas they intrusted the town-councils of England with the nomination of constables and superintendents of police, they would not deal out impartial justice to Ireland, and commit the police in that country to the same hands? Would the right hon. gentleman repeat that challenge? If he did, here was his ready answer to him—it was the right hon. gentleman's own bill brought in this session, which provided for the consolidation and amendment of the laws relating to the establishment of the constabulary force in Ireland. The right hon. gentleman and his friends had by the introduction of that bill, acted at variance with, and in direct contradiction to their own principles. They showed that they had a great jealousy of the local authorities in Ireland; they showed, that they would not trust them with the appointment of the police; they brought in a bill to take those appointments from them, concurrently with this bill which, on the face of it, proposed that the Municipal Corporations should be intrusted with the appointment of the local police. What were the arguments they used with respect to the county magistrates of Ireland? Either that they could not be trusted with the appointment of police constables from the influence of party feelings—or that such appointments, emanating from different authorities, would destroy all unity in the police system, therefore they could not listen to the recommendations of the magistrates, but would vest the absolute power of nomination in the Lord-lieutenant. The bill of this present session provided for the establishment throughout Ireland of a constabulary force. It recited, that it was expedient to consolidate and amend the act for the appointment of certain constables and magistrates in certain districts. It provided, that the Lord-lieutenant might appoint, in every county, magistrates and county inspectors, who were to have the direction and superintendence of the police force to be established; it took the nomination of the police from the magistrates, and gave it to the Lord-lieutenant, the avowed object being to carry into effect one system throughout the whole establishment of police. It appointed sub-inspectors, paymasters, storekeepers, and clerks. It recited that it should be lawful for the Lord-lieutenant to appoint, from time to time, at his will and pleasure, such numbers of chief and other constables as should be deemed by him necessary for the preservation of the peace. It expressly enabled him to appoint in the several towns of Ireland constables, sub-inspectors, &c., and it did this for the purpose of excluding local recommendations, and insuring a unity of system. What became of this expected unity if, in the different towns, the corporations acting under this bill, appointed severally a local police. He had alluded to the constabulary force bill for the purpose of showing that, so far as regarded the civil power, the acts of the present government demonstrated that they did not consider popular control necessary, and that in the constabulary bill they followed a plan at utter variance with the principles of the present bill—not only at variance, but incompatible with, and contradictory to, the provisions of this bill. He excluded, therefore, on their own showing, and on the authority of their own Report, from the objects of municipal government, the administration of the civil power, and the charge of the police.

He came next to the possession and control of corporate property. Now the right hon. gentleman, in the course of his speech, did not state any very conclusive arguments in favour of the power of presentment exercised by such grand juries as were appointed by corporate sheriffs; for he said that in the county of Cork the cess was only tenpence per acre, whereas in the county of the city of Cork the amount levied by the grand jury was five or six shillings per acre. But let them examine the bill, with reference to its bearing in point of economy? It required that a mayor should be appointed, a town-clerk and a treasurer; and it authorized the town-council, out of the borough funds, to apportion salaries to the mayor, town-clerk, and such other officers, without stint or limitation, as the council thought necessary. Here then was a source of copious patronage provided. The right hon. gentlemen had inquired what would they do with the property of the present corporations? Now the property was not very extensive. The total amount of the corporation property in Ireland was about £61,397 a-year; the expenditure was £57,279; the amount of debt was about £133,000. If they excluded the city of Dublin from the calculation, they would find that the total amount of income was £33,000 per annum, the annual expenditure £27,000, and the debt about £100,000. The property of corporations in Ireland was derived from two sources—from estates in land and from tolls. One of the provisions of the bill, in relation to corporate funds, was exceedingly objectionable. It vested the whole amount of the present tolls in the new corporate bodies, and deprived them of the power of reducing them in certain cases. Now it appeared to him that if there was any one matter in Ireland, with respect to which a new arrangement should be made, it was the system of corporate tolls. They stood on a different footing from the tolls possessed by the corporations in England. On the principle on which they claimed the right to deal with corporate property, there could be no question, if the corporations were willing to relinquish the tolls, they ought to be allowed to do so, and there ought to be no impediment thrown in the way of the surrender. The right to tolls of individuals was encumbered with the claim for compensation; this made the settlement of the question in respect to their rights, a difficult one; but the corporations stood on distinct ground, and, for the sake of the industry, and to liberate the commerce of the country, these tolls ought, if possible, to be extinguished. To extinguish the right of the corporations to levy tolls, would not only confer a direct benefit on the people, but materially promote tranquillity, and subordination to the laws. He might refer to the commissioners' report for an account of the manner in which tolls were levied in Ireland, and the violence which accompanied it. In Drogheda they were collected in the following manner, as stated in the report of the commissioners:—"Until a recent period, the tolls of the corporation of Drogheda were exacted at the gates, without any regard to the restrictions by 4 Anne, c. 8. Charges were made upon all cattle and goods either entering the town or leaving it, and if passing through, both on the entry and exit; and although they were not driven or carried over the bridge, and although they were not brought to be sold, consumed, or slaughtered in the town. These illegal practices led to a general resistance to the payment of the tolls claimed by the corporation, and, owing to the difficulty experienced in the collection, no one could be found to bid for them when set up to auction in the usual way. From October 1827 to October 1829, the collection was attended with frequent riots. The collector stopped the goods on coming to the gate, or entrance into the town, and demanded the toll. On refusal, the cars were stopped until the owner paid or turned back. The riots were commenced by the farmers waiting until a great number of cars were collected together, when they whipped the horses and galloped through the toll-gate." This was the system continued by the present bill. The resistance to tolls generally had increased of late years, and to such an extent, that in one-half of the corporations the attempt to levy tolls had been abandoned. Was it, then, not desirable to place these tolls on a new footing, and, if not wholly abolished, to provide for their collection in a different manner. Suppose that a reduction of the corporate tolls were made, in that case they would have to deduct a corresponding amount from the £33,000 per annum possessed by the corporations. To what an extent that reduction would affect the income of the corporations he could not at present say, but he apprehended that the whole sum left would be exceedingly small. In some towns the tolls amounted to nearly one-half of the whole revenue. He could not conceive any enactment which would give more universal satisfaction in Ireland, than one that should provide, that instead of levying the toll for the improvement of the town, commerce and industry should be freed altogether from the restraint of corporate toll, in every case, at least, in which such toll was not a security for debts incurred. He would say further, with reference to individual right to toll, that it would be an excellent application of corporation property, in cases where there was a surplus, to purchase with that surplus the individual right, and remit the future enforcement of it. He admitted that those to whom the distribution of corporate property was intrusted, ought to be liable to render a strict account; and if any improper application of the property was discovered, immediate steps ought to be taken to recover it. If there was a surplus of corporate property, no doubt that ought to be applied to some municipal purpose connected with the improvement of the town. His proposal was, to vest the charge of corporate property ad interim in a commission. He would give to that commission an instruction to take an extended view of all the important questions connected with the application of this property. He would specially direct them to inquire into, and make a report on the subject of toll. He would expedite the process of law for the recovery of corporate property; and he much doubted whether a commission, taking an extended view of the subject, would not recover more property under the existing law, than by any other means.

With respect to the administration of justice to the charge of the police, and to the administration of corporate property, he had intimated the course he was inclined to pursue. He would not consent to the re-establishment of corporate bodies. He did not believe it could be shown, that officers appointed by popular election would give more satisfaction in the administration of justice, than officers selected by the lord-lieutenant. He professed a willingness to remedy every abuse they could point out. He agreed, that there ought to be an effectual supervision of the police; he agreed that corporate property ought to be applied to municipal purposes. He admitted, also, that there were objects of local administration, which required the control of a local authority, and of a local authority subject to popular control. But the existing law provided for this. An Act was now in force in Ireland, general in its operation, which provided amply for the lighting, the watching, and the cleansing of towns in Ireland. It was the 9th George IV. cap. 8. The hon. gentleman dwelt with great satisfaction on the practical operation of this bill. He said it engendered no party spirit—that the elections under it were conducted with harmony and impartiality. Why incur the risk of disturbing that harmony? Why make the authorities that are to preside over their local government, political and party functionaries? The Act of the 9th Geo. IV. was very popular in its construction—twenty householders inhabiting houses of £20 a year annual value shall agree to apply for the extension of the act to the town where they reside, directions shall be issued by the lord-lieutenant for a meeting of the inhabitants to decide upon the propriety of adopting the act. At this meeting all inhabitant householders of £5 and upwards shall have a right to vote, and the result to be decided by the majority. In case the act be adopted, commissioners to carry the provisions of the act into operation are to be appointed by the election of the majority of those qualified to vote. These commissioners not to be less in number than ten, nor more than twenty-two, and to continue in office for three years. These commissioners have the power of appointing a treasurer, clerks, and other officers, but the act gives them no judicial powers whatever. Any penalties may be recovered before a magistrate of the town or county; but the commissioners have no connexion in any shape with the administration of justice. The act gives to them simply the power of providing for the watching and cleansing of the town. The Police bill of the government virtually superseded the act of 9th Geo. IV., in respect to the establishment of a local watch. It rendered such an establishment unnecessary, by providing an ample civil force, acting on uniform principles, and subordinate to one single authority. But this corporation bill re-established the local watch and local police, and destroyed the uniformity which was aimed at by the police bill. Why is this? Why not do as you have done here? Did the right hon. gentleman mean to say that the police force appointed to preserve the peace by day was not sufficient to perform the duties of watching by night? But this had been done in London and Westminster. We made the same force answer both objects, and we found the experiment to be attended with the most eminent success. A bill of a similar description had been proposed for Dublin, it assimilated the police force there to the police force here, and made the same force sub-servient to the purposes of discharging the duties of a day and a night police. In this way you give the force consistency, and increase its utility and efficiency. Now, if this system were found beneficial in its operation for London and Dublin, why should it not be at least equally so for Belurmet and Middleton? If it were not necessary to separate the appointment of the watch in London and Dublin from that of the police—if they were wise, and he thought they were, in making no distinction between the police by day or by night, in order that there should be no confusion or clashing in the performance of duties, which only differed in respect to the hour of the day at which they were to be discharged—if that system was found to work well in Westminster and in London—if they admitted that that system should be adopted in Dublin and that the constable by day should act as the watchman by night, why should they not extend the principle to smaller towns, and make it the general system for Ireland?

The plan which he would propose he would shortly recapitulate, although he had already indicated its principles. He did not propose the maintenance of the present corporate bodies; but he would not consent to the substitution of other corporate bodies, open to, at least, equal objections, in their place. In the present state of Ireland he did not see the necessity for their existence; he thought their interference with the administration of justice would lessen the chances of its impartiality and its purity, while their interference with the police was calculated to abate the efficiency of that body. He thought that corporate property should be applied to local purposes; but he was not prepared to intrust its management to a town-council, absorbing the whole of it, probably, in the payment of corporate officers. With respect to municipal purposes not connected with the police, not connected with the administration of justice, and not connected with the management of corporate property, he would leave the act, the 9th George IV. in operation, which permitted commissioners to be appointed, subject to popular control, and owing their election to popular nomination. Instead of having the Sheriff in counties of cities and towns appointed by the council, he would enable the Crown to appoint that magistrate. He would abolish all the inferior tribunals of seneschal and baronial courts. He would extend the jurisdiction of the assistant barristers. He believed that that jurisdiction gave entire satisfaction; at least there was a bill before the House calculated to extend it, on the express assumption that it was entirely satisfactory in its operation. Why not, therefore, introduce the assistant barristers' courts, with a jurisdiction more extended, if it should be required, into counties or towns, or if separate functionaries were requisite, let recorders be appointed by the Crown in large cities and towns, who should exercise a similar jurisdiction to that of the assistant barristers in the counties? In the cases of Dublin, Cork, and other towns, he believed the weight of criminal business would be too heavy to be discharged by the assistant barristers of the county. He could also suppose that there might be local tribunals required, subordinate to that of the assistant barristers, or recorders, for the trial of small debt cases. In the case of the county courts of this country, attempts had been made to improve their jurisdiction; and why not act on the same principle for Ireland, and constitute, where they were necessary, subordinate courts for the recovery of small debts, on some uniform principle. He was not in the slightest degree opposed, but on the contrary favourable, to the removal of all petty courts, whose functions could be better discharged by superior tribunals. But if they could give to the inhabitants of large towns, an easy and expeditious process for the recovery of small debts, he believed it would be a reform which would give great and general satisfaction to the people. The right hon. gentleman had asked, what would be done with the property and political rights of freemen, in case of the extinction of the old corporations? Why, the property and political rights of freemen would stand very much on the same footing under his plan, on which the bill of the right hon. gentleman proposed to place them. The right hon. gentleman did not propose that the old freemen should be part of the constituent body of the new corporations. They were exonerated in Ireland, as in England, from the performance of municipal duties, and deprived of municipal rights; whatever were the rights or property of the freemen, they were respected, under the right hon. gentleman's plan, as rights standing on special grounds, and not because the holders of them were to continue members of the new corporations. He saw, therefore, no more difficulty in dealing with the political and proprietary rights of the freemen under his plan than under that of the right hon. gentleman.

He was quite aware, that there were various minute points of detail, on which he had not thought it necessary at present to touch—that many members of corporate bodies, for instance, were trustees of harbours, and had some control over markets. He believed the House would feel he was justified in considering them as matters of detail, and that it would now be beside the question to enter into them. He did not apprehend there would be any serious difficulty in providing for these cases, and he was sure the House would not require from him, in a discussion on the second reading, to enter so much into matters of detail. But there were some important powers given to the town-councils under this bill, which were different from those assigned to them in England, and would, he was sure, prove to be matters worthy the most serious consideration. The bill appointed the town-councils visitors of all local and municipal boards or commissions connected with ports or harbours, with full power to inspect all accounts, papers, and documents relating to such ports or harbours. All accounts, books, and papers of the trustees or other officers connected not only with the town but with the harbour, were to be subject to the jurisdiction of the town-council, who were to have summary power over them. He saw it was assumed in the report, that to the corporate body belonged the general care of the commercial interests of the town in which they acted, of all such interests as were in many cities and towns under the direction of chambers of commerce or other voluntary associations. Was it meant that the duties now performed by chambers of commerce and voluntary associations should of right belong to the newly-constituted corporation? Were all the duties now belonging to harbour commissioners, chosen by persons with totally different qualifications and interests by persons deeply engaged in the commerce and interested in the shipping of the town—were all these to be subject to the control of the municipal council? And could it be believed that the business connected with commercial property, now superintended by a voluntary association called a chamber of commerce, should be transferred to the management of a town-council, elected by a constituency of £5 householders? This was the principle assumed in the commissioners' report. He would take the case of the chamber of commerce of Manchester, or any of those which had been instituted in our large towns. Could it be contended that the functions of a body of that nature must necessarily be devolved on town-councils, however elected? Could it be maintained that that council ought to have a right to compel the production of the papers of any local board of trustees, or commission connected with a harbour? These powers were much more extensive than any given to town-councils in England; and it was the more extraordinary to see these deviations from the English Bill, when the single argument in favour of the present measure was the necessity for assimilation and uniformity.

"I admit," said the right hon. baronet, "that the strict principle of governing Ireland with perfect civil equality, among the professors of all forms of faith, is the only one which can be adopted. In no single respect does the plan which I suggest trench upon that principle. Before the law all parties will stand equal in respect to privilege, and the administration of justice will not be tainted by the intermixture of party interests, and the heated passions of party conflicts. If I had recommended that there ought to be any civil distinction—if I were contending that there ought to be privileges conferred on one class which were withheld from another, I admit there would be a radical vice, a fundamental error, in the proposition. The chief object of our consideration ought not to be to assimilate precisely the system in Ireland to that which we have adopted in England, but to ascertain by what system equal privileges and equal justice may be best secured to all. Whatever be your system nominally and in theory, if the practice is repugnant from it, the evil of that practice is not mitigated by the speculative perfection of the theory. If by self-election you contrive to exclude, practically, one class from civil or corporation privileges, that system is defective and unjust; but I equally contend, that if by adopting the principle of popular election you give predominance to another class, to one political party over another, and leave the administration of justice in the hands of the dominant party, then, I care not what your theory may be, or the verbal enactments of your law, the injustice is effectually done by its practical operation, and popular election works the same evil in the one case which self-election did in the other. Have you read the evidence adduced before the commissioners? Do you believe that it will cause the cessation of religious animosity in Ireland, and the administration of equal law—to introduce the system of annual election in 120 Irish towns, and to place in the hands of the dominant party in every large town those officers by whom grand juries are to be chosen? I care not by whom undue influence is exerted: it is a matter of indifference whether by landlord or priest. We protest against the injustice that will flow from the selection of political and party men as the instruments by which justice is to be administered. Will any man rise in the House and say, expecting to be credited, that in determining municipal elections in Ireland, politics will not interfere? Is there a man who doubts that these elections will be influenced by political feeling? and that the future corporate bodies will be assemblies much more occupied in political agitation, than in the superintendence of mere local concerns? Is this a groundless impression of mine? No. I have for it the great authority on such a subject of the hon. and learned member for Dublin, who said, on the first day of this session, when speaking of the municipal councils of England: 'The sword is fastened in your vitals, and you feel it festering there. You regret the triumph the reformers have gained in the municipal councils. You know that there is not one of these councils that will not be converted into a Normal school for teaching the science of political agitation.' These were the expressions of the hon. and learned gentleman, with respect to the town-councils. He prophesied of them, that they would be 'the normal schools for teaching the science of agitation.'" [Mr. O'Connell: I said political agitation.] I was quoting from memory, but in order that there may be no ground for cavil, I will repeat the exact words of the learned gentleman, as he was reported to have delivered them. "England (said the hon. and learned member) had received an instalment of what was due to her, and right well has she used it. You have reason to regret it—you feel the sore festering within you—the triumph of the reformers in the great towns. Every one of them will be a normal school for the science of agitation." If that be true with respect to England, it is false with regard to Ireland? If it be true also with respect to Ireland, have we not ample ground to protest against the administration of justice being reposed in such hands? Sir, I make this appeal with great confidence in its justice—I make this appeal to you, and, through you, to public opinion—to that public opinion which, ultimately, will be the arbiter between our party disputes. It will not sanction with its approbation the institution of these schools for the science of agitation. It will not affirm them to be compatible with the pure administration of justice. We concede to you the full justice of your demand for equal law and equal rights. We admit that there ought to be no invidious distinctions—we are willing to relinquish any advantage which the possession of exclusive privileges and monopoly of corporate power may have conferred. When you proposed to transfer from the magistrates of Ireland the right of nominating the police force, I acquiesced in the justice of that proposition, believing, upon the whole, that, amid the heated passions of conflicting parties in Ireland, the chief governor of that country will be more likely to make an impartial and an efficient selection of the force by which peace is to be preserved and the law executed, than any local authorities. In deference to your wishes—in anticipation of the royal command—those who have been connected with associations endeared to them by many recollections, have, at the hazard of great personal sacrifices, declared their willingness, not only themselves to withdraw from societies of an exclusive character, but to use their influence in discouraging and suppressing them. We are thus fortified in our claim, that the power relinquished by one party without grudging or complaint, shall not be transferred to another; that there shall not be established, under the pretence of popular election, or any other pretence, a practical domination of one party over another, infinitely more galling and oppressive than that which is the object of complaint.

We ask of you to consider the present condition of Ireland—its present state of society—to recollect your own principles in respect to many subjects of legislation in which you have found it necessary to apply in Ireland a rule different from that adopted in this country. If you have reason to believe, that, in the present state of party feelings, annual elections in every town are likely to engender bad passions—if you have reason to believe that the town-councils so elected, will be converted into political clubs—we call on you, as you value religious peace—we call on you, as you value equal laws—as you prize the security and the integrity of this great empire, not to lend the sanction of your authority, of your moral and legislative authority, to the institution in Ireland of normal schools for teaching the science of agitation. But, above all, we demand of you, respectfully, but firmly, that you will not make the graduates in those schools, and the professors of that science, the chosen instruments to wield the civil force, and to dispense public justice.

Later in the evening, and in reply to Lord John Russell,—

Sir Robert Peel said, I will state at once, that I am desirous to give the House an opportunity of deciding between the two plans submitted to it; and with that view, I shall simply move an instruction to the committee. If the House should negative that, I shall not give the noble lord much trouble with respect to the details. I will not vote for the second reading of the bill, though I assent to one of its principles—that on which the extinction of existing abuses is promised, because I totally dissent from the other principle of the bill; and it appears to me that the best course to ascertain the sense of the House as to the comparative merits of the two measures in this respect, is to move an instruction to the committee on Monday for the substitution of my proposition, in the place of that of the right hon. gentleman opposite.

The bill was read a second time.

MARCH 8, 1836.

The Order of the Day was read, and the debate resumed on the amendment moved by Lord Francis Egerton, as an instruction to the committee.

SIR ROBERT PEEL spoke as follows: Before I address myself to the speech of the noble lord (Lord John Russell) who has just sat down, I beg to be permitted to offer some remarks in reply to the observations of the hon. and learned member for the city of Dublin, who left the House on the conclusion of his speech, and has just now returned. And I would beg leave to assure the House that I have no wish to provoke a contest with the hon. and learned gentleman in the course I shall pursue. I can promise the House that I shall not be tempted to indulge in any of that offensive vituperation which in his attacks upon me (even while absent) the hon. member has so liberally meted out. I never felt annoyed at these displays, and, therefore, have really no sufficient provocation to retaliate. He has said to-night that I misrepresented a speech of his (on the last night I had an opportunity of addressing the House on this subject) in my quotation of a particular passage which I then read; and which he said I had copied from a newspaper unfriendly to him. I explained that I had taken it from the Mirror of Parliament. The hon. and learned gentleman denied it, and insisted that it was taken from a hostile newspaper. In that respect, however, he was wrong, and I shall prove it by reading to the House the exact words (the ipsissima verba) from the copy of the Mirror now before me. I had mislaid the extract I had made at the time, and, having found it, will now trouble the House to permit me to read it again. The right hon. baronet read as follows from the Mirror:—"England has received an instalment of corporate reform, and well has she availed herself of it already. The sword is fastened in your vitals, and you feel it festering there. You regret the triumphs the reformers have gained in the municipal councils. You know that there is not one of these councils that will not be converted into a normal school for teaching the science of political agitation." The hon. gentleman has charged me [the right hon. baronet continued] and others, including my right hon. colleague, the late secretary for Ireland, with having been guilty of the commission of a deliberate insult to Ireland. I, Sir, feel this taunt the less, and have this for my consolation, that there has not been a single man of any party connected with the affairs of Ireland since the period when the hon. gentleman first took an active part in the politics of that country, who has not earned for himself similar vituperation, and been called the enemy of Ireland. We have one and all been called the enemies of Ireland. The hon. and learned member has charged me, in common with every other individual who has ever filled the office of chief Secretary for Ireland, with having offered an intentional insult to his country. Against such a charge I do not deem it necessary to say one word, as the same accusation, from the same quarter, has been levelled at every man who has rendered himself obnoxious to the political views of the hon. and learned member. In all this, there is nothing new; but I must observe that it was somewhat new to me to hear such a charge absolutely cheered by the ministers of the Crown. And you, the ministers of the Crown—who echoed the chorus of applause with which the hon. and learned gentleman's accusation was received by his friends—how long have you escaped from a similar charge preferred against you and your connections? Why, Sir, what—when speaking of Earl Grey's government, from the first moment of the noble lord's accession to power to his ultimate retirement from it—speaking of that government and of its disposition towards Ireland—what did the hon. and learned gentleman say? He said—"I now come to complaints and grievances of the popular party in Ireland. The Irish complain. Why? Because of the misconduct of the reforming administration, called, for shortness, 'Whigs,' towards their country. They allege—and they allege truly—that since Lord Grey came into office, to the present moment"—which, the House will observe, was after Lord Grey's retirement from office; so that the hon. and learned gentleman's observations embraced the whole period of his government—"nothing has been done for Ireland—no one advantage has been gained by the Irish people. Their enemies have been promoted and rewarded—their friends calumniated and persecuted. Never was there known a more uncongenial or more hostile administration in Ireland, than that which has

subsisted since Lord Grey came into office, and still subsists. All the power—all the authority—all the influence of state has been placed in Orange hands; and the exclusion of the popular party has been nearly as complete, and much more insulting than it was in the worst days of Goulburn and Peel. Their enemies and yours have been the exclusive subjects selected for every thing valuable in the country; and we are more insulted by the Orange instruments of power, than ever we were in the times of the most rank and dogged Tories." I hope, therefore, after reading these passages to the House, that the hon. and learned gentleman's charge against me, of a desire to insult Ireland, will not be taken for granted, unless it be supported by more substantial facts than any he has yet brought forward. The hon. and learned gentleman says, "Ireland ought to be contented with nothing but equal laws." Sir, we admit that proposition; we say that Ireland ought to have justice done to her; we say, that without equal laws she never can, and never ought to be content. Yes, Ireland ought to have equal laws, which should practically secure every British subject from oppression; which should entitle every man, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, to the same freedom of opinion, and the same freedom of action. But at the same time we say, that if, under the pretence of establishing a perfect analogy and identity of law between the two countries (between the circumstances and the state of society respectively existing, and in which there is no identity or analogy;) if the government introduce measures which cannot practically contribute to the administration of equal justice and the security of equal privileges, then we say you will fall into the very error against which Roman Catholics have protested: and whatever may be your theories of equal government, and your speculative enactments, you will only produce, practically, those unjust and unequal laws against which the noble lord has protested. Let us have, then, some definition of what it is in which that justice consists. The right hon. and learned gentleman, the Attorney-general for Ireland, has said, that identity of corporate institutions constitutes justice to Ireland. But has not he expressly avowed an opinion with respect to future claims, equally founded, as he insists, upon the plea of justice—and the grant of which, having gained this step, he will hereafter seek to obtain—using the present concession as a means for extorting what remains? I admit that the fear of ultimate consequences—the fear of having other things extorted upon the strength of it—furnishes no conclusive reason against granting this specific concession, if it be founded in justice. If this be a just demand—if the refusal of it would bestow unequal privileges, or work out an unequal distribution of justice—then, I say, it would be better to run the risk of any ultimate consequences than, by a refusal, to give ground to a well-founded feeling of dissatisfaction. I avow that I believe the principle of our rule in Ireland must be the equality of civil privileges, and a perfect and impartial administration of justice; I say that there is a prima facie case for establishing an identity of institutions between the two countries. We must wish that the institutions of the two countries should be assimilated; but this wish should be subordinate to the consideration of whether or not the proposed measure, which is only a means to an end—the end contemplated being the impartial administration of justice, would attain the end? Let us, then, throw away abstract matter of discussion and argument; and if, upon cool deliberation and inquiry, we find that this concession would be productive of consequences incompatible with the administration of justice and the security and tranquillity of Ireland, and the empire at large, let us pause before we agree to it, when the grant might be followed by a declaration of an intention to extort other desired measures by force—measures as revolting to the feelings of the legislature as the threatened repeal of the Union. Different opinions seem to prevail as to what justice really is amongst hon. members at the other side of the House. The hon. and learned member for Dublin is continually changing his ideas on the subject. He now says, that justice to Ireland consists in identity of municipal institutions. Not long since, the hon. and learned gentleman declared that there could be no justice unless there was an alteration in the present constitution of the House of Lords. At another time, he said that justice never could be had until the household suffrage was made universal. On other occasions, the hon. and learned gentleman has held it to be inconsistent with justice that the proprietor of an estate in England should be allowed to hold an estate in Ireland. Why, if—when upon the pretence of doing justice to Ireland, I am to be called upon to make concessions of this kind,—I see before me only a shadowy phantom which the hon. and learned member calls justice; but which constantly eludes my grasp, and which is the more formidable, because it is undefinable—and it assumes no shape but the one which the hon. and learned gentleman claims the exclusive privilege, year after year, of giving it—if I have, constantly flitting across me, a phantom of this description; is it not fit that I should pause and consider well the step I am about to take, before I plunge into the depths in which it may precipitate me?—Much has been said about analogy; but I say that analogy is no rule in such a case as this. If you are convinced that the concession to Ireland of institutions analogous to those of this country, will not produce an analogous enjoyment of rights under them; that the power intended to be made subservient to the administration of justice will be rendered, on the contrary, dangerous to the tranquillity of that country—then I say, we are bound to resist the motion; and I say at once, with that conviction on my mind, I would rather resist it at once, and take the consequences which are menaced by the hon. and learned gentleman, than, by advancing the first step in awarding this dangerous concession, which is mis-called justice, place in his hands an instrument which he would only wield to extort still further demands. I now come to the speech of the noble lord, and I inquire whether his plan or ours be more consistent with the principles of justice. I shall proceed to analyze the speech of the noble lord. The single argument upon which it rests is this,—that having given corporate reform to England and Scotland, he asks, “Why dare you refuse it to Ireland?” He seems to say to the House, “You shall not be at liberty to consider the relative circumstances of the two countries;” he contends that Ireland ought to have the institutions which the government by this bill recommend, and that the point is, therefore, concluded. Sir, the noble lord commenced his speech by repeating his pious horror at those “Destructives” who contemplate the destruction of the constitution, and by expressing his reverence and respect for existing institutions. The noble lord appeared so anxious to pursue such a consistent course of uniformity respecting the institutions of the country, not only as concerned the institutions now existing, but even those which are extinct, that I at first was rather disposed to imagine that he was about to lend me his powerful aid towards re-establishing and re-enriching the monastic institutions of the land; for he quoted a passage from that great political character, Mr. Burke, directed, as I at first thought, against the sudden and violent extinction of monastic institutions at the period of the Reformation, but which was really directed against the extinction of the monastic institutions of France; and the noble lord argued that, because we are willing to vote for the extinction of corporate authorities in Ireland, we are acting in direct violation of the precepts of Mr. Burke. I am surprised that there is not more uniformity of sentiment on the part of the members of his Majesty’s government with regard to the precise operation of their own bill; for the noble lord, the Secretary at War (Lord Howick), said, that the two measures—that proposed by us, and their own—were, as nearly as possible, identical. The noble lord, the more enamoured of his own measure (I suppose), on account of its resemblance to ours, observed, that however the features of the one might differ from those of the other, they evidently came from the same parent stock. They appeared so much alike, that none could mistake their common parental lineage:—

————— “Facies non est duabus “ una Nec diversa tamen, qualem decet esse sororum.”

“But,” said the noble lord, “the chief feature of resemblance between these illustrious sisters is this,—that they do both provide for the complete and entire extinction and annihilation of the old corporate system in Ireland. The noble lord finds that he is not a destructive; but, on the contrary, having raised the ancient fortresses he is about to erect—though not out of the old materials, but out of materials of his own creating, or collecting—new fortresses, which I believe will be the sanctuaries of equal injustice with the old ones. The noble lord has abandoned every argument which he at first advanced. He first said, that he would administer equal privileges to Ireland and to England. But before the noble lord had concluded that one part of his speech, it was apparent that he was afraid to establish an analogous principle in his dealings with both countries. I will first take the subject of the administration of justice. The objection which I suggested to the proposal of the hon. and learned gentleman opposite upon that head was, that to subject judicial officers to popular control, by popular election, would inevitably pervert and warp the due administration of justice. And so strongly did the noble lords and hon. gentlemen opposite feel the force of this observation, and so greatly did they distrust the plan they had themselves proposed, that it appeared they were unanimously ready to abandon that part of their plan; and they now think it would be better for the Crown than for town-councils to appoint those judicial officers. But they allow the town-councils in England, when the towns are counties of themselves, to elect the sheriffs. Having established one rule in England, why—unless there be a material variety—an essential difference, between the respective circumstances of the two countries, justifying the adoption of a different course of legislation towards each,—why does the noble lord and his friends permit the Lord-lieutenant to assume that power in Ireland? And here the House must allow me to refer to the speech made by the right hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. O’Loughlen) on the first night of the debate. The right hon. gentleman then charged me with a misconstruction of the bill. The charge of the right hon. gentleman was this:—that I led the House to believe that it was intended to have all the sheriffs and clerks of the peace appointed by the corporate town-councils, instead of their being nominated, as the bill enacted, by the Crown. If such was naturally the construction which the House applied to my speech, I must confess that, as a body, the House must be much more ignorant of the provisions of the bill than I supposed it to be; for I took it for granted that every gentleman knows that, in towns corporate—not being counties of cities or towns—there is no such officer as a sheriff. The right hon. gentleman himself has said, that there are only eleven towns and cities in Ireland where there are sheriffs. Now, there are fifty-four corporations provided for in this bill; there are only eleven towns, being counties of cities, in which there could, by any possibility, be either sheriff or clerk of the peace elected by the town-council. My objection is to their being elective officers, who, particularly after a contested election, shall have functions connected with the administration of justice. But, when the right hon. gentleman states that there are only eleven towns having sheriffs, and charges me with a breach of candour in not explaining that fact, I beg to remind the right hon. gentleman that he has also forgotten, in the heat of argument, to state the population of those towns. In those towns there are comprehended no less than 638,000 inhabitants; and this fact is, I think, a strong argument to shew the very important nature of the jurisdiction in question. I apprehend that the danger of corporations appointing justices does not consist in the number of towns wherein that power may be exercised, but in the sphere in which those towns exercise an influence. The right hon. gentleman also charged me with stating that the functions of the chambers of commerce would be usurped by these municipal bodies. I had quoted a passage from the report stating, that if the functions of chambers of commerce in large towns were to be transferred from merchants to municipal bodies, great injury would be inflicted on their commerce. It is true that no paragraph conceived, in precise terms, to that extent, is in the bill; but I believe, nevertheless, that the bill will give to the municipal authorities a control over commercial affairs which will be very injurious, and which is not allowed them in England; for the bill before you provides, that the body corporate shall be visitors of all boards within, and connected with, the borough. The corporation will have a power of interfering with the erection even of a bridge, and can inspect the accounts in such a case, for, I believe, a period of three months. Such an authority to call upon a chamber of commerce for its accounts, would be most injurious to commerce in England, and it would be equally so in Ireland. I was, therefore, not fairly liable to any attack for referring to this point. But I will resume the argument with respect to the administration of justice. The noble lord, the Secretary-at-War, has admitted that there ought to be some distinction between the provisions of the municipal bill for Ireland and the provisions in the bill for England—with respect to the administration of justice. It is admitted that this will form a fair subject for consideration in committee. You have consented that in Ireland the sheriff shall be appointed by the Crown, whereas in England he is appointed by the town-council. [Lord John Russell: the appointment must be approved by the Crown.]—It must; but I contended, on a former occasion—and I think successfully—that it would be better to vest the nomination directly in the Crown. Upon that head it is impossible to disguise the truth. Let hon. members read the evidence taken on the subject in 1825. In the report of the commission you will find a body of convincing testimony, shewing that popular election will give no control—I will not say against the perversion of justice—but it will not give any security or confidence that that justice will be properly administered. The same argument applies to the clerks of the peace in towns in Ireland: and why should not the same argument equally apply to the mayor? Mr. Barrington, before the committee of 1825, was asked—“Have you been able to observe any distinction between the character of magistrates acting under charters in towns, and magistrates acting in counties at large?”—He answered, I have, certainly. The magistrates acting under charters are not under the control of the Lord-lieutenant, and therefore there is no responsibility.”—That was Mr. Barrington’s opinion in 1825. Mr. Barrington did not say that the election of a mayor, by the popular voice of a predominant party, would be a security for the due administration of justice. He said that, because the magistrates of counties were under the immediate control of the Lord Chancellor, therefore justice was better administered. Why, then, should the mayor be a popular justice, chosen annually? Why should the mayor, after a severe contest, be invested with judicial power uncontrolled? Upon this point, also, hon. gentlemen opposite must give way; for they cannot resist the force of argument, and the evidence of practical authority, which will be brought against them, on this head, from their own reports. The fact is fully established, that town-councils in Ireland cannot be safely intrusted with the administration of justice. Then, Sir, with respect to the police, which is the next most important topic. I have shown, on a former occasion, that the government themselves distrusted the local authorities with respect to the control of the police. It has transferred the nomination of the police from the magistrates to the Crown. Now, this is what I complain of. When gentlemen opposite were reminded of the principle of centralization, they said it was much to be deprecated; and they asked, “Will not you trust the people with the administration of their own affairs? They use that argument with regard to a body popularly elected, and probably elected by those whose political opinions are in conformity with their own; but with regard to those whose political opinions are not in conformity with their own, they adopt a different mode of reasoning. Centralization is good with respect to the nomination of constables; but as to town-councils, centralization is to be deprecated, and local knowledge and experience are to be preferably trusted. But you do not apply that principle to the Irish magistrates. So it is, again, with respect to the mode of legislation. The difference of the situation of the Church in Ireland, from its situation in England, was allowed by this House to be a circumstance justifying a difference in the legislation to be pursued upon their respective affairs. But when I and my friends say, “Might not a similar difference of circumstances call for some different mode of legislation, with respect to municipal corporations in Ireland, from that we have pursued with respect to such corporations in this country?”—then the argument which was heretofore used by the hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to the Church is abandoned; and they reply, that “any intention to refuse to Ireland equal and analogous institutions with those of England, would justify the Irish people in attempting to repeal the Union.” What principle of reciprocity or of fairness is there in such reasoning? The Chancellor of the Exchequer has attempted to shew that the municipal police of Ireland are mere Dogberries, like the old watchmen of the metropolis, having no power, no efficiency. If so, why does the right hon. gentleman wish for their continuance? Is this one of the institutions of England which ought to be extended to Ireland? Is there no danger to be apprehended from allowing a political body to have, at its command, a constabulary force unlimited in its extent? I ask the noble lord to read the section of his own bill, and he will there find that the proposed corporate system is neither more nor less than this, that an indefinite number of towns (for though the bill says fifty-four, the number is still indefinite) shall have salaried officers, and a watch committee, having under it a separate armed force, paid by the municipal authorities, and authorized to patrol the towns and their neighbourhoods. Why, then, do you destroy the unity of your system by depriving the magistrates of the power of recommending these constables? There might be neighbouring towns having councils differing in political opinions, each possessing the power of appointing an indefinite number of constables, and each having different bye-laws. Let us suppose Protestant principles to prevail in one town, and principles of an opposite character in the other: do hon. gentlemen think that it would conduce to the peace of Ireland, that they should have these separate functionaries enforcing their separate bye-laws? Will it be for the good of the country to have a magistrate, popularly elected, trying offences in each town? The argument against this part of the measure is as conclusive as that with respect to the appointment of justices. It is condemned by the fact of its being equally at variance with your own principles and with common sense. Then comes the administration of property. The main and prominent argument in support of the bill has been, that we must first, and without delay, apply civil institutions to Ireland analogous to those which have been established in England; and my objection to the appointment of commissioners for the management of corporate property, is one on which the noble lord, if I rightly understood him, mainly relied. I should, therefore, be sorry to evade the argument which has been most relied upon, and which has made the most impression. The noble lord has asked whether the commissioners are to be permanent or temporary? Sir, I apprehend that the appointment of commissioners is rendered necessary upon these grounds. We admit that the towns, where the corporations possess any surplus property, have the right to apply that property to some local purpose, and that every facility should be given them to recover such property. But in many towns there are no local authorities to whom the charge of that property could be given. In the towns where the provisions of 9 Geo. IV. have been enforced, there are such authorities; but in those towns where they have not been enforced, it becomes necessary to provide a temporary and ad interim arrangement for taking charge of the surplus property; but it should be a provisional arrangement only. It has this advantage; it would enable you to obtain a short delay, in order that you might take a more general and comprehensive view of the future application of corporate property in Ireland. But what does the bill propose? To vest all the property in the town-councils permanently, without reserving to the Crown any control over them. Your bill, also, would vest in the new town-councils the right of tolls. Now, we say that it would be an improvement to suspend this privilege in the councils, until the extent of their just or expedient control over them could be defined. There is no matter more important than the regulation of tolls in Ireland. I am of opinion that a provision should be made for their total extinction. Let us see what was said by the hon. and learned member for Dublin, in 1825, before a committee on the state of Ireland. Being asked whether he could refer to any additional instances of corporation abuses, he answered—"That the corporations of Ireland continued to exact the tolls, although they had no longer a title to them. The tolls were formerly granted, and confirmed by succeeding kings, for the purposes of repairing bridges, keeping up fortifications, and other local establishments, civil and military. The former have gone to decay, and the latter are supported by presentment—still they levy the tolls. Is it possible to resume the amounts which the tolls now bring in, under the different corporations?—Yes, so far as the leases define them, I believe it is, but not to an extent equal to what the lessees now receive." Yes, as tolls may continue—but not to their present amount—which, I ask, would be the better course—to wait, before you appropriate the tolls, and see what kind of engagements for their management can be entered into—or at once to allow the town-councils to succeed to the right of collecting them? Now, I say, unhesitatingly, it would be more prudent to appoint commissioners for the temporary administration of them. There cannot be a doubt, apart from party contests, that the plan we recommend would be more conducive to the satisfaction and welfare of the people of Ireland. So much for the tolls. The noble lord seems shocked at the mention of commissioners—he seems absolutely astounded at the name of them, though I think his government should be less so than any other;—and that the noble lord should pretend that there is danger in the Crown appointing commissioners, when his government has been conducted, throughout, by the intervention of commissioners—is to me extraordinary indeed. Who was it that appointed commissioners to take charge of the poor-laws? Who was it that proposed to take from the local magistracy the whole of the turnpike trusts, by the very bill now passing through the House, and to vest the trusts in commissioners appointed by the Crown?

For the noble lord who has swallowed the windmill of the poor-laws, and is about to swallow the windmill of the turnpike trusts, to be choked by a pound of this fresh Irish butter—for him, after consolidating turnpike trusts under the superintendence of a commission—to be horrified at a commission for administering the management of tolls—is indeed straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. But it has been said, that it would be an insult to the people of Ireland not to give them corporate power. Why, Sir, is there any man among us who, on going home to-night, would feel conscious of civil or political degradation and inferiority, because he is living in the borough of Marylebone, or the city of Westminster, and cannot be saluted to-morrow morning by the sight of the Lord Mayor and town-council? The hon. and learned member for Cashel has gone so far as to argue that the government by municipal bodies is a natural right. If he had applied his argument to trial by jury, or any other of the great palladia of British liberty, there might be some foundation for it; but can he say that it is a natural right for communities to have municipal bodies—from which the people of Westminster, and Marylebone, and Birmingham, are at this moment excluded? If it be a natural right, it is a right which every great town in the empire which has hitherto flourished without corporations ought to enjoy. The Crown has the power to grant charters; and yet since the English municipal bill, giving that power, has been passed, it has not been in any single instance exercised. Have these towns been wise enough to wait and see the result of the experiment of the new corporations? Has the Crown been wise enough to do so? If we have so acted in England, why do we rush with such precipitation to establish corporations in Ireland? If England can wait, why is it an insult and “degradation” to Ireland to ask her to wait also? The object of this bill is stated to be, “the good regulation and quiet government of these towns in Ireland.” Do you believe that, in the present state of that country, to have annual elections of town-councillors precisely on the same principle that political elections are conducted, will produce the “good regulation and quiet government” of those towns? The struggle of political parties will be constantly kept up; and the corporate bodies will be so constituted as to be capable of being influenced by individuals representing their sentiments, and of being perverted to party purposes, whenever occasion may arise for those individuals to exert the influence so acquired for the promotion of their own objects. Is this mere conjecture? Why, this day’s post brings an account of the institution of a club in Dublin, established for the express purpose of controlling the new system of municipal government which is about to be introduced. This is a specimen of the probable working of that system, to the control of which Protestant property and Protestant privileges are about to be consigned. Truly, indeed, has it been said, that “coming events cast their shadows before them,”—and it is a shadow under the chilling influence of which impartial justice, and the enjoyment of civil rights, must wither from the land. I hold in my hand the evidence I speak of, to the effect already produced by the anticipation of the introduction of this bill into Ireland. It is an account of the establishment of what has been termed—“The central independent club of the city of Dublin,” which originated in a meeting held in the Royal Exchange, Dublin, on the 13th of February, 1836. The object of the club is explained in a circular which I hold in my hand, and which says that its institution is imperatively demanded by the efforts which the old corporators are making to perpetuate their rule.—[“Hear, hear.”] Well, if that cheer from the hon. members is called for by “the efforts of the old corporators,” strip “the old corporations” of their authority. When hon. members opposite give such unequivocal proof of their apprehensions of the danger that may arise from the continued existence of the old corporators, the cheer by which they express it is but a noisy argument in favour of the proposition of my noble friend. That cheer is an admission of the inconvenience that must inevitably arise from these corporations becoming the arena for those contentions of faction, in which the dispute will be for victory at the sacrifice of justice. That cheer establishes that fact; and I can assure hon. gentlemen that the only way to prevent such a result, is to extinguish corporations, and intrust to the Lord-lieutenant those powers which are necessary to secure the impartial administration of justice. I shall again refer to the circular from Dublin, to which I have just adverted. It goes on to say, that to the want of organization may be attributed the fact of their not having already obtained the advantages of corporate reform. A house has been taken where offices shall be established, and a legal staff stationed, to afford every facility to the citizens to obtain the municipal franchise, the very moment the bill of the Attorney-general shall become the law of the land. By this means it is foretold, by the same authority, that the club will be able to secure "all offices of dignity and influence." So then it appears that the new offices about to be created are to be subjected, not to the choice of the citizens, but to the dictation of this club! It appears, further, that this club is to be guided by certain rules. The seventh rule directs the collection of subscriptions (not the least important function of such a body). The fifth rule directs the formation of sub-committees and parochial clubs; the sixth relates to the receiving of notices. The thirteenth general rule is, that two gentlemen from each parish shall be elected by ballot, and that those so elected shall constitute a general committee; so that the prospect of "quiet government" held out under the bill is the succession of these annual parish elections. Do his Majesty's ministers mean to tell me, in the face of this intimation of the manner in which the municipal body is to be appointed, that the effect (though it may be the object) of their bill, will be to provide for the good and quiet government of the enfranchised town? I insist upon it that the establishment of this club dominion, under the delusive pretext of applying analogous institutions to the two countries, will subject Ireland to innumerable evils; to the operation of the most pernicious species of exclusive influence; to an undue and partial administration of justice, which is the principal alleged grievance under the old system. I am ready to contend with his Majesty's ministers for the administration of equal and impartial justice. I am most ready to admit that I do not believe that Ireland can be safely governed on any other principle. But while I admit this, I shall repeat, that it is of far more importance that the really equal and impartial administration of justice should be established in that country, than that the shadow should be introduced without the substance, in a plausible attempt to imitate the example of English institutions. Allusions have been made to my former conduct, and we have been told, if we do not grant this measure we should go back and repeal the Act of Catholic Emancipation. I do not see that connection. I am very far from regretting the course which I have taken in assisting to effect the removal of Catholic disabilities. Notwithstanding the experience I have since acquired, and the disappointment I have since sustained, yet I am still of opinion that in 1829 the time had arrived when it was no longer safe to withhold the claims of his Majesty's Catholic subjects in Ireland. I stated at that time, that though by no means so sanguine as many others were of the effect that would be produced by the Emancipation Bill, yet considering all the circumstances by which the question was then surrounded, the close divisions in the House of Commons, the growing feeling amongst the people of England in favour of Emancipation, and the divisions in the opinions of those in Ireland who had been opposed to it,—considering all these things, I felt it my duty to recommend the complete removal of the Roman Catholic disabilities. The course I am now adopting in recommending the abolition of the corporations, is quite consistent with the principle upon which I then acted. Its effect will be, to remove a great source of exclusiveness, which all agree in regarding as highly prejudicial to the interests and the happiness of Ireland. As the Roman Catholics then complained of exclusion from offices, so, I contend, will the Protestants complain of their exclusion from what they are entitled to—not from their numbers, but from their wealth, their influence, and their intelligence. As in the case of Emancipation, my willingness was publicly avowed to encounter any risk that might be incurred, rather than perpetuate the danger I saw existing, by longer withholding the claims of the Catholics,—so at present, when the question is not one of civil equality, but one which involves the predominance of one sect over another, I am quite ready, in accordance with the same principle, to come forward and resist any measure, however plausible, which is likely to diminish the security of the Protestant establishment, and exclude Protestants from the corporations altogether. I know not whether the Protestant mind of this country will be satisfied with a measure for the abolition of the corporations of Ireland; but this I know, and, supported by the conscientiousness of the motives by which I am actuated, I say it fearlessly,—that the measure which I advocate is conformable to justice and reason, and calculated to promote good and quiet government, to soften down religious acerbity, and to secure an impartial administration of the laws. Rather, therefore, than consent to a measure of an opposite tendency, which would introduce those corporate institutions into towns—where they must give rise to partiality and exclusiveness, weaken the just and salutary effect of the civil power, and form so many nuclei of assemblies more dangerous than themselves—I shall prefer the lesser evil, and incur the lesser hazard, of rejecting it altogether.

The amendment was negatived. The House went into Committee, pro forma, and resumed. Committee to sit again.

EXCISE DUTIES ON SOAP.

MARCH 15, 1836.

In the discussion on Mr. Handley's motion for repealing the Excise Duties on Soap, and augmenting the Customs Duties on Foreign Tallow,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he thought the right hon. gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had not understood the precise nature of the complaint which had been made against the course he had pursued in respect to the stamp-duty. The noble lord had not charged the Chancellor of the Exchequer with having given a pledge on that subject on the part of the House. It was quite unnecessary for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to vindicate himself from that charge, for it was a charge that had never been brought, and by no man of common understanding could it have been brought. Every member must be quite aware that the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not, on the part of that House, give any pledge whatever. But the complaint was, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had pledged the government—that he had pledged himself and the government, in respect to a reduction of a single class of duty, and it was considered unfair and impolitic to give any such pledge before they were in a condition to know the amount of available surplus, or whether there would be any surplus at all. It was matter of complaint that he should give a pledge to one class without considering the claims of other classes. The right hon. gentleman said, “Don't prejudge the question; don't let us have a premature discussion.” Why, what had the right hon. gentleman done? Had he not prejudged the question? As far as it was possible, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had entered on a premature discussion. Not only so, but, as far as he and the government were concerned, he had given a pledge for the reduction of the stamp-duty on newspapers; the hon. member for Lincoln said, he was so satisfied with the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that though he desired a total abolition of the duty, he was content with the promise he had received as to this one particular class of taxation, and, being ready to listen to a reasonable compromise, he would not press his own view of the subject. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been pressed on the subject of the spirit duty, what had been his course? He had declined to express an opinion with reference to that duty. At any rate, it was not fair that one particular class should have a pledge in favour of a reduction of taxation till the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought the whole subject of taxation before the House, and the government should remain unpledged equally with the House, in order that it might consider impartially the claims of all. This was the nature of the charge which had been brought against the right hon. gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and from that charge he was in no degree relieved. The right hon. gentleman said it was necessary he should bring before the country his project in respect to the stamps, though in his project he had retained the whole amount of the duty; there was the old schedule without any alteration. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer was just as much pledged to reduce the stamp duty as if the schedule had contained the new duty. If there had been a prima facie case in favour of the proposition of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Handley), he was entitled to bring it forward. Though it was dealing in a partial manner to make engagements for reduction of taxation before it was ascertained whether there would be any surplus at all, yet if he could make out a prima facie case, he was justified in pressing for relief. But, at the same time, although the Chancellor of the Exchequer had pledged himself to one alteration, the principle was so open to public inconvenience, that he (Sir R. Peel) could not consent to make an exception in favour of this proposition. He adhered to the example of the right hon. gentleman on former occasions, and he condemned his departure from it; and, although he thought that all the interests of the country had a fair and equal right to the consideration of the House, without any positive pledge of relief being given to any one in particular, he should not vote for the principle of this question, because he thought the whole subject should be considered comprehensively, and the hon. member had not shown a prima facie case. He saw no sufficient peculiar case of hardship—no case so strong as to justify a departure from the course which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had pursued on former occasions. He would not consent to increase the duty on tallow, in the present condition of this country, for many reasons. How could they expect that the portion of our manufactures which depended for success on a foreign market could thrive, if they did not permit a reciprocity of commerce; and if, on the contrary, we increased the duty on the raw material in which they were able to pay us? He was not able to perceive any sufficient cause which operated to warrant an exception in the case of Russian tallow to the general rule. The case of soap was a distinct one, and the arguments applying to it were altogether inapplicable to the other half of the question to which he directed the attention of the House. The relative position in which Russia stood to this country ought to receive particular attention. It came very little into competition with our commerce; it did not interfere with our manufactures in foreign markets. It sent us raw material, and took our manufactured articles in return. And unless the proposition extended to foreign oil as well as tallow, the expected advantages would not result to the agricultural interest; and if that article were also saddled with a protecting duty, it would have a serious effect on a branch of our manufactures that could badly endure it. Candles would inevitably rise in price, and were it considered how much this would interfere with the means, and comforts, and remuneration of the handloom weavers, who worked so many hours by candle-light, they would pause before they created such an additional embarrassment to the extensive branch of manufactures carried on by its assistance. By acceding to this measure, it was obvious that we should interrupt the course of commerce which now happily existed between this country and Russia, would interfere with the market it afforded for our present manufactured produce, as well as with the raw material, which supplies an important article for our manufacture, and would also increase the expense of candle-light, so necessary for our manufacturing purposes; consequences which would not at all repay us for any possible benefit that might immediately result to the agricultural interest, and which, looking to its intimate connection with our commercial and manufacturing interest, he did not expect would ultimately be for its benefit either. On these combined considerations he could not give his vote for the measure before the House.

On a division the numbers were—Ayes, 125; Noes, 195: majority against the motion, 70.

COMMUTATION OF TITHES (ENGLAND).

MARCH 25, 1836.

On the question that the House resolve itself into a Committee on this Bill,—

SIR ROBERT PEELE asked if the noble lord had any alterations to propose in the bill?

Lord John Russell replied, that he had none of any importance, or at all affecting the principle of the bill. He therefore should be glad to get into committee, in order to hear the suggestions and opinions of hon. members on each clause as proposed.

Sir Robert Peel said, that many cases would arise which were not provided for in the provisions of this bill. He wished to know in what way the modus was to be disposed of—who were the authorities to decide whether the allegations that a modus existed were valid or not?

Lord John Russell said, he had a clause to propose to set that point at rest, but at present he would not enter into the details of it.

Sir Robert Peel then said, he had put certain questions to the noble lord merely for the purpose of being guided in considering the details of the bill by the answers he might receive. He, for one, had no objection to the House resolving at once into committee, if the noble lord so desired; but there being many important omissions in the bill, and the noble lord not being prepared to supply them, he (Sir R. Peel) should certainly feel some difficulty in offering suggestions to do that which the noble lord was not prepared to do in respect to his own measure.

A long conversation then ensued, towards the close of which,—

Sir Robert Peel said, he regretted that the House had been involved in the present discussion on the principle of the bill before the question of going into committee; because, whatever his opinion might be on some important particulars, not being opposed in principle to a compulsory commutation, he should have been disposed to forego all preliminary objection, and to go at once into committee, in order to have an opportunity of obviating any objections of detail which might be made to the various provisions of the bill, and rendering it in all its parts as complete and objectionable as possible. In point of fact, the principle of compulsory commutation being conceded, the policy of applying it depended so much on the machinery by which it should operate, that it was difficult to consider the principle apart from the details; the policy of admitting the principle depended almost wholly on the perfection of the details, and the manner in which they were to be applied. But, at the same time, after the very able and powerful speech of the hon. member for Cumberland, whose opinion on this question was entitled to so much weight, urged, as it had been on the present occasion, with such consummate knowledge of the subject, and so much clearness of expression as to render its subtleties perfectly intelligible to those less conversant with its details, he was not surprised that the noble lord had thought it necessary to vindicate the leading principles of the bill; and, in the outset, he must say, he entirely concurred in the justice of one observation made by the noble lord—that even with respect to a voluntary commutation, and much more in attempting to carry into effect a compulsory principle, it was infinitely more easy to suggest difficulties than satisfactorily to obviate them; and he, for one, should therefore be the last to urge it as a party objection against any government, that they had made an honest attempt to settle this question on the principle of compulsion. Still the noble lord must admit that it was most advisable, for the interests of the country and the government, before the opinion of the House was finally pledged in favour of that principle, or any other, to foresee all the difficulties and various objections which occurred to different minds, by which they might be accompanied, in order, admitting their force, if possible to obviate them, than afterwards to find, having adopted a particular measure for the settlement of tithes, and passed it into a law, that, on experience, it was incapable of practical operation. If it were necessary, in such a case, to revoke what had been done, having once passed a bill on the subject, they might indeed altogether despair of effecting a commutation of tithes on a right and satisfactory principle. He therefore repeated, that he for one would allow no party feeling to enter into the discussion of a bill brought forward with the proper intention of effecting a commutation of tithe on just principles. He apprehended, that those who were anxious for this—he meant the settlement of the question upon just principles—would feel thankful rather than otherwise to those who, whilst there was yet time to consider them, urged the objections which they entertained against the principles on which the present bill was founded. The noble lord maintained that the compulsory principle possessed a great advantage over the voluntary principle; and he was willing to admit the justice of that opinion, qualified to this extent—that the compulsory principle adopted should be consistent with equity, and likely to give satisfaction; because, unless it were a just principle, and likely to give satisfaction to the parties concerned, its adoption, however speculatively preferable, would not, in point of fact, be attended with any advantage. The noble lord stated his objection to a voluntary principle: he stated that, if a voluntary principle were adopted, compulsion being held out as the alternative in prospect, they might depend on it they would thereby prevent any persons from taking advantage of a voluntary arrangement. Now, that was precisely his objection to the present bill. They were about to extend the voluntary system for two years, at least a year and a half beyond the six months already propounded in the bill; but all that time, according to the argument of the noble lord, must be spent quite unprofitably, because every one would naturally consider how far the compulsory principle proposed would be favourable to his interest, and whether he should wait for its operation. But if parliament declared, "We give fair time for voluntary arrangement, without precluding ourselves from the compulsory principle—we are not prepared to state what that compulsory principle is—we will take the experience of the intervening period, in order to guide us in the application of a compulsory principle, which we will not now indicate to you, but which, if necessary, we shall hereafter adopt and act upon,"—in that case, they would not throw in the way of voluntary arrangement that impediment which the noble lord anticipated, and which must prevail, if they indicated now the precise terms on which compulsion would hereafter be adopted. There were immense difficulties in the way of carrying a compulsory principle into effect. He could easily conceive, that if they considered only the interests of two parties, the tithe-owner and tithe-payer, and if they could assume that the interests of one class of tithe-owners were identical with those of every other, one man fairly representing the whole, it might be possible to make an arrangement which would be satisfactory as between the great mass and the church. But, unfortunately, another element must be taken into consideration. They had not only to do justice between the great interests concerned, but, in order to give satisfaction, they must do justice tolerably well between every individual constituting a portion of the aggregate. It would not do to administer what an hon. member, who had spoken, called rough justice. This was not a case in which such a principle was at all applicable. They could not apply the doctrine of compensation here, as they did so beautifully in dynamics, so as by the contraction of one part of the machine to compensate for the dilatation of the other, and ultimately to produce a just equilibrium, a perfect and equable motion. That principle was not applicable in the present case. By doing manifest injustice to a great class of tithe-payers, they would not, in point of fact, be at all benefiting the Church, they would be defeating their own ends without serving the Church. Wherever in one place a reduction was made, the Church might suffer, but where by way of compensation to the Church more was required than the Church was fairly entitled to, they were unjust to individuals, and the influence of the Church would suffer from the wrong done in its name. He did not mean to enter into the question of the maximum or minimum propounded in the bill, but he could not help calling the attention of the House to one fact—that, from many concurring circumstances, a great fluctuation was taking place in the value of the land: for instance, he believed there were applications, this session, for at least forty or fifty railroads. Suppose them successful—he did not mean successful to the speculators, but suppose the applications granted, suppose them passed into law, and railroads established, would not the necessary consequence be, to cause a very great revolution, which it was not difficult to foresee, in the value of land? Had not the improvements of steam-navigation in Scotland made the greatest possible change in the relative value of land in that country? What would be the consequence of improved commutation of land carriage by means of steam? It would be undoubtedly, to diminish the disadvantages under which distant land at present laboured; to a certain extent it would, in point of fact, annihilate space, and bring into competition with land hitherto enjoying the monopoly of town supply, land situated at a greater distance, hitherto uncultivated in consequence of its situation, but which intrinsically, when cultivated, might be more valuable and productive, and, when steam conveyance was more rapid and extensive, would come into most formidable competition with land, which, on account of its vicinage, now possessed the advantage of the market. What would be the bearing of all this on the produce on that land? It might hereafter become absolutely necessary to convert what to a considerable extent had enjoyed the monopoly of the market into pasture, or its produce might become greatly diminished in value. Now, was it not dangerous at once, in such a case, to apply the compulsory principle, and estimate the value of tithe on the average of the last seven years, as a future inextinguishable, permanent, unvarying rent-charge on the land? Was there no danger that the parties in possession of that land might feel the utmost dissatisfaction with the arrangement they were now making, and protest that by acts which they could not contemplate, to which they were no necessary parties—namely, encouragements afforded to steam-communication—the value of their land had been materially reduced? Against those acts they might have no right to protest; but would they not have a right to protest against the assumption of an arbitrary value, to be fixed as the basis of a permanent charge in time to come? Those were matters which well deserved mature consideration. There was great advantage in the voluntary principle, the circumstances with respect to tithe collections were so different in places; even in the same parish there were frequently two or three different kinds of tithe to be collected. The value of vicarial tithe differed very much from rectorial, and the expense of collecting the one was different from that attaching to the other; so that it was exceedingly difficult to say beforehand what was the principle which they ought to apply to compel the commutation of both. It was much better, therefore, to call into operation in such circumstances the voluntary assent of parties—that assent, which in all civil matters was of the utmost importance, and the failure of which was the only reason for the application of law, than at once, without experience, to apply a general compulsory principle. He hoped the noble lord really intended to make some alteration in this part of the bill. He did not mean, of course, by the voluntary assent of parties, because he admitted, even if a voluntary principle were determined on, so much of compulsion should be added, that a certain number of parties interested in a parish should necessarily bind the remainder, lest by an extreme rigid adherence to principle they should altogether prevent the completion of any arrangement on this subject. He was sorry to have been led into this discussion of the principle of the bill. At the same time it was wise to anticipate the difficulties by which they were encumbered, and not to be betrayed by a general desire to effect an arrangement, the policy of which, if practicable, all would admit, into the adoption of a particular measure, which, hereafter finding it impracticable, it might be necessary to revoke. He would offer no opposition to going into committee, and he would lend his best assistance towards perfecting the material details of the bill; but, so great were his apprehensions with respect to the application of any compulsory principle, that he very much feared investigation in the committee would not remove them. If, however, his fears were removed, if he saw that a compulsory principle could be applied to individual cases, so convinced was he of the policy of effecting an arrangement on this most important subject, that no minor difficulties would induce him to withhold his consent to it.

The House then went into committee; several clauses were agreed to; and the House resumed.

MUNICIPAL REFORM (IRELAND.)

MARCH 28, 1836.

Lord John Russell moved the third reading of this bill, and was followed by Mr. Shaw, who, at the conclusion of a splendid speech, moved, "That the bill be read a third time that day six months."

SIR ROBERT PEEL begged in the outset to claim the indulgence of the House, not only on account of the lateness of the hour, but in consequence of other disadvantages, which he felt so severely, as to render it doubtful to him whether he should be able to make himself asible or intelligible. He had already, on a former occasion, endeavoured to state fully and completely what his views were upon the subject of corporate reform in Ireland; but after the speech of the hon. and learned member for Tipperary (Mr. Sheil,) who he hoped was in his place—[the hon. member was absent]—in which such direct personal allusions were made to himself, he should be unwilling to allow that speech to pass by without reply. With the confidence also which he (Sir R. Peel) felt in the justice of the course he had pursued, and in the validity of the opinions he had formed, seeing that the speech of the hon. and learned member had made considerable impression on the House, he confessed he should be unwilling to permit the debate to close without manfully coming forward to examine the conclusions which were adopted in that speech, and to deal with the reasoning by which its arguments were supported. He said with the reasoning, because after all it was only the reasonings of the hon. gentleman which ought to make any impression on the House. He wished that the speech had been less prepared and less elaborate, because he was afraid that the hon. and learned gentleman was in such haste to arrive at those portions of his speech which he knew would amuse and delight his audience, that he forgot in the course of his impetuosity to grapple with the speech which preceded it, and which was as conspicuous for the clearness of its statements, and the closeness of its arguments, as the hon. and learned gentleman's speech was remarkable for abstaining from any notice of those clear and admirable arguments, and for the ingenuity and fluency of its diction. He hoped that the hon. and learned gentleman was in his place. If he were absent, he was sure the House would admit that it would be alien to his feelings to say any thing in the hon. and learned gentleman's absence, which he would not say in his presence. Whether present or absent, he would always admit the singular power which the hon. and learned gentleman exhibited, and that he thought Ireland had reason to be proud of sending a man to that House endowed with such rare and extraordinary talent. But in making that admission, he must take leave at the same time to strip the tinsel from the hon. and learned gentleman's arguments, and endeavour to ascertain what solid and substantial metal they contained. He thought that the hon. and learned gentleman's argument amounted to this:—first, that he had a doubt whether the dissolution of corporations in Ireland was not at variance with the Act of Union; and, second, whether the dissolution of these corporations was not at variance with the spirit of the measure of parliamentary reform. The hon. and learned gentleman also expressed a doubt whether the dissolution of corporations in Ireland, and the refusal of the majority or minority in that country to participate in corporate privileges, was not really inconsistent with the spirit of the Act of 1829, by which the disabilities of Roman Catholics were removed. Many portions of the hon. and learned gentleman's speech—those portions which were most loudly cheered, and which most delighted his audience—had nothing, as the hon. and learned gentleman knew as well as he knew, to rest upon. It might be very easy for the hon. and learned gentleman, in the course of a premeditated speech, to allude to the course of conduct pursued by a particular party, and to the qualities possessed by particular peers. It might be easy for the hon. and learned gentleman to allude to the boldness of the Duke of Wellington, the dexterity of Lord Lyndhurst, the excitement of Lord Winchelsea, or the inspiration of Lord Roden. All this it was easy for the hon. and learned gentleman to accomplish; and although it had no reference whatever to the matter in debate, it was necessary that it should be noticed in reply, lest, as the character of the cheer by which it was received seemed to indicate, it should be taken as comprehending an overpowering argument against the party on this side of the House. Then the hon. and learned gentleman, pursuing the same career of eloquence, alluded to Dr. Philpotts, in connection with the Intimidation Committee. The hon. and learned gentleman knew that he should lose half his cheer if he did not introduce the Intimidation Committee. The hon. and learned gentleman recollected that his hon. and learned friend (Sir W. Follett) was member for Exeter; he recollected, too, that Dr. Philpotts was bishop of Exeter; and in order to meet the letter which the hon. and learned member for Exeter had just read, implying that a Roman Catholic bishop had summoned a meeting of his clergy for the purpose of considering the most effectual mode of securing the return of a popular member, the hon. and learned gentleman exclaimed, "Yes, but I refer you to the Intimidation Committee, and to the part which the Bishop of Exeter took." The cheers with which that exclamation was received was redoubled by those who were not aware of the fact, that from the first word of the report to the last word of the evidence taken before the Intimidation Committee, the name of the Bishop of Exeter did not once appear. He repeated, that these parts of the hon. and learned gentleman's speech, though very striking and very amusing, had no reference whatever to the matter under discussion; and for that reason he (Sir R. Peel) should take no further notice of them. He would come, then, to the hon. and learned gentleman's argument. The hon. and learned gentleman said, "You who contended that the violation of the property of the church was an infraction of the Act of Union, will you not admit that a violation of the property of corporations must be an infraction of the Act of Union also?" That question was put as it by a man who felt certain that his interrogatory was founded in reason and justice; but as there was a direct guarantee in the Act of Union in favour of the Irish Church, and none whatever in favour of Irish corporations, he did not exactly feel the force of the hon. and learned gentleman's inference, that because it was contrary to the Act of Union to violate the rights, privileges, and property of the Irish Church, which rights, &c., were distinctly guaranteed by a clause in that Act, therefore it must also be a violation of the Act of Union to dissolve other institutions which were not so guaranteed. With respect to the other Act to which the hon. and learned gentleman referred, and in which he felt a more direct interest—namely, the Act to reform the representation of the people in Ireland—he must say that, although he opposed that Act; although he thought the power it gave was dangerous, yet he must also contend that there was no analogy between a reform of the representation of the people and municipal reform. In the first place, the hon. and learned gentleman assumed that the opposition were opposed to all municipal reform in Ireland, and he exclaimed, “You who are opposed to corporate abuses in England and Scotland, how can you sanction their continuance in Ireland—having corrected them in one part of the kingdom, how can you refuse to correct them in another?” He denied that the opposition refused to reform abuses in Ireland. They professed their readiness to correct abuses, but they did say that they would not consent to the re-establishment of corporations in Ireland, and to the perpetuation of similar abuses under another name. They were ready and willing to remedy every just cause of complaint connected with the ancient corporation system in Ireland. Therefore, again, he said that the hon. and learned gentleman had no right to taunt those who brought forward the bill for a reform in the representation of the people of Ireland with inconsistency, because, according to a false assumption of his own, they refused to redress abuses in the Irish corporate system. It was absolutely necessary, he apprehended, to the existence of the constitution, and of the government of this country, that an Imperial Parliament should exist. If, then, a more direct control were given to the people of this country over the election of the members who composed the House of Commons, could a similar power of control be refused to the people of Ireland? In justice it could not. And as regarded the present measure, if they proposed to retain the corporations in Ireland, and to exclude the Roman Catholics from an equality of privileges, then he admitted that they would be open to the objections of the hon. and learned gentleman. In the case of the reform of parliament, it was absolutely essential to retain the parliament: and as an extension of privilege had been given to the people of England, it became necessary that a similar extension of privilege, as regarded the right of election, should be given to the people of Ireland. But on the present occasion the question was—Is it for the good of Ireland—is it for the welfare of the people of Ireland—is it absolutely essential to the pure and impartial administration of justice in Ireland, that corporations in that country should continue to exist? That was the point upon which the two sides of the House were at issue. The hon. and learned gentleman had referred to the part which he took in proposing the Act of 1829 to parliament. The hon. and learned gentleman was well aware that the expectations which were formed with respect to that Act had been disappointed. The hon. and learned gentleman knew that the most confident anticipations were entertained, that the effect of that Act would be the diminution of religious animosities, and the restoration of political concord. It was in vain to deny that it had not had this effect. It was in vain to deny that there existed at this moment as much acerbity of party spirit as existed during the political disabilities on the part of the Roman Catholics. But, as he had said before on a former night, that fact did not alter his view of this question. He believed then, and still believed, that in the then state of public opinion in Protestant England—with the Protestant mind in Ireland inclined for its concession—with a parliament so closely divided in numbers, that it was impossible to say what might have been the result of a division—with the Protestant mind so nearly equally balanced—he thought then, as he thought now, that there would have been greater danger to the Protestant interests in continuing a resistance to Catholic concession, than in determining to settle that question; and certain events which occurred shortly after that measure was passed, made him rejoice at the removal of all political distinctions between Catholics and Protestants. But the hon. and learned gentleman's argument was this—“Notwithstanding the failure of all your expectations—and I admit that political and religious animosities still exist—yet they continue to exist because you have not gone far enough—you must make still further concessions, and then the expectations you originally entertained will be fulfilled.” Had the hon. and learned gentleman any foundation for that argument? The hon. and learned gentleman had found it necessary to account for the failure of the Emancipation Act. He said that it was conceived in an ungenerous spirit, and that, at the moment when the Act was passed, we continued the exclusion of an individual, the hon. and learned member for the city of Dublin, who had been elected for the county of Clare. In considering the whole of one connected and comprehensive scheme, it was very easy to select a small incident in it, and say, “The refusal of this one thing has vitiated all the rest—this ought to have been a prominent part of the measure.” But, in the first place, he disclaimed altogether any personal motive or feeling on the occasion. For those who conceded the measure of Roman Catholic relief to have thought that it was any compensation to them to have visited a single individual with an exclusion that could continue only for a few minutes, was a most ridiculous supposition. What they had to consider was, the best method of effecting their object; and upon the whole his belief was, that they took the course most likely to effect the object they had in view; namely, to pass that Act, which was a work of no small difficulty, through both Houses of parliament. But what was the exclusion of the hon. and learned gentleman? He was elected for the county of Clare under a state of the law which, whatever might be its policy, actually excluded him. He was elected at a time when he knew that an oath would be administered to him which he could not conscientiously take. The object of the Relief Bill was to provide that Roman Catholics should in future be qualified to sit in parliament without the necessity of taking that oath. The hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Sheil) said, that we ought to have provided that those who had been previously elected ought to have been entitled to sit in parliament, notwithstanding the enactment of the law, which practically prohibited their sitting there. When they now heard of the intimidation under which he and his colleagues at that time acted, what, if he had proposed that the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. O’Connell) should, notwithstanding the law, have been entitled to a seat in parliament, would have been said then upon the subject of intimidation? The hon. and learned gentleman had said that all feelings of gratitude for the Act of 1829 were lost. He would not speak of gratitude; no gratitude was claimed, for it was the performance of a public duty, for which no gratitude was due. But the hon. and learned gentleman had said, that all the substantial benefits of that Act were forgotten by the Roman Catholics, because one individual was deprived of his seat during the then existing parliament; and the hon. and learned gentleman, by his argument, implied that the hon. and learned member for the city of Dublin had been induced to take the course he had since done, in consequence of that step. Far be it from him to pass so bitter a satire upon any one as to say, that, from personal disappointment and exclusion, he should take a political course which he should not have done under other circumstances. But he believed that the feelings of the Roman Catholics, with regard to the passing of that Act, and their feelings towards the authors of it, were not identical with those which had been expressed by the hon. and learned member for Tipperary. He held in his hand a letter, which was addressed to him in 1830, by one of those whose political disabilities were removed by that Act of Parliament. It was written soon after the dissolution of the government of the Duke of Wellington. It was in these terms:—“You have retired from office. A great portion of my political life has, I trust, been fairly and honourably opposed to yours. You have made ample amends for what I deemed your public sins, in carrying the Relief bill, and applying your great talents and attainments to the success of that truly national measure. You have made the greatest sacrifices that a statesman or politician could be called on for—human passions, and human feelings, to the sense of justice, reason, and conviction. While you, Sir, were in power, the humble expression of my gratitude for the benefits conferred on my country by that all-healing measure, may have been, by minds of a less manly and noble cast than yours, imputed to other motives and feelings than those which now animate me; I can have at this moment no other motive than that which I really profess—a deep sense of gratitude for the solid and lasting advantages you have procured for Ireland by your noble and disinterested exertions for her peace and prosperity, manifested by the splendid and powerful aid you gave the Relief bill in the Commons House of Parliament. Receive, then, Sir, the thanks and gratitude of an Irishman, long and arduously engaged in the service of his country, and who, on that account, may be better able to appreciate the extent and value of the services you have, by this single measure, conferred on Ireland and the empire; and accept, Sir, in your retirement, the best wishes for your welfare and happiness in that honourable retirement." Certainly, this letter gave a direct negative to the statement of the hon. and learned gentleman as to the feelings of the Roman Catholics with respect to the Relief bill. The letter must have been written from the most disinterested principle, postponed as it was until the day he retired from office. It was written by Nicholas Purcell O'Gorman, late secretary to the Catholic Association. He referred to that letter for the purpose of showing that the hon. and learned gentleman had no right to assume that the passing of a bill by which Roman Catholics were altogether relieved from political disabilities, had failed in its healing effect because it was coupled with a refusal to permit the hon. and learned gentleman (the member for Dublin) to take a seat in that parliament. Then the hon. and learned member for Tipperary had said—"You passed that bill in 1829; why did you not pass it in 1825? Don't you know that in 1825 the measure of relief then proposed was accompanied with provisions which you ought to have accepted, but which did not accompany the act of 1829, and the separation of which from that measure accounts for its subsequent failure?" He was never more surprised than by that statement of the hon. and learned gentleman. The two measures accompanying the act of 1825 were—one of them the extinction of the 40s. freeholders, and the other a provision for the Roman Catholic priesthood. The first of these was passed in 1825, and if the hon. and learned gentleman attached any great importance to the healing effects of that measure, he had all the advantage of it. With respect to the provision for the payment of the priesthood, he had never heard that the Roman Catholics were warm advocates for that measure. He recollected that many of the most strenuous advocates for the removal of Roman Catholic disabilities contended, that an offer of a pecuniary stipend to the Roman Catholic priesthood was little less than an insult to their Church, and he did understand that both the clergy and laity of that Church protested against any provision for that Church being made a component part of the measure of relief. For the hon. and learned gentleman now to argue that the measure of 1829 had failed, and that the Roman Catholic priests continued the system of agitation and excitement, because no provision was made for them in the bill of 1829, surprised him, and he should have expected such an argument from any other rather than from the hon. and learned gentleman. Was there any inconsistency, then, in removing disabilities in 1829, and in now consenting to dissolve the Irish corporations? The hon. and learned gentleman said, that the act of 1829 provided a new oath for Roman Catholics on their entrance into corporations, and he condescended to argue that the act of 1829 gave the Roman Catholics a new and special interest in the Irish corporations; and he afterwards almost asked (for, said the hon. and learned gentleman, God forbid I should ask), whether it were consistent with his (Sir R. Peel's) honour and good faith, after the admissions made in the act of 1829, now to propose the dissolution of those Irish corporations? He must say, that in the course of his argument, the hon. and learned gentleman, trusting no doubt to the House being led away by his brilliant phraseology, had drawn very largely on the good-nature or credulity of his hon. friends around him. Why, in another part of the hon. and learned gentleman's argument, he attempted to show, and very justly, that in the year 1793, the Roman Catholics had, so far as law was concerned, a qualification to be admitted into corporations: and his argument was, that as they had it before the Union, it was a violation of the Act of Union to interfere with the Irish corporations. Now, what was the enactment of the bill of 1829? It merely provided, that instead of Roman Catholics being liable to take the oaths of supremacy and allegiance before being admitted to corporate privileges, they should be qualified for that admission on taking the oath, on the taking of which they were admitted to all other civil offices. But how could the hon. and learned gentleman argue that there was any thing inconsistent with honour and good faith for him (Sir Robert Peel), while corporations were in existence, to support such a provision, and yet now propose—what? not to give Protestants some separate and peculiar privilege; but that the corporations themselves should be altogether dissolved and done away? The hon. and learned gentleman had said, that the same objections applied to the removal of the Roman Catholic civil disabilities as were now urged against this measure; but nothing could be more fallacious. What was the case of the Irish Roman Catholics with respect to civil disabilities? Offices existed, and it was necessary to maintain them. But originally every avenue to distinction was closed against them in the military and naval professions, and in civil offices. Was there any analogy between the placing a Roman Catholic on a footing of equality with respect to a Protestant, who had previously the exclusive possession of those offices, and that of saying that there should be no longer any monopoly of privilege to either party in these abused institutions? You say these institutions have been abused—we say they shall be abused no longer; but this we hold to be consistent with the first principle of equity, that if you destroy monopoly and exclusion on the one hand, you shall not, by an abuse of terms, establish and confer it on the other. Would it by this bill be established? What was the admission of the hon. member for Northampton, a member of his Majesty's government? An admission repeated when cheered. Did he say that it was a great source of satisfaction, when he contemplated this bill, that it would give power to the majority of the country? Did he put his argument in that form? No. He said this—"Whereas you, the Protestants, have hitherto held power; you being a minority, I do rejoice in passing an act which shall hereafter place the possession of power in the hands of those who were to the minority as seven to one." In order to point his argument, and to show that the hon. gentleman did not unwarily prophesy that the consequence of this measure would be to transfer the power from the hands of the Protestants to the Roman Catholics, he stated the proportions of the Roman Catholics to the Protestants, and exulted in the result; not that the Protestant would continue to maintain his fair share of corporate privileges in proportion to his intelligence and wealth, but that the result of the measure would be, by some sort of sinister procedure, an unqualified and unmitigated exclusion of the Protestant. It would be a transference of power precisely to that majority, of which the Roman Catholic population of that country formed a part. Believing with the hon. gentleman, generally speaking, that it would have that effect—not that every person elected to these corporations would be a Roman Catholic, but that those who were elected, though belonging to other professions of faith, must, in order to insure their election, be subservient to the Roman Catholics, must promote Roman Catholic objects. He feared that result, and therefore he protested against this bill. Even admitting the prima facie force of the argument in favour of establishing analogous institutions in England and Ireland, if he found a still more sacred principle intervened, and that the effect of the measure would be to exclude those who had the monopoly now, and transfer the power altogether to the hands of the excluded; he must conclude that the pretended adjustment of the balance was a false one, and that they had no right, under the pretence of consulting analogy, to violate that sacred justice which was predominant over all. He had often heard that these exclusions were the greatest grievances under which the Roman Catholics of Ireland laboured; but if the monopoly were to be transferred to those possessed of the power which physical strength and numbers gave the preponderance, the grievance would be infinitely more galling to the Protestant than any thing hitherto felt by the Catholic. He had heard, before this bill was thought of, of the dangers arising from local partialities in the administration of justice. He recollected reading a letter on the subject of the Lords-lieutenant in Ireland, addressed by the hon. and learned member for Dublin to Lord Duncannon, in 1834. The ministers of that day found Lords-lieutenant in England, and then appointed them in Ireland, upon the principle of adopting analogous institutions in the two countries. The noble lord, the then Secretary for Ireland (Lord Stanley), with the consent of Lord Grey and his government—for whom, let him (Sir R. Peel) remind the hon. and learned gentleman, a grave as deep was dug in Ireland as ever was dug for him, and he had at least that consolation in the tomb, that others who had lauded the Roman Catholics, and had received their encomiums for attachment to their cause, were now treated with the same neglect and contumely as he was—the noble lord on that occasion had no compliments paid to him for adopting English analogies, but he was warned that they might be the means of provoking local prejudices, which might endanger the pure administration of justice. The letter ran thus:—"This section shall dispose of your Lord-lieutenancies of counties. It should be observed, that we owe the existence of these offices to Stanley. It was one of his presumptuous plans, and as bad as such a measure could possibly be." Let the House observe that this was the impartial testimony of a person given long before the Irish Municipal Bill was in contemplation. These were the arguments by which the adoption of English analogies were reprobated, and by which it was shown, that the adoption of such analogies would never reconcile the people to them, if they were not calculated to place power in the hands of the Catholics. The letter continued:—"In fact, one great complaint of the Irish people has been against the practical operation of local partialities. This, above all things, was complained of in the magistracy. The remedy would have been to increase the vigilance, and particularly the responsibility of the Chancellor and of the government; instead of which, the direct contrary course was pursued, and indeed turned into law by Stanley. He created a local authority, necessarily imbued, either through religious differences or election contests, with local partialities; thus, in its nature, aggravating the evil complained of with justice, whilst it took away, or at least greatly diminished, the responsibility of the Chancellor and of the government, and shifted that responsibility upon the Lords-lieutenant of counties." The chances of interfering with the local administration of justice by partisans was here described as one of the great grievances of Ireland, and would not, he asked, the transfer of power in corporations from one sect to another increase the just causes for this complaint? That was the argument used by us as far as the administration of justice was concerned, but applying with tenfold greater force in this case than it did to the appointment of Lords-lieutenant, who had no power to appoint magistrates without the consent of the Lord Chancellor. In the instance alluded to, it appeared, on the authority of the letter quoted, improper to maintain the English analogy; yet that analogy was now contended for, and his Majesty's government distrusted a creature of their own brain. They had given to the English corporations the power of appointing their sheriffs, and yet they had admitted that such was the state of Ireland, no popular assembly could be trusted with the election of the officer by whom juries were to be selected, and therefore without a division, they had withdrawn so much of their bill as had reference to that point. They had given to English corporations the power of appointing their own police—that power was denied to Irish corporations. Again, they had taken from the jurisdiction of the corporations the ports and harbours of such towns as had ports and harbours. He taunted not the government for these changes, because on the dictates of their own consciences the alterations had been made. Those alterations diminished some of the objections he had to their bill; but they served to increase the force of all the arguments against the necessity of establishing similar laws for the two countries. The government had, by this measure, created in the fifty boroughs specified by the bill as many political assemblies, and, distrusting those bodies, had removed from them their proper municipal functions. Why should they not have the control of their police, the administration of justice, and the management of their ports and harbours—all proper municipal duties—but that they were distrusted? In short, what was left to them but the duty of political agitation? It was true that their functions as corporators were narrowed and circumscribed, but the intensity of political agitation was increased by this measure, and if ever there was a scheme calculated to engender and increase religious animosity, political feuds, and laxity of the expenditure of the public money, it was that contained in the provisions of the bill now under the consideration of the House. By its powers were given to the council to tax their constituents for the payment of the salaries of the mayor, recorder (where there existed such an officer), the treasurer, and (in the extensive liberality of the right hon. and learned Attorney-general for Ireland) "all such other officers as they should think fit to appoint." He (Sir R. Peel) was very much inclined to think that the predominant party would not use their powers very lightly. He would take one of the towns about to be blessed with a corporation; Belurbet, for instance, a town of 2,000 inhabitants, was to have a corporation to tax those inhabitants for the maintenance of a mayor, treasurer, and all other officers that body might think fit to appoint. On what principle Belurbet was included in the schedules he was at a loss to know, when some other towns, with populations of more than 2,000 were not mentioned. Where was the town of Ardfer, much more populous than Belturbet, though it was in the report described as a village? It might be that the revenues of Belturbet made it desirable that it should have a corporation. Why, it appeared that it enjoyed a bequest producing £9 a-year, of which £5 was required for a debt still owing, so that £4 was the clear net revenue, which large bequest of £9 was to entitle it to be taxed for the support of all the functionaries of a corporation. Belturbet, however, was the lowest in the scale, and he would now take the highest, Dublin, which nobody would deny ought to have a corporation. The bill, therefore, most certainly gave Dublin a mayor and town-council, but it gave them no right to appoint their sheriffs, no power to nominate the recorder, that being reserved to the Lord-lieutenant, and it was expressly provided, "Nothing in this Act contained shall enable the commissioners for paving, cleansing, and lighting the streets, or the commissioners for widening the streets, or the corporation of commissioners for the improvement of the port and harbour of Dublin, to transfer their powers to the new corporation." Here then was a corporation destitute of corporate functions, and what other inference could be drawn from this, but that the intention of depriving the council of municipal functions was for political objects? He hoped the right hon. and learned gentleman would consent to leave out the latter part of this bill; if not, as they had failed to amend the bill, he felt bound to reject it. What had the English commissioners of municipal reform said in their report? Why, that the perversion of municipal institutions to political ends, had betrayed local interests to party purposes. Would not this be the case in Ireland under this bill? That sentence from the English report was one of condemnation on this measure, which would tend to pervert Irish municipal institutions to political ends, and through the corruption of corporations, lead to the demoralization of the constituent body. It had been said that the spiritual influence of the priesthood had caused the removal of Catholic disabilities; that might be true, and it might be a case in which such influence was legitimately exercised. But when the hon. and learned gentleman went on to say, that the influence caused the reform, could he be surprised, when he admitted, and gloried in the admission, that that influence was exercised for the promotion of a civil object—could he be surprised if they on his side refused to create new organs, by making fifty popular assemblies through which the same influence might be exercised for civil objects? Was it he (Sir R. Peel) who introduced religion into that discussion? Was it he, when the hon. and learned gentleman referred with triumph to the annihilation of the power of the Beresfords in one county, to the extinction of the power of the Fosters in another, and to the influence of the Roman Catholic clergy? He said, then, for the sake of the religion which they all professed, that in his (Sir Robert Peel's) opinion, it would not conduce to the legitimate influence of property in Ireland, to the maintenance of due respect for religion, or to the safety of the Protestant institutions, to create this new sphere for the exercise of the influence to which the hon. and learned gentleman had adverted. In his opinion, the elections for these new institutions would be embittered by a spirit of party hostility far beyond any that was excited by political elections; acting, as these elections would, in a smaller sphere, and repeated as they would be more frequently, he believed, in his heart, that they would do more to widen and to perpetuate religious animosities than any election for merely political purposes would ever do. "And, Sir," continued the right hon. baronet—"and Sir, to conclude, I must say, that after the hon. and learned gentleman's boast, that the spiritual influence of the priests had been thus exercised, and after the exaltation he expressed at the annihilation of property by means of its exertion, I was surprised to hear him make an invocation to that pure ambition which ought to disclaim any reference to temporal objects, trusting, at the same time, that this influence would be exercised to abolish completely that odious impost, as he termed it, in memory of which we ought every night to address our prayers to our Creator for the murders at Rathcormac and other places which he named. If this be the way in which this influence is to continue, if this be the mode in which the Act of Union is to be maintained, you may pass what Act of Appropriation you please, reserving some portion of the property of the church to Protestant purposes; but you will not succeed, for the hon. and learned gentleman has intimated his belief that the Roman Catholic clergy will be justified in continuing to exercise their spiritual influence in civil matters till their own ends be attained. Under these circumstances, I must say, while I maintain my determination to place the Roman Catholics of Ireland, as far as they can be, on a perfect footing of civil equality with the Protestants, I will not consent to the establishment of institutions which will be destructive of that equality, and which will afford a new scope for the exercise of that influence, which the hon. and learned gentleman thinks may be legitimately directed against the existence of the Protestant Church. I do feel justified, therefore, in withholding my assent to a measure which will be the signal for fresh animosities, which will be fatal to internal peace, and which will endanger the security of the Protestant Church and Protestant Establishment in Ireland."

On a division the numbers were—Ayes, 260; Noes, 199; majority, 61. The Bill was read a third time, and passed.

APPOINTMENT OF MAGISTRATES.

MARCH 29, 1836.

Lord John Russell, in consequence of what had been said upon the subject in another place, moved that there be laid before the House a copy of a circular letter from the Under Secretary of the Home Department, dated in October last, and addressed to the Mayor or chief officer of any boroughs contained in the schedules to the English Corporations Bill passed last Session.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, the noble lord had made the motion in the hands of the speaker, partly with a view, he believed, that he might have the opportunity of soliciting from the noble lord those explanations regarding the appointment of corporate magistrates to which he had referred on a former day. He trusted, therefore, as he availed himself of the motion of the noble lord, in consequence of an intimation that the present would be a convenient time, that he should not be thought by those gentlemen who had notices on the paper preceding his own, to have improperly interfered with the ordinary arrangement of business. The point on which he wished for explanations from the noble lord referred exclusively to the nomination of Justices of the Peace under the Act which passed last session for the reform of Municipal Corporations. It was not his intention to make any remark on the general effect of that measure, other than as it related to the functions of magistrates appointed for the performance of the duties of Justices of the Peace. He believed it was admitted by the noble lord, and by all who took part in the question of Municipal Reform, that there was and ought to be a clear distinction between the ordinary municipal duties of a corporation and the duties committed to justices of the peace. That clear distinction had been admitted by no man more fully than by the noble lord. While that noble lord had contended, that with respect to the appointment of town-councillors, and other members of the corporate bodies generally, it was but natural to suppose that the political opinions of the constituent bodies would have influence, while he contended that such would be the effect of political feelings in those cases, he had fully admitted that political opinions should not interfere with the appointment of the municipal magistrates. This distinction had also been clearly drawn, he thought, in the report of the commissioners of inquiry, on which the measure of municipal reform had been founded. The commissioners, in this report, deprecated the party spirit which pervaded municipal councils, in the following terms:—"The party spirit which pervades the municipal councils, extends itself to the magistracy, which is appointed by those bodies, and from their members. The magistrates are usually chosen from the aldermen, and the aldermen are generally political partisans. Hence, even in those cases in which injustice is not absolutely committed, a strong suspicion of it is excited, and the local tribunals cease to inspire respect. The corporate magistrates, generally speaking, are not looked upon by the inhabitants with favour or respect, and are often regarded with positive distrust and dislike." In another part of the report the commissioners say, "One vice which we regard as inherent in the constitution of municipal corporations in England and Wales is, that officers chosen for particular functions are regarded as a necessary part of the legislative body. This notion appears to have originated in times when the separation of constitutional authorities was not understood; when legislative, judicial, and executive functions were confounded. The corporations of England and Wales were originally framed on principles encumbered with this confusion, and have been modified, down to the latest changes, with a scrupulous observance of them." Thus the report admitted a distinction between executive and judicial functions, and laid it down as a principle, that although party spirit could not be prevented from operating in the election of town-councils, it ought, so far as precautions could be taken, to be excluded from the appointment of municipal magistrates. It was hardly necessary to attempt to enforce this position by argument, because he believed the truth of it was universally assented to on all sides of the House. He found on the part of the members of the present government, this doctrine admitted in full force. He found it stated by the Lord Chancellor in the course of the present session, that "the noble lord, the secretary of state for the home department, had but one object in view, namely, to correct any undue selection of town-councillors, when there appeared a preponderance of one class of political opinions on one side or the other, by infusing a few men of opposite political sentiments among them." The noble president of the council also had stated with great truth and justice, that "good sense and good feeling would be equally manifested in the absence of all political bias in the selection of town magistrates, and good sense and good feeling equally dictated that there should be an absence of all considerations of a political character in nominating these magistrates when recommended to the government." He (Sir R. Peel) could appeal, then, to the report of the commissioners, and to the declared opinions of the noble lord opposite, and his colleagues, in proof that his assumption was a well founded one—namely, that, as far as it was possible to avoid it, political feeling ought not to influence the nomination of magistrates in corporate towns. Having thus stated the principle which had been laid down by ministers, he was bound to tell the noble lord opposite, that in many of these corporate towns there did exist a very prevailing feeling that considerations of a political character had, nevertheless, been altogether excluded from the mind of the noble lord in the nomination of many of these magistrates. This might probably be an erroneous impression; if it were, the noble lord would thank him for the opportunity of removing so unpleasant an impression, by clearly stating the grounds upon which the various nominations had been made. The noble lord would do him the justice to admit, that he had not brought forward his statement on this very important subject, without having given the noble lord previous notice of the particular places to which it was his intention to refer. His object had not been to take the noble lord by surprise, by making any statement on the sudden, but to enable him to give a satisfactory explanation, if he could do so, to those members of the community in the towns to which reference was about to be made, who felt dissatisfied with the appointment of the magistrates in those towns, and who were under an impression, whether erroneous or not remained to be seen, that political feelings had been suffered to influence these appointments. It would be necessary for him to mention one or two instances, out of the many, of towns in which such impressions as those he had referred to, he had reason to believe, prevailed. Since the notice of his intention to call the attention of the House to this subject, had been given, he had received a number of communications from various places in reference to it, but he should only bring before the House those particular instances of which he had given the noble lord notice. In the first place, he would take the town of Guildford, in Surrey; and he must say, that he could not at all reconcile the nomination of the magistrates for that particular town with the principle which had been so clearly laid down by the noble lord and his colleagues, to exclude, as far as possible, all political considerations from the nomination of municipal magistrates. In the town of Guildford it happened that the corporation was decidedly of Conservative principles; that was to say, that the vast preponderance of numbers in the corporate body there entertained Conservative views. After passing of the municipal reform bill in this House, and during its progress in the upper House, when the lords had altered that clause of the bill which gave expressly to the town-council the power of recommending four magistrates to the nomination of the Crown, the noble lord opposite declared, and in his (Sir Robert Peel's) opinion, rather unwisely, that it was still his intention to consult the town-councils in reference to the nomination of municipal magistrates. But, supposing that he were prepared to admit the noble lord was right in taking the opinion of the town-council in reference to the election of four magistrates, still he could not reconcile the fact of the selections which had been made, with the noble lord's declaration that the recommendations of the town-council should have great weight with him, because it appeared to him that while there were cases in which the recommendations of the town-council had been admitted by an entire and unqualified assent, there were many others in which the recommendations of the town-council had been arbitrarily rejected. In the corporation of Guildford, as he had before stated, Conservative principles greatly predominated. According to his information, the common-council of that town had recommended to the Crown twelve gentlemen for the commission of the peace, expecting that the noble lord should select, from the twelve so recommended, a sufficient number, they being of opinion that twelve magistrates would be unnecessary for such a town as Guildford. Of these twelve gentlemen as he had been informed, nine entertained Conservative principles, and the other three were Whigs. From these twelve gentlemen the noble lord had selected four persons to act as magistrates for the town, namely, the three Whigs and one of the Conservatives. The proportion (in point of political opinions) in which the town-council had recommended the names of gentlemen for magistrates was as three Conservatives to one Whig; but the ingenuity of the noble lord had led him exactly to invert this proportion, for in selecting four magistrates from the twelve persons recommended to him, he had taken all the three Whigs; and only one of the nine Conservatives. Eight out of the twelve had been aldermen of the old corporation; upon being told this fact, he had at first thought that the principle which the noble lord had acted upon in this case was, that there being eight persons out of the twelve who had been members of the old corporation, and assuming, in accordance with his views of the ancient corporations, that they must, therefore, be necessarily unpopular, it would be best to set all of them aside. This, however, could not have been the principle upon which the noble lord made his selection; for, in fact, two of the gentlemen professing Whig principles, nominated by the noble lord, had been members of the old corporation, and that could not be the ground upon which the other gentlemen had been rejected. In this case a town-council, in which Conservative principles preponderated, had sent a recommendation to the Crown of a number of gentlemen, as town magistrates, comprehending in the list a fair proportion of persons of Conservative and persons of Whig principles. After the observations of the noble lord, on a former occasion, that he would attend to the recommendations of the town-council, it was surely matter of reasonable disappointment on the part of that corporation, to find the proportion of the recommendations they had sent in exactly inverted. So much for Guildford. He would next take the case of the town of Wigan, the circumstances of which case were precisely the reverse of Guildford case; for in the corporation of Wigan, Conservative principles were not predominant. He should adduce this case, however, for the purpose of showing that the same political feelings which influenced the choice of town magistrates in Guildford, had operated in the choice of those for Wigan, for there he found that the magistrates nominated were wholly of one class of political opinion—namely, Whigs; and those gentlemen of the town who professed other opinions, however respectable, were entirely excluded. For the town of Wigan eight gentlemen had been recommended to the Crown as magistrates, all of whom were appointed. He did not for a moment wish to throw the slightest reflection on the personal character of any of these gentlemen, nor to impugn their individual fitness for the office; but he complained that the government had departed from the principle which had been generally admitted, that political feelings should not be permitted to influence the choice of justices of the peace. Of these eight gentlemen, it appeared that four were actively engaged in trade. Now in a manufacturing town like Wigan, where constant disputes were taking place between master-manufacturers and their men, he doubted the policy of appointing four persons actively engaged in trade for the purpose of settling those disputes. At least he, from his experience, should have hesitated before making such appointments, particularly as it must be part of their business to enforce the provisions of the act for regulating the hours of factory labour. He had also been informed, that seven out of these eight gentlemen were active friends of the candidates at the last election of representatives for that borough; that two of them acted as mover and seconder of the unsuccessful candidate, and that five were zealously employed upon the committees of one or the other candidate, and were, throughout the election, very busy in canvassing for them. In short that, with the exception of one gentleman, the whole of the present town magistrates of Wigan were, during the election, most actively (no question most honourably) engaged in promoting the return of candidates who supported one class of political opinions. Here then, was a case in which the recommendations of the town-council were entirely assented to, apparently because the whole eight of the gentlemen named, were persons warmly devoted to those political opinions which were espoused by the ministers. He had been further informed that an application had been made to the noble lord, by petition, imploring him, upon principle, to pause before he made such a selection, and expressing a wish that there should be exhibited in the choice of these judicial functionaries a fair and less exclusive representation of the various political opinions entertained by the inhabitants of Wigan, but that representation had not been attended to. He would next take the instance of a town differently circumstanced, in which also there existed a very great dissatisfaction upon this subject. He would take the case of the town of Rochester. In this town parties were very nearly balanced in the municipal council, for there were nine gentlemen professing one class of political opinions, and nine professing another. Indeed, such was the perseverance with which each party adhered to their respective opinions, that upon repeated divisions in the attempts to elect a mayor and other corporate officers, and finally to adjourn, the numbers on every proposition remained nine for, and nine against, and no proceedings could take place, because the parties were equal. Under these circumstances, it was determined not to recommend to the Crown any list of persons for town magistrates till the town-council was complete, and they could concur in a joint representation. The complaint against the noble lord in this case was, that he had appointed certain persons to be magistrates, not merely favouring gentlemen of one class of politics or another, but without even the recommendations of the town-council; that he had, in short, appointed municipal magistrates for Rochester, at the nomination of the hon. representatives of that borough in parliament. It was not stated that the whole of the six magistrates so appointed were of one party, but the proportion in favour of ministers was not fewer than five to one, and there was, very naturally, a great feeling of dissatisfaction in the minds of the people of Rochester, that the noble lord should have taken this step without waiting till the town-council was complete; and that having determined to take it, seeing the division of opinion in the town-council, he had not observed a corresponding proportion in his appointment of their municipal magistrates. The proportion of political opinion in the town-council was closely balanced; the proportion observed in the selection of magistrates was exactly five Whigs to one Conservative, which was fairly carrying out the principle which the noble lord and his colleagues had avowed. There was another place in which he could undertake to say, very great dissatisfaction prevailed upon this subject—the city of Coventry. In this important and populous city, whose inhabitants were extensively engaged in manufactures, the political opinions of one class decidedly predominated; nearly the whole of the town-council entertained political opinions corresponding with those of his Majesty's ministers. The town-council of Coventry, accordingly, sent up a recommendation of twelve persons for town magistrates, and he (Sir Robert Peel) was assured that out of these twelve persons, eleven, at least, entertained opinions corresponding with those of the town-council. It was very possible, when he spoke of Conservative opinions and Whig opinions, or any other class of opinions, that the noble lord might ask how he defined such opinions, or how he could undertake to say such and such gentlemen entertained such and such opinions? He admitted, that it was somewhat difficult to apply an unerring test on these points, but in order to approach at something like a solution of the question, he would ask how the respective parties voted at the preceding election? He was quite ready to admit that it was difficult—particularly for a stranger, acting merely upon communications, however trustworthy—to feel assured of the political opinions of any individuals. Trifling circumstances led men to range themselves under the banners of one party or the other, and men changed their opinions and their parties, so that it might happen that occasionally opinions should be attributed to a person who had long ceased to entertain them. But as far as the fair and impartial administration of justice and the satisfaction connected with it was concerned, it must be admitted, that when it was found that the whole of the municipal magistrates who had been appointed by the noble lord, or at least a vast majority of them, consisted of the particular persons who, at the last or the preceding election, gave their votes in a particular manner, favourable to the noble lord's views, this was certainly a near approach to a test which might be depended on. The noble lord, at least, must not be surprised that his course of proceeding excited in that part of the population which held different political opinions something like a feeling of distrust. He would repeat, that in the observations he felt called upon to make, he had no fault to find with the individuals appointed—he made no personal objection to them. His complaint was directed, not against any personal unfitness of theirs, but upon the partiality which characterized their appointment. Of the twelve magistrates for Coventry, eight had votes for the city, and the whole of them had voted in favour of the sitting members. The other four had not votes for the city; but one of them, a gentleman of high respectability, Mr. Gregory, was an unsuccessful candidate on the Whig interest for the county of Warwick at the last election. Another of the four gentlemen, the Mayor of Coventry, was Mr. Gregory's proposer on that occasion, and the other two had been actively engaged in his support. Such was then the composition of the municipal magistracy of Coventry, although it was well known that in that city, various political opinions prevailed. There were in that town men of the highest respectability and influence, of different political opinions, but who were persons of one class of political opinions, and that class the one in unison with the views of the noble lord. Such were the grounds of the dissatisfaction which was felt in the city of Coventry at the proceedings of the noble lord in this respect. He would next take the case of the town of Leicester. The number of the magistrates here was ten, and he was informed that of these ten, eight were actively engaged upon the committee of Messrs. Ellice and Evans at the last election, in opposition to Messrs. Goulburn and Gladstone, and that not one of the ten voted for either of the latter gentlemen. It certainly did appear from these cases, in the absence of all explanation, exceedingly difficult to suppose that political considerations had nothing to do with these nominations. The noble lord, at least, must not be surprised, unless he could explain the matter satisfactorily, that those who were excluded should feel some distrust in the elected, and some suspicion—not founded upon personal unfitness, but upon the fact that they all, with trifling exceptions, held one class of political opinions, and had all, at one time or another, been actively engaged in promoting the election to parliament of persons who supported the present ministry. Another case he should speak of was that of Plymouth, where eight gentlemen had been recommended to the noble lord as magistrates, and were appointed. Of these eight, it appeared that two were the representatives for the town, both supporters of the ministers, and of the others, five were actively engaged in supporting the noble lord at the election for the county of Devon. The sixth gentleman had declined to act. Thus it appeared that the seven town magistrates of Plymouth were all of one class of political opinions. There was another point to be remarked upon in this case. It had been expressly laid down by the noble lord as a principle to be observed, that neither attorneys nor brewers should serve as magistrates in the municipalities, yet it appeared, not merely from private communication, but from the returns made by the noble lord, that one of the town magistrates of Plymouth was Mr. James King, a brewer. It remained to be shown upon what principle the noble lord had made this exception to the rule the noble lord had laid down. The last case to which he (Sir Robert Peel) should refer, out of the more prominent and important towns in which dissatisfaction prevailed upon this subject, was the case of the city of Bristol. In the corporation of that city, he believed conservative opinions greatly predominated, and the vast majority of the inhabitants of the city, were equally imbued with Conservative opinions. Notwithstanding this predominance, there was in the town-council a complete agreement as to the choice of names for magistrates, and there was evinced an earnest wish—much to the credit of both parties—to exclude all electioneering or party feelings from the selection of town magistrates, and though one class of political opinions was greatly predominant in the city, yet the prevailing party expressed a perfect readiness to exclude all political feelings and influence from the consideration of who should be recommended as magistrates. A discussion took place in the council respecting the nomination of magistrates: the two parties made some difficulty at first as to the principle on which the recommendation should be given; an amicable arrangement was at last effected; and it was agreed that each of the two parties should recommend twelve persons for magistrates, making an aggregate of twenty-four. The twelve names given in by the Conservative party were recommended unanimously by the town-council. There was no division respecting any one of those names, nor any dissenting voice, with one single exception, raised to any one of them. There was some question upon individuals among the twelve gentlemen recommended by the other party, but upon the whole, the twelve so recommended were assented to by the council, and the whole twenty-four names, in consequence of this amicable and honourable compromise, were sent up to the noble lord for selection. What was the surprise and indignation of that predominating party in Bristol who had consented to this arrangement, to find that the noble lord's selection had been conducted on this principle—that he took the whole of the twelve who had been recommended by the party whose opinions were in unison with his own, but excluded not less than six out of the twelve, named by those of the opposite party! He was at a loss to understand upon what principle the noble lord could justify his exclusion of the other six gentlemen. It was supposed by some persons in Bristol, that the exclusion was on account of the parties having been members of the old corporation; but this could not be a valid reason, for it was shown that, in many cases, the noble lord had not made the fact of parties belonging to the old corporations a ground for excluding them from the magistracy. It might, perhaps, be thought, that the reason for the exclusion of some of these parties was, that they had been members of the corporation at the time when the lamentable riots took place at Bristol, in 1831. But neither was this the reason, for it appeared that two of the gentlemen of the Whig party, who had been appointed as magistrates, had also been magistrates of Bristol, at the deplorable period in question. Mr. Bengough was one of the gentlemen so circumstanced. Two, also, of the gentlemen selected from the conservative list were acting as magistrates of Bristol at the time of the riots; so the exclusion of the others could not have been upon either of these grounds. Some of the gentlemen excluded were men of the highest station and respectability. One was Mr. Daniel, a gentleman of such high character and worth, and who was so highly esteemed and respected by every one, that both parties had concurred in electing him as the mayor of Bristol. Upon what principle was this gentleman excluded? Some one suggested the advanced age of Mr. Daniel; but this could not be the ground, whatever his age might be. In the cases of persons in Rochester and other places, the noble lord had not considered age as any exemption from corporate office, and this could not, therefore, be made a ground of exclusion in the present instance. He had thus gone through a variety of cases, and he conceived them to be amply sufficient to entitle him not to complain of the acts of the noble lord, but at least, to call upon him for some explanation of the principles upon which he had proceeded in these nominations. When he found that in every case stated—and there were very many others of a precisely similar character—the noble lord's preference had been given to persons holding his own political opinions, to the exclusion of the best founded claims on the part of persons holding other opinions, he could not but think that there had been a complete departure from the principle that, in these selections, political considerations should have no influence. There could be no argument in defence of these proceedings, founded upon what might have obtained under the old corporation system. The precise object of municipal reform had been, to do away with all such abuses, and it would therefore, be no justification of these nominations, to say, that in the late corporations appointments were made upon a similar principle; corporation reform was intended to put an end to all such proceedings, and to give the inhabitants of towns and cities full security that the administration of all their affairs, particularly the administration of justice, should be put upon an entirely pure and impartial footing, and that all political feeling and party spirit should thenceforward be excluded from the administration of municipal affairs, so that all classes might have the fullest confidence in the persons to whom the administration of their affairs should be intrusted. Nor would it be any answer to say, that in the case of county justices of the peace, one class of political opinions predominated. Hon. members, on the other side of the House, often made statements as to the too exclusive character of the political composition of county magistrates, but whatever might be the case in this respect, it formed no grounds for another party adopting a similar plan of exclusion in the case of the town magistrates. If there were grounds for complaining of the selection of the county magistrates, it was clear they had no right to attempt to counterbalance it by instituting a similar line of exclusive appointments in the towns. He need not refer to theory upon this subject; he had but to refer to the report of the commissioners, and the statements of the noble lord and his colleagues, to affirm his position, that there was a distinction between the executive office and the judicial, and that as it seemed impossible to exclude political feelings from appointments in the former case, they ought, at least, to be excluded from the selections in the latter. He had stated a few cases which were at variance with this principle, and if the noble lord could give a satisfactory explanation upon the subject to those parties who desired to see a pure and impartial administration of justice in the cities and towns of England, his object would be more advanced, than if the noble lord were to fail in giving that satisfactory explanation.

Sir Robert Peel begged to be allowed to say a few words in explanation. A part of what had fallen from the hon. member for Bath was utterly inconsistent with fact; another part was founded on a gross misrepresentation of his opinions and conduct; and the remainder exhibited as flagrant a proof of at least as much hypocrisy and simulated love of justice as the hon. member had attributed to him. Whether or not he were permitted to proceed must depend entirely on the pleasure of the House. He had, however, scarcely ever heard a speech containing so much vituperative matter as the speech of the hon. member for Bath, directed against a member who was placed in such peculiar circumstances that he had no right to reply. Although, therefore, he was aware that he was trespassing upon the ordinary rules of the House, he solicited their permission to say a few words. The hon. gentleman had declared, that as secretary of state, he had rendered his official power subservient to his political views in the appointment of magistrates. That he denied. He had never, directly or indirectly, done any such thing. When in office, he had had repeated applications from members of parliament on the subject; but he had never sought any political object in the appointment. The appointment of the county magistrates rested in fact with the Lord Chancellor; but he had never used his influence or his connexion with that dignitary, to procure the appointment of individuals as magistrates for political purposes. A part of what had fallen from the hon. gentleman was founded on a gross misrepresentation of what he had said. The hon. gentleman asserted that his (Sir R. Peel's) sole complaint was, that the people having obtained power in the appointment of the magistracy, were allowed to exercise it. That was not his complaint. His complaint was this: that where the people had exercised their power in the furtherance of conservative principles, full weight had not been given by his Majesty's government to their wishes. He had quoted the cases of Guildford and Bristol in proof of his assertion; and he had argued that if, where liberal principles predominated, they were allowed their weight, the same ought to be the case where conservative principles predominated. The hon. member for Bath assumed that the people had a right to choose their magistrates. In that assumption the hon. gentleman was in error. By the law, the people had not now the power of choosing the magistrates. But the hon. member would perhaps say, that because the town-councils, who were elected by the people, had the power of recommending individuals for the magistracy, the people had an indirect influence on their appointment. Be it so. But if the doctrine was good as it referred to those who were of liberal principles, why was it not good when it referred to those of conservative principles? He had always doubted the policy of being governed in the appointment of magistrates by either conservative or liberal town-councils; but if it was right to be so governed by a liberal town-council, it must be right to be so governed by a conservative town-council. He had mentioned the cases of Guildford and Bristol, however, to prove that that had not been the course pursued by his Majesty's government. It was hypocrisy on the part of the hon. member for Bath —at least equal to that which the hon. gentleman imputed to him—to pretend that he was anxious to consult the voice of the people in the appointment of magistrates, while he maintained the expediency of confirming the recommendations of those town-councils whose political opinions were conformable to his own, and of setting aside the recommendations of those town-councils whose political opinions were not conformable to his own. What was that but a simulated regard for the voice of the people? “When the voice of the people,” said the hon. gentleman, “agrees with my own opinion, let it be attended to; when the voice of the people and my opinion are dissonant, let the voice of the people be disregarded; overlook the recommendations of the town-councils; and overlook the expediency of popular control.” He trusted that he had redeemed the pledges with which he had commenced his observations.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMUTATION OF TITHES (ENGLAND.)

APRIL 13, 1836.

Lord John Russell moved the Order of the Day for the House to resolve itself into a committee on this bill.

SIR ROBERT PEEL begged to ask the noble lord opposite, whether he proposed to make any alteration in the sums he assumed as the maximum and minimum of future tithe ratings? The latter had been fixed at sixty per cent. on the commissioners' valuation of the tithe, and the former at seventy-five. He wished also to know, whether the mode of applotment proposed would apply to the compulsory commutation which was to be effected in case of the failure of the voluntary commutation?

Lord John Russell did not intend to make any alteration in the limits of sixty and seventy-five per cent., though undoubtedly there might be cases in which it would be necessary to make exceptions. With regard to the second question, he proposed that in the case of compulsory commutation, the mode of applotting should be the same as in the case of voluntary commutation; but, if the parties could not agree within a certain time, the commissioners should take steps to have an applotment made in the parish.

Sir Robert Peel wished to say a word generally upon the subject of this very important question. The noble lord now proposed to make several very important alterations in the bill, and he had a very strong apprehension that another year would pass away after another ineffectual attempt to make an arrangement for the commutation of tithes. Every attempt made, which proved to be ineffectual, rather impeded the chances of a future and satisfactory settlement. If the objection advanced against this bill by the hon. member for Middlesex were a valid one, it would be entirely fatal to any plan of commutation. If the House were to abolish the existing corn-laws, there would be no security that a protecting duty should not at some future time be re-established, or that some other equally obnoxious system should not be substituted in their room. It was impossible to conceal from themselves that this was the third, and if the noble lord made any important alterations in it, would be the fourth proposition made upon the subject of commutation. He blamed no one, for the subject was surrounded with difficulties. But he did think they had attempted to make a settlement of the question without that preliminary information which he believed to be essential to success. Though the law with respect to tithes was the same all over the country, yet, in point of fact, its application was so modified by different customs, that it was almost tantamount, practically, to a different law, and the difficulty to be overcome, was to apply one law to the whole country in respect of which usages totally different prevailed. In every other subject which the House had adjusted satisfactorily, they had preceded the attempt to legislate by minute local inquiry, but no inquiry was proposed with respect to tithes. A different practice prevailed in the North of England, and another in many parts of the centre, a different practice in Kent, and a fourth in Devonshire. It would be found exceedingly difficult to reconcile all parties in these various districts of the country, habituated to such various usages; to any one law. He should, therefore, make a proposition, and into it no party feeling should enter. He would throw it out for the suggestion of government, in case they should find it difficult to adhere to the plan they had laid down. He did not think it would be satisfactory to government to say, We have brought in the measure, and by so doing have acquitted ourselves of all obligation; the object ought to be, to effect a satisfactory and permanent commutation. If it should be found that they were not prepared to apply the principle of compulsion, he made this proposal, that the commissioners under the noble lord's bill should be appointed, not only to encourage a voluntary commutation, but to procure that information he believed to be indispensable to the success of a compulsory commutation. Let the commissioners, whom the noble lord intended to employ, to invite parties in each parish to come to an amicable settlement of the question, be also commissioners of inquiry with respect to the different practices prevailing in different parts of the country. Suppose that voluntary commutation failed—then the objection, now urged with some force against his bill, as making no provision for compulsion, would not apply, since, in attempting to carry into effect the voluntary principle, they would be making those inquiries which would enable them hereafter to digest a well-considered system of compulsory commutation. Let the commissioners inquire in the different districts of the country as to the means which would be likely consistently to reconcile conflicting usages. If the voluntary principle succeeded, every one would be satisfied. He apprehended it would not; but by the course he advised them to pursue, in attempting to apply the voluntary principle, they would be gradually acquiring that local information, with respect to different usages, which they must necessarily possess before they could proceed to apply a compulsory commutation. With respect to the Poor-law Bill, they had found it necessary to inquire before they proceeded to legislate, and they had been successful. If ever there was a question on which preliminary inquiry was needed, and to adjust which local information was required, it was the present. The difficulty with respect to compulsory commutation was this—it was not to come into operation for two years, and he was afraid that the delay might reconcile many hon. gentlemen to the bill who would not be satisfied with it if it were to take effect at the end of this session. They might imagine that if the plan were found to be impracticable, there would be plenty of time to alter the law. But it should be observed, that this bill held out an encouragement to voluntary commutation, for it declared, that if a voluntary arrangement were not entered into, the parties would be compelled to come to an agreement. But suppose, at the end of two years, compulsory commutation could not be carried into effect, and in the interval many persons had entered into voluntary commutations, what was to be done with them? They would have voluntarily compounded on the faith of the compulsory system, and, perhaps, but for that faith, they never would have given their consent. If ministers were satisfied of the fitness of their compulsory system, why did they not apply it at the end of the session, instead of at the end of two years? Postponement would aggravate all the difficulties. Whether the arrangement were made this year or next, was a matter of much less importance than that, when made, it should be effectual. Some time must elapse before due information could be acquired, and when acquired, the House could proceed maturely to consider the subject with the aid of the superintending board sitting in London. In the mean time, facilities might be given to voluntary commutation; but should it fail, the objection urged to his own bill could not apply, because the same commissioners, being commissioners of local inquiry, would furnish the information necessary to enable the House to determine upon a principle that was just; the public mind would be reconciled, and a measure digested that would give satisfaction to all parties.

On the question that the Speaker do now leave the chair.—

Sir Robert Peel wished to say, in explanation, that his recommendation was founded on the assumption that the bill had not met with the general concurrence of the House. It appeared to him from his observation of the opinions which had been expressed on the ministerial as well as on the other side of the House, that the noble lord's bill was not likely to meet with general concurrence; and in the event of that being the case, he thought they might remedy the inconvenience of further delay by adopting the course which he had suggested. It could not then be said, that he had shown a disposition to throw any obstructions in the way of the bill; on the contrary, he wished the noble lord to have every opportunity of rendering the measure as perfect as possible. He certainly was of opinion, that it was better for the government to come forward with a plan, than to refer the question to a Select Committee, and thus have to determine as to the adoption of the report; but when he saw that in three successive years three plans had been brought forward, all of which were unfavourably received, he thought that was a case in which inquiry might be instituted with particular advantage.

House resolved itself into a committee, pro forma, and resumed.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY.

APRIL 20, 1836.

In the discussion on Mr. Patrick M. Stewart's motion for "An Address to his Majesty, praying that a diplomatic agent may be forthwith sent to the free and independent State of Cracow, and for protecting and extending the commercial interests of Great Britain in Turkey and the Euxine,"—

SIR ROBERT PEEL thought the hon. member must be not a little surprised to witness the concurrence of persons of different political sentiments in opposition to his motion. The noble lord, the Secretary of State, the hon. member for Southampton, and the hon. member for Bath, differing in their sentiments on other topics, agreed in opposing this motion; and he must state, for his own part, that he gave his unqualified concurrence to that opposition; though he did not subscribe to all the arguments which had been brought forward, he agreed in the conclusion at which they arrived; and if the hon. member pressed his motion to a division, he should record his unqualified dissent from it. He concurred with the hon. member for Bath in the propriety of acting with care and caution in such matters, and in the inconvenience of discussing this question in a popular assembly; but he did not concur with him in other parts of his speech, in particular when he maintained that this country ought to withdraw from all connexion and interference with continental affairs. If a country were determined to do justice and observe forbearance, and if it were sure that every other country would show the same spirit, then, being determined to offer no provocation, and do no injustice, it might justly refuse to involve itself in treaties, and be an indifferent spectator of the fate of other nations. But if, after sustaining a grievous injury, there was no course but to resort to arms—if there was no other resource open for obtaining redress but to make that last and calamitous appeal, he could not think that it was inconsistent with the duty or the policy of a country to prepare itself for such an event. The hon. gentleman, who thought there was no use in making treaties, who had no confidence in the good faith of Austria, Russia, Prussia, or France, ought surely, if he regarded those states with distrust, to be prepared for the calamity which, without any fault of our own, might involve us in a contest with them. The hon. gentleman said, that a war with England was tantamount to a war with the whole world. If that were the case, if such important interests were involved—if the spark thus lighted up might involve all the civilized world in conflagration—surely it was not proper in us to have no allies, and to make no preparations for such a contingency. The hon. gentleman had quoted the example of America. Now, the policy of that country formed no necessary rule for us, under the peculiar circumstances in which it was placed, and its position with reference to other powers—on account of the absence of those national associations which involved us in the politics of the world, and still more on account of the distance which did, in point of fact, remove it from the theatre of European politics, and sever it from those bonds from which we could not emancipate ourselves. The hon. gentleman had alluded to the advice of Washington to his countrymen. In the then state of American politics, there being no power in actual collision with the United States at that period, he could readily believe that it might be good policy to follow that advice, though it might not constitute a good rule for that country at other periods, and still less a good rule for a country so differently situated as England. But, whatever the abstract opinion of Washington might be, when hostile measures came into operation, and America was involved in a war with England, it did not disregard foreign alliances. When the time of danger came, it found the expediency of uniting itself with France. If it was necessary that we should be prepared for war, when it came, and that we should be fortified by alliances with other states, surely we ought not to neglect to provide against it by timely measures of precaution. While, then, he agreed with the hon. member on some points, he must express his total dissent from him on this. The hon. member for Bridport had expressed great alarm at the hostile manifesto contained in the speech of the hon. gentleman. Now, a more peaceable and harmless motion, following so warlike a speech, he had never heard. The object of it was to advise the Crown to send a diplomatic agent to the state of Cracow. He should decidedly object to the House of Commons giving advice with respect to the mission of a diplomatic agent. Should the motion be carried, this would be the first instance of such an interference on the part of the House with the exercise of diplomatic functions. He apprehended that it was no necessary indication of hostility to refuse to receive a diplomatic agent; it might be a mark of general unfriendliness, but formed no ground for a declaration of war. The House had no means of ascertaining whether the mission would be acceptable to the state concerned, or whether the agent would be received. They could not, certainly, advise the mission, without knowing whether it would be acceptable, or whether there might not be a possibility of its being regarded as little less than an insult. He apprehended, that on reconsidering this point, the hon. gentleman would see the propriety of withdrawing this part of his motion. Taking the resolution itself, and not viewing it in conjunction with the speech, a less formidable motion had never been made. The other object proposed by the resolution was, "That his Majesty will also be graciously pleased to take such steps as to his Majesty may seem best adapted to protect and extend the commercial interests of Great Britain in Turkey and the Euxine." Was it not the duty of government, not only in the Euxine Sea, but with respect to the universal commercial interests of the country, to protect and extend trade? He would not select any one part of the globe, and give advice to his Majesty to extend and protect our commerce there; but he would say it was the universal duty of the Crown to extend and protect the traffic of the country. If the House believed the government to be neglectful of their duty, and could not confide in them, a motion should be passed, expressly calling for the removal of ministers, and the Crown should be advised to confide the trust to other hands. But he could not consent to make a motion to instruct government relative to a special instance of its executive duty, and yet say that an administration so remiss was fit to be intrusted with the execution of that instruction. The hon. gentleman had spoken of the aggressions of Russia, and his speech had certainly been of a hostile character. He did not rise to defend Russia, or to underrate the importance of these aggressions, if aggressions had been committed; but if the House were to interpose its authority in aid of the executive government, they ought, in the first instance to have decisive official proof of the necessity of their doing so. He certainly would not act upon the speech of any hon. member, however extended his information, or however important the interests he represented. If there had been any undue encroachments on the part of Russia, he said, let us have redress; but if he was not to continue to leave the matter in the hands of the King's government, and if he was to call for the aid of the House, of course, before he took the first step that approximated him to hostile movement, he must have demonstration, clear as day, that such a proceeding was required. He must have direct evidence—he must have the treaty—he must compare the alleged infraction of it with its provisions—he must determine the character of that aggression, and then he would not content himself with calling on the King to take such steps as might seem to him best adapted to extend and promote the general interests of our commerce, but he would tell the Throne, and he would tell the House, that an injustice had been done to England, and that reparation had been refused; and he knew that the House would assure the King of their determination to support him in his demand for justice. Such was the course which a House of Commons, representing the people of England, ought to pursue, when it was satisfied that its interposition was called for; but let him tell the House, that if they contented themselves with seeming to interfere, and with calling in the aid of menace on slight occasions, when the day of real danger came, the views of the House would not have that weight and that authority throughout Europe which they ought to possess. If they did interfere they ought to indicate to the King's government what course they ought to pursue, but he really could not see that any end would be attained by passing a resolution which merely implied tha government neglected their duty, but intimated that they should be left free to judge of the steps they ought to pursue on the particular question referred to. He confessed, that he did not in anywise understand the resolution. If it implied want of confidence, why did not they mark their distrust by indicating the steps government ought to take? But the resolution stated, that the King should be the judge of the measures best adapted to extend our commercial influence, and consequently that the servants of the Crown should continue to judge of them. The resolution imposed no obligation; it was left entirely to the decision of ministers to determine on the measures to be adopted. This was, in point of fact, dividing the responsibility. Supposing that government were to say to the House, "We regarded your address as a stimulus to our activity; we thought you were dissatisfied with our policy, and that you considered us too pacific. We have refused to compromise our differences with foreign states amicably, and will you support us in case of a war?" If that support were withheld, what would they have gained by the resolution? Would it be sufficient, then, for the House to reply, "We said not a word about war. It is true we talked of the aggressions of Russia on Friday, but we said nothing of war on Monday. We only said, that the commercial interests of the country should be protected. You have entirely misconstrued us, and we will not support you." If the House were resolved to interpose, let them not only interpose directly, and state their specific object but let them state to what extent they would relieve government of the responsibility, and what was the share of responsibility they were willing to assume. There was no intermediate step between leaving the matter in the hands of the executive government and coming forward immediately with a vote expressive of want of confidence in them. But to a general resolution, indicative of a desire to have war on a small scale, or to try the effect of menace in the hope that we should escape with menace, he never could consent to be a party. It was not only that he thought the honour and dignity of the country were involved in this question. Besides that, he believed that the interests not only of this country but of humanity were at stake, and so long as peace could be maintained, he thought the British nation ought to set the civilized world the example of maintaining it. At the same time, he should be the first to say, if a foreign power either insulted or injured us in any essential interests, and refused reparation, or mocked us by mere worthless concession, that it would be then for the interests of England and of humanity that England should assume her proper attitude and station, and, having used every effort to procure redress, should then have recourse to that alternative, which, after all, was one of the greatest calamities that could befall a people. So much for general subjects; but he wished to add one word with respect to that part of the speech of the hon. gentleman referring to the treaty of Adrianople, and casting blame on the government of his noble friend, the Duke of Wellington, for not taking more energetic steps to check the power and influence of Russia, which had arisen, as the hon. gentleman thought, from that treaty. On a question of this kind, and after constant occupation with the other business of the night, it would be difficult for him to attempt to speak with perfect precision on bygone matters, which took place four or five years ago. But if he made any mistake, both the hon. gentleman and gallant admiral on the same side possessed memories sufficiently accurate to correct him. He must protest against judging of the treaty by the impressions and feelings entertained at this time. It was the fashion now to have great hostility towards, and apprehension of, Russia, and he would therefore look to the state of the public mind as existing in the year 1828. Then the universal feeling of this country was not directed against Russia, but was in complete concurrence with Russia in establishing the independence of Greece. His noble friend assumed the government in the month of January, 1828, and with respect to Russia, and indeed other governments also, for he did not mean to say that their position with Russia was peculiar; the ministers of that period were not perfectly free agents. By the treaty of July 1827, this country, France and Russia, had contracted a common obligation, to put an end to the disorders prevailing in the Levant, and provide for the qualified independence of Greece. It was stipulated that, supposing one of the parties should be involved in hostility with Turkey, the treaty should not be brought to a close in consequence of such a rupture. In 1828 a war took place between Russia and Turkey, a war which he must say, without pretending to place implicit confidence in all the assurances given them of Russian disinterestedness, arose immediately out of a provocation on the part of

Turkey, offered, he believed, with the view of bringing on the destruction of the alliance of the three powers. A hostile manifesto issued by Turkey against a state so powerful, and bound by treaty with France and England to effect the independence of a considerable part of her territories, could only be accounted for on the presumption that war would never take place—that France and England would refuse to be party to hostilities, and would withdraw from the alliance. These powers had indeed deprecated the hostilities of Russia against Turkey; they knew Russia would have very great difficulty in acting as a mediator in one part of the world, and as a belligerent power in another, but still foreseeing that the consequences of their withdrawal from the alliance must be fatal to the independence of Greece, they had determined to adhere to the treaty, and fulfil its objects to the last. The gallant admiral opposite thought that the Russian war might have been prevented, and was under the impression that Russia made proposals that England and France should enter with her as direct parties in the war against Turkey—a very convenient proposal for Russia to make when on the eve of separate hostilities, and that Britain and France had replied that they had no interest in the quarrel, that the treaty never contemplated hostilities, and that they had no ground of complaint against Turkey. The proposition which had been made by Russia was, that the provinces of Moldavia and Wallachia might be occupied by Russian troops. The answer returned was, that if the Russian army took possession of those territories, it would be impossible to reconstruct a fabric so constituted as the Turkish empire, when undermined by the advance of Russian troops acting in concert with France and England. Supposing they had acceded to the proposal, and that the Russian troops had advanced, with the consent of Britain and France, what security would there have been that fresh causes of hostility between Turkey and Russia would not soon have arisen? He apprehended Russia would not have parted with the power of declaring war against Turkey on separate grounds, and all that they would have gained would be, to be parties to the operations which had annihilated the latter state, and left her a complete prey to the Czar. He asked hon. members if they thought it would be wise in us to guarantee the security and integrity of Turkey, whether the other powers were willing or not. He would not discuss the question whether such a guarantee would be effectual. The hon. and gallant member said, that at that period the Turkish army amounted to 53,000 men; that the Russians were in an almost hopeless state, from sickness and despondency, and that it would have been easy for England to arrest their progress. But if the Russians were in such a miserable condition, what must have been the inherent strength of Turkey when it was unable to free itself from their presence? Ought the government, then, without some vitally important reason to have undertaken the defence of Turkey, at an enormous expense, and at so great a distance, unless they had been assured of the co-operation of the other powers? He had no hesitation in saying, that France was not prepared to have supported us. We could not have persevered without forfeiting the concurrence of France, and losing all chance of the co-operation of Austria. Under these circumstances, he must repeat that little short of madness could have induced us to guarantee the security of Turkey. He did hope, at the same time, that the other powers of Europe would feel a common interest with us. He did not undervalue the independence of Turkey, and he trusted that France and Austria would see the necessity of co-operating with us for that end. Turkey had not been included in the treaties of 1814 or 1815, but he felt certain that the whole of Europe would rise up against the transference of the whole power of that empire to a single state. With respect to our commercial relations, though he did not undervalue any aggressions made on our commerce, and he should be unworthy of the close connexion he had with the commercial interests of the country, if he did, yet he must assert, that on this point the hon. member's speech was not conclusive. The hon. gentleman had said, that since the treaty of Adrianople there had been a progressive decrease in our exports to one of the countries in question, but on account of what? Not on account of a diminution in the demand for it from Turkey, but from the uneasiness and insecurity of our relations with Russia. He said, then, that he would not consent to any vague motion, which would still further aggravate that insecurity. He would not add to that trepidation, notwithstanding the expressed wishes of Mr. Garnet and some other merchants, but he would tell the hon. member, that if a just cause should arise for war, he would be the last to oppose the assertion of it. At the same time, he would not be a party to a vague motion like this, which would only add to irritation without increasing security.

CARLOW ELECTION.—MR. O'CONNELL.

APRIL 22, 1836.

Mr. Hardy moved a series of resolutions, charging Mr. O'Connell with having entered into an agreement, for a certain sum of money, to procure the return of Mr. Raphael as member of parliament for the county of Carlow; such agreement being contrary to the statute, and a breach of privilege of that House.

Lord John Russell moved, as an amendment, the confirmation of the report of the committee, which had decided that no charge of a pecuniary interest could be attached to Mr. O'Connell.

A long and angry debate ensued, towards the close of which, and amid cries of "Question,"—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, if the House thought it for the interests of the hon. and learned gentleman mainly concerned, that this discussion should be adjourned, he should willingly concur in that suggestion; but he confessed he was of opinion with the right hon. gentleman opposite, that it would be most advantageous to that hon. and learned member that the debate should be to-night brought to a conclusion. He thought there must be a unanimous wish on the part of the House that three more days should not elapse without the final settlement of the question. To pass, however, to the consideration of it; there was a mode by which it sometimes happened that hon. gentlemen evaded the difficulties of an embarrassing question, and, so far as personal feelings were concerned, he wished he could have reconciled to his sense of duty the evasion of this discussion in the manner to which he alluded—namely, by absenting himself from the debate, and declining to give his vote. But he thought the instances were rare in which a man could, consistently with his public duty, abstain from being present at a discussion, or could evade the difficulty it might involve by absenting himself from it. The true course was to meet the difficulties as they occurred, and to strike the balance between conflicting obstacles, rather than to shrink from encountering them. It was his wish, upon this question, to act as nearly as he could in a judicial capacity, and he was bound therefore to state, whatever ridicule he might incur for the announcement from hon. gentlemen opposite, that he was not a party to the motion brought forward by the hon. and learned member for Bradford. He did not see the resolution which had been moved until he read it in the votes of the House; at the same time, he did not consider that it detracted from the importance of the question that it had not originated in party feelings, but was brought forward by an independent member of the House, of unimpeachable character, who, without reference to the sentiments or opinions of others, did that which he considered to be his duty, and rested the question which he brought forward, not on the basis of party or personal feeling—but merely upon the importance which might be attached to it by the House. The present question had been introduced by the hon. member for Bradford. He, as an individual member, had he been consulted, would have willingly advised him not to persist in it; but his counsel not having been solicited, he found himself called on to declare his sentiments upon the subject, endeavouring to reconcile, as nearly as he could, his duty to the individual to whom it referred, and to the public, a portion of whom he represented. He wished to reconcile strict justice to the hon. and learned member for Dublin with deference to the report of the committee, and with the performance of his duty to the people of England. He came down to the House, like many others, wishing to hear the discussion, and not having his mind made up as to the course he should pursue. On coming into the House, there were three objects which he resolved to bear in mind as regarded this debate. The first was justice to the hon. and learned member, whom it principally concerned; the next, deference to the opinion expressed by the committee which had sat upon the subject; and the third, the performance of those duties which, as a member of this House he owed to his constituents, and to the public. The debate proceeded, and a proposal was at length made, which he thought relieved him from the difficulties he had to contend with, and which reconciled the three objects he was desirous to combine. A motion was made to pass to the other orders of the day, or to meet the original resolutions with the previous question—which was tantamount to implying complete satisfaction with the verdict of the committee, by a resolve not again to agitate a question that had been already submitted to adjudication. Was it made by any member of this House indifferent to justice, ill-qualified to form an opinion on the merits of the case, conceited or jealous in his disposition, or one to whom the feelings and the honour of the committee were a matter of utter indifference? The proposal to meet the motion with the previous question, was made by no less an authority than the chairman of the committee—whose position in that body had been the most dignified—in whose opinion the most implicit confidence was reposed, and to whose feelings unqualified deference was due. The proposal of the hon. gentleman was, as he thought, seconded by his noble friend, also a member of that committee. Thus was there a motion intended to be made by the chairman of the committee, and seconded by an eminent member of it, which was thought reconcilable with justice, perfectly consistent with the honour and feelings of the committee, and with the discharge of public duty; and what had intercepted it? The motion had been distinctly announced, but some private and scarcely audible suggestion was made by the noble lord (Lord John Russell,) who gave advice to the hon. gentleman, the impartial arbiter upon this subject, as regarded both the interests of the committee and of the public; and the hon. gentleman in consequence had not fulfilled his intentions, although his noble friend had understood that he was seconding the proposal. Had that motion been made and seconded, the noble lord would not have been entitled to make his motion; and he must say, considering the circumstances under which the noble member for South Lancashire was placed, it would have been only common justice and fairness, if he was under an erroneous impression respecting the course pursued, at once to have made him acquainted with his mistake. The omitting to put that motion had, therefore, occurred through mere accident, or rather through a mistake, and a mistake for which the noble lord was plainly responsible; he said responsible, because, if his suggestion had not been offered, the chairman of the committee would have persevered, and it was thus plain, that the noble lord had availed himself of an opportunity which would not otherwise have presented itself of moving an amendment, or an intended motion. He was anxious to have escaped a discussion of this question, from a multiplicity of considerations, which, separately, might not have justified that solicitude, but which, when combined, formed an adequate cause for it. He did not mean to say, that with the disclosures contained in the evidence before him, he was inclined altogether to disregard it; but he was anxious to avoid any appearance of giving an indirect sanction and encouragement to disclosures of confidential intercourse, which neither tended to elevate a man higher in the scale of society, nor to increase the probability of excluding, from a public question, private considerations, which ought not to influence the decision. He must say, as to the evidence, this was that portion which he was most anxious to disunite from it. Instead of being allowed, he would not say to give a go-by to this motion, but to meet it in a fair, parliamentary, and constitutional manner—because, after reviewing all the circumstances of the case, he could not think it necessary to revive the discussion,—instead of being allowed to meet the question in a manner satisfactory to the committee, to the public, and to himself, by giving his vote for the previous question, he was forced to consider the proposition of the noble lord, which appeared to him to be of a nature utterly unprecedented. There was a clear distinction between acquiescing in an adjudication and adopting the verdict of a tribunal. The noble lord insisted upon dictating to the House the precise terms in which they should express an opinion. He required from hon. members, not an acquiescence in the decision of the committee and a reluctance to disturb it, but the adoption of the sentiments of the committee, and the use of the precise words in which that tribunal had recorded them. He was not present when the evidence was given; the parties who made up the report might have many questions to settle, which required a compromise of past opinions, and this might have led to the insertion of any words justifying that mutual concession. In order to obtain general concurrence, words might have been inserted, in which all parties would not have acquiesced, but from a desire to promote unanimity. The noble lord had not been present at the discussions in the committee, nor had he heard the reasons which led to the insertion of such words, and yet he wished to compel the House to employ the precise words in which the report of the committee was drawn up. That body had acquitted Mr. O'Connell personally, and he entirely concurred with them, and he gave the hon. member the full and unqualified benefit of that acquittal. He fully admitted the hon. and learned member's right to take his stand upon that report, as he himself had said. He would not go into the evidence; he did not wish to show that the report was not perfectly satisfactory as regarded Mr. O'Connell; but he was quite sure that the committee had considered the chief part of their duty to be to inquire into matters personally concerning him. This imputation was, they considered the gravamen of the charge to be of a personal nature, and he was not quite convinced that they had thought it within the strict line of their duty to determine whether the whole transaction amounted to a breach of privilege. He repeated, then, that the noble lord had no right to dictate the literal adoption of the report; but as the rules of the House fully required him to acquiesce entirely in that report, he was of course entitled to ask the noble lord the meaning of several expressions contained in it. If the noble lord inquired if he would acquiesce willingly in the report, and would not disturb the decision of the committee, he would say, Yes; but if the noble lord would not permit him to do this, but demanded an unqualified adoption of it, then he (Sir R. Peel) must clearly comprehend the meaning of two passages in it, before he could say that they expressed his sentiments. The first was, that in which the committee declared their opinion, "that the whole tone and tenor of this letter" from Mr. O'Connell to Mr. Raphael, "were calculated to excite much suspicion and grave animadversion." Now, what meaning did the noble lord attach to the most important phrase in this passage—namely, "grave animadversion?" Did he, by these terms, mean to imply a censure on Mr. O'Connell, after the evidence which had been produced? If he did mean to express his reprobation, either qualified or unqualified, then on what ground did he blame Mr. O'Connell? Was it for a breach of privilege? If so, why did he not define the offence Mr. O'Connell had committed? Suspicion was a justifiable cause of inquiry, and he thought the noble lord contended, the inquiry having been made, that the charge must be a false one. But the noble lord adopted, in addition, the words "grave animadversion;" and these, as applied to a charge, were widely different from a mere suspicion. Suspicion attaching to a party formed a good reason for inquiry, but let him say, that grave animadversion belonged only to a case when the charge had been substantiated. If the use of these terms implied a censure on Mr. O'Connell, he wished to know what was the offence laid to his charge, and he thought that those parties who acted as his judges, and also those interested in behalf of Mr. O'Connell, would have required an explanation upon this point, relative to the embodying of these words in the resolution of the noble lord. The other part of the report, with respect to which he felt much doubt, was this—he was called on to adopt the report on the responsibility of a committee of the House of Commons, and he wished, therefore, to have his doubts resolved. The concluding paragraph of the noble lord's resolutions was this—"That it appears also, that this money has been expended under the immediate direction of Mr. Vigors, and others connected with the county of Carlow, on what may be called legal expenses, or so necessary, that this House sees no reason to question their legality, and that the balance was absorbed in defending the return of Mr. Raphael and Mr. Vigors, before the committee appointed to investigate it on the 28th July, 1835." Now, he contended, with all deference to the noble lord, that the necessity of the expenses was not a test to try their legality. A case might occur in which expenses were necessary, and yet not legal. [Lord John Russell: I said "unavoidable."] "I said unavoidable," says the noble lord. What I say is, that the House is called on to adopt the resolutions of the committee, and the noble lord has proposed a resolution which does not agree with the resolution of the committee.

Lord John Russell: I must interrupt the right hon. baronet, in order to explain that I desired the resolution to be copied, and the word "unavoidable" was copied "necessary." I did not observe this.

Sir Robert Peel—What he contended was, that the unavoidableness or necessity of the expenses—whether one term or the other was used—was no test of their legality; and he objected to approving a resolution of the committee which seemed to imply, that the necessity of the expenses constituted a sufficient reason why their legality should not be questioned. When the noble lord called for the opinion of the House on the transaction, he not only opened the report of the committee, but he opened the whole of the evidence. If the noble lord required the House to record its opinion that the expenses were unavoidable or necessary, he imposed upon it an obligation to express its opinion of the whole transaction fully. The opinion of the House was to constitute the rule by which other people were to judge whether such expenses were legal or not; and if, on reading the evidence thus produced to the House, the House recorded its opinion that the expenses were necessary—if by this proceeding the important rules of constitutional practice, devised to guard the purity of elections, were slurred over, should the House of Commons be hereafter called upon to punish persons who had acted under the sanction of this proceeding, the House would be in a position in which it could not administer justice. The only part of the evidence to which he should refer, was that which related to the appropriation of the money which had been advanced for the election. It appeared, that the first £1,000 paid by Mr. Raphael for election expenses was to be paid down in the first instance, and if any balance remained, after defraying the election expenses, it was to go to defray the expenses of the petition which unseated Messrs. Bruen and Kavanagh. Did the House mean to sanction that? Did it mean—not shrinking from adjudicating the question, but determined to give an opinion upon it—to sanction, or, at all events, to express no disapprobation of a transaction by which it was stipulated, in respect to this £1,000, by an express contract, that if any surplus remained, it should not go to cover any legal expenses connected with the election, but to discharge a debt incurred on account of a previous election? Did gentlemen deny the fact to be as he had stated? Then he must be allowed to read the evidence of it. Mr. Vigors was asked, “Was the distinct understanding that out of the first £1,000 paid by Mr. Raphael, the election expenses were first to be paid, and if there was any balance it was to go to the petition that unseated Messrs. Bruen and Kavanagh in May—Yes. That the second £1,000, if not wanted for the petition that followed, was to go to the fund of the Carlow Liberal Club?—Exactly. I would observe that the words, ‘If not wanted for the petition,’ should be omitted, for it was to go under any circumstances, in the case of his being returned, to that fund. Do you mean that this was not merely your construction of it, but that you believed that Mr. Raphael also understood it in this point of view?—That was my construction of it, and which I meant to convey to him; whether he understood it or not, I cannot exactly answer, but I intended to convey that to him.” Then suppose a case of a city member going through a contested election, and incurring a debt of several thousand pounds; did the House mean to sanction this proceeding, that a contract might be made with a person hereafter to be returned, for a larger sum than the expenses would be likely to amount to, and if there was a surplus, that that surplus might go to pay the expenses of the previous election? Did gentlemen mean to sanction this? [An hon. member: “In the relief of poor electors.”] The question was, whether the money could or could not be applied to other than election expenses? It was said that it was to go to a liberal club, and be appropriated to the paying a year’s rent, or half a year’s rent, of tenants who were in arrear. If the House sanctioned the appropriation to either of these objects, or confirmed, by its silence, the resolution of the committee, whose report it was forced to review, why confine the compensation to tenants? Why not allow voters in cities or boroughs, when they are apprehensive of the consequences of freely exercising their franchise, to be indemnified for losing the good-will of their customers? In either case, the violation of the right of election was equal, and in each case the claim for compensation would be equally valid. And the House must consider, when it was laying down a principle, that it could not limit it to bona fide cases of alleged wrong; if it opened a door on this pretext, a flood of unrestricted evils would rush in. The right hon. gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, had had sagacity enough to foresee the evil consequences of such a case; but his sagacity in devising a precaution against them was not equal to the sagacity with which he foresaw the evil, because reading the evidence, and finding that the tenants “expected” remuneration—rusticus expectat:—expect was an awkward expression, he admitted, but the right

hon. gentleman offered the House one consolation. He declared that the evil would be limited to England; for, on the best lexicographical authority possible, the right hon. gentleman owns he was able to assure the House, that between the meaning of the word "expect" in Ireland and in England, the difference was very great. And this was the profound and very satisfactory explanation given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as a reason why there should be no apprehension in England of any evil consequence from this source. If, hereafter, any person in England made a claim upon a liberal club for compensation, and should consider himself entitled to expect it, the right hon. gentleman would then come forward and tell him, "Your expectation, though not wholly groundless, was without foundation; for I am an Irishman, deeply read in the Anglo-Hibernian language, and I give you warning, that 'expectation' in England is a totally different thing from 'expectation' in Ireland." Unfortunately, the legislature had not sustained this interpretation; for the Bribery Oath, which was administered in both parts of the empire, contained the word "expect," and with the same meaning. He asked the House, then, whether or not, if a case like this were made out on any other occasion, in other times, and under other circumstances, and a majority of the House of Commons had such a resolution brought before them, they would not have recorded their protest against it? The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that this proceeding had been instituted against a conspicuous individual on the ground of political animosity, but he did not think so. Yet he might ask, whether, if the individual had been any other than the principal party actually concerned, would the government have felt called on to defend him? Had the individual belonged to this side of the House, what would have been their course? He did not say that the hon. gentlemen opposite would not have made allowance for the circumstances under which unfair and ungenerous disclosures might have taken place; but this was certain, that if their sense of duty and their generosity had prevented them from visiting the man with punishment, the sense of the duty they owed to the public would have pointed out to them the propriety of entering their protest against the public offence.

Lord John Russell's amendment was carried by a majority of 72, and the House adjourned.

TITHES AND CHURCH (IRELAND).

APRIL 25, 1836.

Lord Morpeth moved the following resolution:—"That it is expedient to commute the composition of tithes in Ireland into a rent-charge, payable by the first estate of inheritance, and to make further provisions for the better regulation of ecclesiastical duties."

SIR ROBERT PEEL.—The noble lord concluded his clear and able speech by moving a resolution, which, from its terms, and the intention with which it was submitted, did not, he apprehended, involve the House, or any part of it, in the necessity of expressing its dissent by a vote. He understood the noble lord, and the noble lord the Secretary for the Home Department, to have declared on Friday, that the resolution to be submitted to-night was framed with a view of avoiding a hostile discussion. He understood the present motion as not pledging the House with respect to any principle, but merely to enable the government to bring in the bill, reserving to those who were unwilling to assent to its details an entire right of protesting, on a future occasion, against the change which it was proposed to effect. That being the case, it was infinitely the better course not to provoke a premature, and, as it appeared to him, unavailing discussion, by entering into the consideration of all the topics embraced in the noble lord's speech. Feeling a necessity of entering into a full discussion hereafter, he would wait for that opportunity; but he waived his right on this occasion, with the distinct understanding that he should then be prepared to enter fully into the whole of the principle and details of this measure, and that his acquiescence in the present resolution was not to be considered as an abandonment of the objections which he had urged to the former measure of the noble lord. It would then appear, that, acquiescing in the present motion, he had not waived any one of the objections he had formerly urged to the measure. The noble lord, in the course of his speech, appealed to him personally on one or two points, to answering which he should confine his present remarks. In the first place, the noble lord asked whether the answer which had been given to his question on Friday last, was considered by him as equivalent to an expression of his departure from the pledge which had been given last year respecting the appropriation of the surplus funds of the Church of Ireland. He was bound to say, that on the answer the noble lord gave he did not put any such construction. Neither did he consider that the promise of the noble lord, to submit a mere formal resolution, implied that his Majesty's government were prepared to abandon their former principles. At the same time, he could not help feeling that there was something in the expressions used by the noble lord that night, as to the inability of the government "to shake off" the engagement into which it had entered—that there was something in the expressive and significant action with which that expression was accompanied, formed according to the models of the ablest orators, that did convince him that the noble lord would have fled if he could from the embarrassment of his position. The noble lord's manner and appearance, during that part of the speech, reminded him forcibly of the graphic picture drawn by Horace, when he wished to get rid of a troublesome ally—

Cum gravius dorsa subiit onus——*

He trusted the noble lord would not consider him as intending to apply to him any expression in the slightest degree offensive. The noble lord could not imagine for a moment that he entertained such a meaning, when he called to mind that Horace addressed the expression which he quoted to himself. He could well believe that the noble lord was very anxious to "shake off" the troublesome incumbrance, but he found himself in a state which rendered it impossible for him to make the attempt with any chance of success. The second reference which the noble lord in his able speech made to him, and which he then felt called upon to notice, was to a speech of his, an extract from which the noble lord had read. With the respect which he entertained for the noble lord's attainments and abilities, he did feel some regret at being compelled to disown the justness of the eulogium which the noble lord had pronounced upon him. The noble lord had expressed a great wish to accommodate his bill to some principles laid down by him, and had referred to a speech which he (Sir R. Peel) had made in the course of the last session of parliament, exulting in the prospect that, without alarming his own friends and supporters, he had been enabled to embody in his bill the valuable suggestions which he (Sir R. Peel) had thrown out. He held in his hand the speech in question, and as to appropriate to one's self the merits which justly belonged to another, would be manifestly almost an act of dishonesty, he was prepared thus generously, and on the instant, to relinquish all the praise which the noble lord had so lavishly bestowed upon him, and to give it up to its proper owners. It was quite true that on the occasion in question he had stated, in directing arguments against the bill then before the House, that he would assume the principle of its supporters to be correct; that he would attempt to show that, in conformity with their own principles, they had no surplus to appropriate; and, therefore, the pretence of having a surplus to appropriate, was only brought forward to relieve them from the pressing political difficulty in which they were involved on account of their unwise engagements. But he never meant, in the course of urging that argument, to state that it was his plan, or that, if it were adopted, it would afford him entire or unqualified satisfaction; and, in order to leave no doubt on the matter—to show the danger which he had had frequent occasion to point out, arising from partial quotations, he would perform the generous part which he had promised to act, and would give to the proper owners the merits which belonged to them. The part of the speech which the noble lord had quoted, referred to the division which he (Sir R. Peel) had proposed; but before he came to that division, he had, in order to preclude the possibility of that misconception into which the noble lord had unwarily fallen, expressly said and repeated, that he took the data of the government. His words then were, "Now, as I have already stated, I wish to argue this question on the narrow grounds which his Majesty's government have afforded me, I wish to discuss this measure on those principles assumed by the King's government itself, admitting for the sake of argument those principles to be correct, and that my own views are erroneous. I take this course solely for this reason, that I can afford to make the concession, and, having made it, I can show that the ministers are, on their own principles, and with their own admissions, bound to accede to my motion. Arguing from their own evidence, I can show that there is no surplus to distribute, and, according to their own principles, therefore, they are bound not to sanction any alienation of the revenues of the Irish Church." These observations had preceded his remarks on the division of benefices which the noble lord had quoted, and he had afterwards said, "I may be asked why I have assumed £200 as the minimum in the scale of allowance to be made to parochial ministers? My answer is, not on any vague assumption of my own, but on the facts and recorded declarations of the authors and supporters of the present bill. The estimate is theirs, not mine. I may think £200 (as I do think it) a very insufficient provision—but I am arguing throughout on the principles of my opponents, and claiming their support of my proposal on those principles. The Church Temporalities' Bill assumes that £300 a-year is the lowest sum which ought to be paid as a stipend to any clergyman who has the care, not of a benefice, but of a parish. I find that opinion confirmed by all the authorities which I have been able to consult upon the subject." He had then referred to the authorities favourable to his division—namely, Mr. Littleton, a Roman Catholic gentleman named Finn, and Mr. Perrin; and had concluded by asking, "Now, have I not proved, not upon vague reasonings, not upon general assumptions, but, as I have said that I would, out of the admissions of the noble lord and his supporters, that the House ought to allot to ministers in benefices where there is a Church, or where there is a congregation of more than fifty Protestants, of the Established Church, at the very least £200 or £250 a-year, as the minimum of stipend." That was the whole scope of his argument upon the occasion referred to by the noble lord, and, therefore, the noble lord must not expect that he had any right to claim his support, even to the limited proposition now brought forward, because he had made a partial quotation from his (Sir R. Peel's) speech. The praise which the noble lord had given him was doubtless meant as the reward of merit, though fully unmerited; the noble lord had too much delicacy to pass that unqualified eulogium upon his own immediate supporters; and therefore he had very skilfully given him (Sir R. Peel) the whole credit of the proposal. With a liberality proportioned to the desire which he should have had to retain the noble lord's panegyric, had he deserved it, he now restored it to the quarter to which it belonged. In conclusion, he would repeat, that it not being his object to provoke a discussion on the present occasion, he should reserve to himself the opportunity of recording his sentiments at a future time; he would therefore fulfil the engagement which he had entered into, and abstain from referring to one detail. If he did refer to one detail, he might lead to an inference that he assented to others; and wishing to take a complete view of the question, and making no concession whatever of the great principle on which he, in common with his friends, had stood on the last occasion, he would not refuse his formal consent to this formal motion, and they might have a full and unreserved discussion hereafter.

The resolution was agreed to, and the House resumed.

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS.

Lord John Russell having moved that the Order of the Day be read—

SIR ROBERT PEEL would not detain the House many minutes, and would confine himself entirely to the question before it. That question was, whether or not it would be advisable for the House, by a resolution passed previous to the financial statement for the year, to hold out expectations to a particular interest, that relief would or could be afforded it by any remission of taxes? Feeling the deepest interest in the maintenance of the prosperity of agriculture, believing that there were many considerations of a political and social nature involved in the question, he felt it to be his duty to consult its real and permanent interests; and however much he respected the motives, and valued the services of his noble friend who had brought forward the motion, if he believed it was calculated to raise expectations which he could not realize, or provoke jealousies and hostilities for which there was no countervailing advantage, the more he valued agriculture, and the more deeply he felt interested in its prosperity, the more he was bound to perform his duty to it, and to refuse his sanction to any proposition which in his view of the matter could lead to no beneficial result. And in the first place, with his views of public credit, and before he knew the amount of the surplus revenue at the disposal of government, he should always be very backward to express any opinion as to the contingent appropriation of that surplus. He considered that the honour of this country was involved in the maintenance of public credit, and he must confess, till he knew the available surplus, he should be reluctant to discuss any question connected with its appropriation. Suppose there was a surplus of £500,000, was it fair to excite hopes on the part of the agricultural interest that any remission of taxation, giving to agriculture what was said to be its fair share of such an available surplus, would in point of fact relieve the existing distress? He did not deny that agricultural distress existed, and that the pressure in many parts of the country was exceedingly severe, but he very much doubted whether the distress arose from oppressive taxation, and whether it could be removed by any remission of taxes within such limits as were at their command. He believed that there were several descriptions of lands, particularly clay lands, which were in a state of great depression, and he would go so far as to admit, that it was not likely that whole districts of clay lands could be cultivated to advantage; but he must say, that even if it were proved that the tillage of such soils was not so profitable as before, he should not be at all surprised. A competition unfavourable to the inferior descriptions of land was going on in every quarter of the globe, and with respect to every species of agricultural produce. The inferior soils of this country were entering into competition with richer lands in Scotland and Ireland, and the agriculturists of England had to contend, he must say, with greater skill in the application of labour, and more provident views with respect to the increase in the produce of land. Under such circumstances, he was not surprised that some districts in this country, heretofore cultivated with advantage, now yielded no remunerating return. What was going on at the present moment in Jamaica and the West-Indian islands which had been longest colonized? They were coming into competition with the settlement of Demerara, and richer lands on the South American continent. The planters of the other islands might with truth assert, that their estates had been under cultivation for fifty or one hundred years, and that they could not compete successfully with more modern settlements. No doubt this was a great hardship, but he thought it would be impossible to extend relief to them by any legislative measures. The application of steam power in place of physical strength, was producing a revolution in the agricultural system of the country, which they would vainly attempt to counteract by the remission of taxation. When he said this, he did not mean to deny the eventual claims which the agricultural interest might have to such a remission. But when he had heard the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement, the amount of actual revenue, and the taxes he proposed to reduce, he should reserve to himself the perfect right to contest the policy of that remission, and to move an amendment in favour of the agriculturists, if he should deem it expedient. If he did not consent to the present motion, it was not because he was prepared to deny, that eventually it might be fit to urge their claims; but because he was unwilling to excite in their minds, hopes which the House might not be able to satisfy when they came to carry into effect the practical proposition. Let the effects of the partial remission of taxes made at former periods be borne in mind. There had been a very general outcry against these measures; and there had been much more ridicule cast on them, than gratitude shown for them. If it should turn out that there was only a very limited surplus, and that, consistently with his wish to maintain the public credit, he could not claim a relief of more than £100,000 or £200,000 for the agriculturists, would they not say, "Is this all you have to offer us? Why then did you enter into a general resolution declaring that agriculture was in a distressed state, and that a remission of taxes alone could give relief to it?" He did not choose to involve himself in this embarrassment. If the Chancellor of the

Exchequer should be disposed to reduce the duty on newspapers, he should hold himself quite at liberty, if he thought fit, to vote for the proposition of his hon. friend, who proposed instead of that to remit the tax on soap, or to vote for a remission of local burdens, or any other measure which he might consider likely to be beneficial to agriculture. But the great difficulty was this, that with the exception of the malt-duty, there was no tax which bore hard on it. And he was quite certain, that if all the relief they could give should be a remission of the assessed taxes, or an equalization of the land-tax, the occupying tenant at least would exclaim that he had no interest in that; that his hopes had been disappointed, and that he should be benefited only by a repeal of the malt-tax. He did not hesitate to say, that he was not prepared to vote for such a measure, nor did he think that, in the present state of the country, corresponding advantages would be gained by a partial reduction of it. It would be always open to his noble friend to propose an entire remission of it; but with his view of that impost, of the policy of retaining it, and with his apprehension that a property tax could form the only substitute for it, he could not assent to such a motion. The noble lord had spoken of those who represented agricultural districts as likely to find a difficulty in freely expressing their opinion, and giving a vote on this subject; but he felt no such scruples. He felt himself bound, as the representative of an agricultural district, to take that course which he regarded as most conducive to its lasting welfare. He hoped his noble friend would not take the sense of the House on this question. He did not wish this for the purpose of avoiding a disagreeable vote, for he had no difficulty in determining what line he should take; but he could not help thinking that a division on this subject, if one should take place, would be a very imperfect indication to the country of the degree of interest felt on the agricultural question. He must protest against its being supposed that he was not a friend to that interest, or that he would not press for practical justice being done to it; but it would be a great hardship if the agriculturists should suppose, after a division, not on the merits of the case, but virtually on a question of form or time, that the House was indifferent to their prosperity.

The House divided on the question, that the Order of the Day be read—Ayes 208; Noes, 172; majority, 36.

THE BUDGET.

MAY 6, 1836.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer submitted his financial statement.

SIR ROBERT PEEL intended to follow the example so wisely set by the gentlemen who had spoken in the course of this slight discussion, because he thought it exceedingly wise to interpose some interval between hearing the financial statement of a minister of the Crown, from which they ascertained the amount of surplus revenue that could be fairly applied in the reduction of taxation, and of pronouncing any conclusive opinion in debate, as to the taxes which ought to be selected for reduction. Assuming that there were £500,000 or £600,000, which might be fairly applied in the remission of taxes, he should like to have an opportunity of referring to the very valuable information collected by the Commissioners of Inquiry into the state of the Excise Laws, for the purpose of forming a comparative view of the whole subject of taxation, and of ascertaining by what mode they might avail themselves of the smaller amount of surplus in the most effectual manner, for the purpose of decreasing the burdens of the people, and of increasing the productive industry of the country. The glass duty, the paper duty, the soap duty, and one other duty which had not been adverted to by the right hon. gentleman, but which he (Sir Robert Peel) should be glad to have the opportunity of fully considering—namely, the duty levied upon the importation of raw cotton—all these various points he should now avoid pronouncing any opinion upon; but having made up his mind as to the surplus available, he should at a future opportunity give his opinion as to what were the taxes most prudent to reduce. He felt the force of the observation made by his right hon. friend (Mr. Goulburn), that in time of peace we were not making any rapid progress in the reduction of the funded debt;

while we were increasing our unfunded debt, which, in a time of difficulty, might press with peculiar severity upon the country. These were considerations which ought never to escape the attention of that House; and, before the House dealt too liberally with respect to a surplus revenue, he hoped that those subjects would engage their serious attention. With regard to the duty on the importation of raw cotton, he would just state, that in the year ending the 5th April, 1835, the duty collected upon that article, which undoubtedly was one of the main sources of the prosperity of the country, amounted to £374,000; and in the year ending the 5th April, 1836, the amount levied was £400,000; the rate of duty being, he believed, only five-sixteenths of a penny per lb. But it behoved the House to bear in mind that the manufacturers of this country were exposed—and, so long as peace continued, they would be exposed—to vigorous foreign competition. He, therefore, would say, that to levy such a duty as £400,000 upon a raw material which formed the staple of our chief manufacturers, was most unwise. On the one hand, no advantage could be gained from so small a revenue; on the other, it would be most dearly purchased if, by detaining it, we should increase the advantages of an increasing and successful competition by foreign countries. With his views as to the necessity of maintaining public credit inviolate, and as to the impolicy of making no provision whatever for the interruption of that prosperity the country was now enjoying, and deprecating, as he did, the approach to that state of things by which they might encumber themselves with a new debt, he could not certainly press for the remission of the whole tax upon raw cotton; but he should rejoice to see its amount reduced as low as possible, so as not to encourage unnecessarily any competition in that important branch of trade. He also wished to reserve to himself an opportunity of considering whether, in dealing with so small an amount of surplus revenue, it might not be better to remit the duty altogether on one article, than to make a remission of a portion of the duty on two or more articles; whether, for instance, the total abolition of all excise regulations with respect to glass might not lead to a great extension of the manufacture of that useful article in this country; and whether that might not be a new and an abundant source of wealth, by our becoming manufacturers of an article which was now chiefly manufactured by other countries. There was one point to which he thought his right hon. friend (Mr. Goulburn) had intended to call the attention of the House—the policy of increasing the exportation of beer. There did seem to be a prospect of a very great increase in that branch of our export trade; and whether it might not be further increased by some regulation with respect to allowing a drawback, was worthy of consideration. He differed from the hon. member for Middlesex as to the impolicy of the observation made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in that tone of caution and warning which he assumed when speaking of the present state of prosperity in the country. It was infinitely more becoming the station of a finance minister to adopt the language and tone of caution, than the tone and language of unbounded confidence. At the same time, he saw great cause for congratulation in the present state of the manufacturing industry of the country. He believed that our present prosperity stood in general upon stable foundations, while peace continued with foreign countries; and particularly if there were any hope of the South American provinces being restored to a state of quiet and tranquillity, he could not but think that, with the elastic spirit of industry and enterprise in this country, there was a reasonable prospect of the continuance of a great part of our present prosperity. But, at the same time, he certainly thought that there were indications which would lead prudent men to doubt whether the whole of that prosperity was sound, or whether the activity which was now everywhere displayed, was necessarily connected with a safe and permanent state of things. It was impossible to see the rapid and universal rise in the price of every article of consumption, without asking the question—to what was that to be attributed? It was impossible to take up some of the newspapers—he particularly referred to some Liverpool papers—without witnessing a rage for the formation of joint-stock companies, having for their professed objects matters exceeding in absurdity those of the joint-stock companies of the year 1825. He had seen prospectuses put forth in a Liverpool paper of schemes which completely astonished him, proceeding, as they did, from a place so eminent in the commercial world, so noted for the astuteness of its inhabitants, especially that class who there carried on commercial affairs. Projects have been put forth by commercial men for carrying on manufactures and other commercial speculations by means of joint-stock companies, which could only be carried on with success when directed by individual enterprise, and with a view to individual profit. Coupling these two facts together—an universal rise in prices of all articles of consumption, and this tendency not merely to an ordinary kind of speculation, but to similar mad projects to those which prevailed in the year 1825—without feeling any cause of despondency, or any undue anxiety; yet he thought those were but acting the part of prudent men who, in time, made use of words of caution from prudential motives. There were two circumstances which ought not altogether to escape the notice of the House. One was a measure which, when first introduced, he strongly opposed—which he knew was adopted with the single view, and not perhaps unwisely, of meeting a memorable commercial crisis—namely, the measure which relieved the country banks from paying their notes above £5 in gold, and permitting them to exchange their paper for the paper of the Bank of England. While he admitted that, supposing a crisis arose, much of the evil of the crisis might be obviated by giving such permission; yet he always feared that the measure itself had a tendency to precipitate that crisis. Therefore, he for one witnessed the adoption of that permission with some anxiety and some alarm. Now, whether the principle upon which the joint-stock banks were established was perfectly sound or not, he was not prepared to say; but it did so happen, that coincident with all sorts of speculation, the multiplication of joint-stock banks throughout the country had taken place. Nothing could be so unjust as any inquisitorial interference with the private transactions of commercial men; but he thought that, as regarded these joint-stock banks, the legislature had a full right to require that there should be some general regulation established as to the principles upon which those banks should be conducted. Whether or not the habit of granting accommodation to the partners of those banks by issues of their own notes, was perfectly consistent with the commercial interests of the country, was a question which might be well deserving of consideration. He was aware, at the same time, that what might tend to diminish his anxiety was the present state of the foreign exchanges. Whether or not they ought to consider the state of foreign exchanges as a real test of soundness in a time of general commercial confidence and prosperity—whether they acted with sufficient rapidity, and were an infallible guide, was a point upon which he was not prepared to pronounce any decisive opinion. We were now proceeding with a flowing tide and a favourable wind, and every where appeared prosperity and happiness; but we should bear in mind that in all times, even apart from those factitious causes which might be now increasing our prosperity, the commercial history of this country showed that we were subject to vicissitudes arising from excessive speculation; and when that period should arrive—if ever it did arrive—he was sure we should not feel regret that, in a time of general exultation and general quiet, there were some found amongst us who, not desponding—not in the least despairing—nay, believing that a great portion of our prosperity did rest upon stable and solid foundations—yet did, from prudential considerations, warn the House and the country, that that prosperity might not be permanent, and that, interspersed with solid causes of prosperity, there might be others upon which it was not safe to rest. He would not dwell upon this subject; but without advising their entering into an inquiry of an inquisitorial nature, or which might interfere with that free agency which was essentially necessary to the general prosperity of a commercial nation; yet he thought that it was perfectly consistent with that principle, that the legislature should inquire whether the banks of issue, exercising, as they did, one of the royal prerogatives, were conducted upon principles of safety to the interests of the country at large. The resolution was agreed to.

FACTORIES' REGULATIONS BILL.

MAY 9, 1836.

The order of the day having been read for the second reading of the Factory Regulation Bill—

Sir Robert Peel wished to separate the appeal which the hon. Member for Oldham had made to the reason and deliberate judgment of the House, from that which he had made to their passions; an appeal, he must say, however, which, standing as the hon. gentleman did, free from the imputation of all interested motives, came from him with peculiar grace. There was no speech that had been delivered that night, however creditable it was to the hon. gentleman who pronounced it, that had so great an effect in convincing him of the impropriety of acceding to this motion, as the speech of the hon. member for Oldham, unless, indeed, it was that of the hon. member for Ashton (Mr. Hindley.) What was the result of the argument of that hon. member? A bill passed in 1833, which provided that the children under the age of thirteen should not work more than eight hours a day in cotton factories. That bill assumed, that there could be two relays of children, and the mills might consequently work sixteen hours a day. The hon. gentleman, however, admitted—and he understood the hon. member for Oldham to be of the same opinion—that this system of relays was impracticable, so that the law in effect prohibited working more than eight hours a day. He had come down to the House perfectly unfettered and uncertain what course he should pursue. He had received several communications upon the subject, and seen several parties, but had avoided to pledge himself upon a question which had appeared attended with so many difficulties. The two speeches he had already referred to had, however, convinced him that some alteration was necessary. That legislative interference was necessary, he was convinced; because he was afraid that the natural affection of parents in this case was not to be trusted. The point to be gained was to regulate the hours of labour, so that the law should, on the one hand, prohibit the undue working of children, and on the other, not impose any unnecessary restrictions on the mill-owners, which might operate as a check on this great branch of national industry. The right hon. gentleman ought not to have limited his bill to the single point to which it referred, because the present law had been found inoperative in several respects; but if he rejected the proposed amendment of the law, though he thought it did not go far enough, he should imply that he was content with the law as it stood, which was not the case. By voting for the bill, however, he should still preserve his right to alter it in Committee, and at the same time prove his readiness to amend the present law, should he even act as a friend of the children by refusing to alter the law. The hon. member for Oldham had stated, that he knew of 3,000 cases of false certificates granted, in the district of the country with which he was connected, by which children under age evaded the law. Now, ought the House to be satisfied with such a state of things? Even the hon. member for Oldham himself, firmly as he opposed the right hon. gentleman's motion, had proved that he was not satisfied with the law as it stood. He told the House that the practical effect of the Act was to reduce the number of working hours to eight, while, in his opinion, the number should be ten. The hon. member added, that he would not be satisfied until he succeeded in procuring a Ten Hours' Bill. If so, why did he resist the present motion? "Oh," said the hon. gentleman, "I resist it because I think that by keeping in force an absurd law—a law which must in the long run prejudice the masters—I shall compel them to submit to my wishes." Now, was that the fair way to legislate? Was that the way to make the law respected? The hon. member thought the present law absurd, and yet he was prepared to vote for its continuance. Other hon. members, he was sorry to say, supported the hon. member for Oldham; and prominent in the list stood the hon. and gallant member for Hull. That hon. member had compared the dispute about the hours of child-labour in factories to that which existed "twixt tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee." He should only say, that had the hon. member enacted the part of tweedle-dum on the present occasion, he would have shown more wisdom. If the existing law was bad, here was a proposition for its amendment; for the title of the bill was "an act to amend the acts for regulating the labour of young persons employed in factories." That title would admit of any amendment of the law. It would admit of an amendment with respect to the granting of certificates. If that part of the law which required the production of certificates as to age were worth any thing, it ought to be enforced. At present no penalty could be inflicted upon a person who might grant a false certificate, unless an information were laid within fourteen days from the commission of the offence. The inspectors reported, that under this restriction it was almost impossible to visit the offence with punishment. After reading the reports of the commissioners, and seeing the manner in which the law was violated, it was impossible, on the score of humanity, to leave the law in its present state. He must say, that the inspectors, judging from their reports, appeared to be disinterested witnesses, and to give their evidence free from any undue bias. Mr. Horner stated—and he was confirmed by the testimony of Mr. Howell—that, through the abuse of certificates, the provisions of the existing Act were constantly violated by the employment of children in factories, under the age limited by the statute; and that new provisions might be devised for obviating these infractions of the Act. Now he appealed to his noble friend (Lord Ashley), for whose intentions he entertained the utmost respect, and he asked him whether he was content to leave the law in its present state, when Mr. Horner said that an amendment would prevent it being evaded? He knew that it was necessary to take some precaution against the cupidity of parents, and he thought that that might be done by a more simple law than the present. He thought it would be preferable to the existing law to declare, that no children below a certain age should be allowed to work in factories (making provision at the same time against the granting of false certificates), and then to prescribe the number of hours during which all persons above that age should work. By sanctioning the system of relays of children, we hold out an inducement to adults to overtax their strength, for they would then work sixteen hours a day. Then, again, how could the system of relays be extended to remote districts? There were a great number of mills in England not in the vicinity of large towns, and which did not work by steam, but by water power. Suppose one of these with a hundred hands, and forty children, how could the relay system be extended to it? The restrictions here gave no security, for the law could not be acted on. Why, then, preserve a clause which, if not carried into effect, might, in consequence of its frequent violation, bring into disrespect and contempt those which might otherwise prove operative? Supposing the system of having two sets of children to work eight hours each were adopted, would not a premium be held out to adults, on whom no restriction was imposed, to tax their powers to the utmost, in order that by working double they might obtain that degree of employment their wants would require. While, therefore, they profess to support the children working in factories, by compelling the masters to adopt the system of relays, they would be doing an act of great injury to the adult labourers. Then with regard to schools, as they would be affected by the relay system. Was the school to be connected with the factory? If not, it must be but a short distance from it. Was the school to be opened during the entire time of labour? If not, you have made no corresponding provisions for the hours of work and the hours of education. As he understood the proposition of the right hon. gentleman, it was this:—That children under twelve years of age should continue subject to the present law (or, in other words, that their period of labour should be eight hours), but that children above twelve years might be called on to work for sixty-nine hours a week, or twelve hours for five days, and nine for the sixth, being Saturday. He thought that even with this amendment the law would be in an unsatisfactory state, but feeling that it was quite impossible to please all parties, and that the cure was not quite so bad as the disease; feeling, also, that the existing law was not consistent with humanity, he was willing to entertain the right hon. gentleman's proposal. Then, one word as to the danger of foreign competition, said to be likely to result from this question, and urged as an argument against it. The danger of competition was a perfectly good ground for reducing the duty on cotton wool; but the danger of competition was not a good ground for endangering the health of the factory children. He was quite opposed to the adoption of any severe restrictions on labour, from the belief that they were calculated to undermine the commercial energies of the country, and thereby to strike a blow against the happiness and comfort of the people; but when he was asked whether he would resist any attempt at amendment, or whether he would support the continuance of the present law, he felt bound to say he was conscious of the necessity of amendment, and, therefore, that he would vote for the proposition of the right hon. gentleman.

THE CANADAS.

MAY 16, 1836.

Mr. Roebuck moved a resolution relative to the Executive and Legislative Councils of the Canadas, but, at the suggestion of Sir George Grey, the hon. gentleman consented to withdraw his motion.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the conditions on which the motion appeared to have been withdrawn, imposed on him the necessity of saying a few words, not upon the general question, but upon the position in which the immediate question under consideration was left. It was not his intention to detain the House long, and he would merely observe in reference to the motion, that he thought, that with the views entertained by the hon. member, he had acted wisely in withdrawing it; but the hon. member had withdrawn it upon grounds which were calculated, in his opinion, to excite expectations on the part of the people of Canada, which, if not realized, would leave this question in a worse position than formerly. The hon. and learned gentleman did not bring forward a question relative to the general state of Canada, but had given notice of a distinct proposition—that the House should resolve itself into a committee of the whole House, to take into consideration such parts of 31st George III. c. 31, as relate to the Executive and Legislative Councils of the Canadas, for the purpose of rendering the same efficient to the good government of those provinces. The immediate question brought under discussion by the hon. gentleman was, in point of fact, the substitution of an elective council for a legislative council appointed by the Crown. He had come there prepared to give his negative to that proposition. The hon. gentleman had withdrawn it in consequence of the speech of the hon. baronet, the under-secretary for the colonies, on the ground, he presumed, that expectations were held out that this question of a material change in the executive council, and in its constitution, would occupy the attention of the commission. That, he apprehended, must have been the understanding of the hon. member when he withdrew his motion. He (Sir R. Peel) begged to say for himself, lest by silence he might seem to acquiesce in a different construction, that he was not a party, as an individual member of that House, to this compact. He did not question the prudence of the hon. gentleman in withdrawing the motion, but he thought that that proceeding, after the explanation which had been given by him, was calculated to raise expectations in the minds of the people of Canada, that the subject he had referred to was under the consideration of the government. [Mr. Roebuck: It was stated in the instructions that it was so.] He admitted it was mentioned; but in what manner? Lord Glenelg in them said, "That the king was most unwilling to admit as a matter of deliberation, the question whether one of the vital principles of provincial government should undergo alteration." It was also stated—"that the solemn pledges so repeatedly given for the maintenance of that system, and the just support which it derived from constitutional usages and analogies, were alike opposed to such innovation, and might almost seem to preclude the discussion of it." Could a minister of state be conceived to give a stronger opinion as to the inexpediency of any proposed measure, and as to the absence of any argument that might be deduced in support of it from constitutional usages and analogies? Lord Glenelg also said, "It must be recollected that the form of provincial constitution in question is no modern experiment nor plan of government, in favour of which nothing better than doubtful theory can be urged. A council nominated by the king, and possessing a co-ordinate right of legislation with the representatives of the people, is an invariable part of the British colonial constitution in all the transatlantic possessions of the Crown, with the exception of those which still remain liable to the legislative authority of the King in Council. In some of these colonies it has existed for nearly two centuries. Before the recognition of the United States as an independent nation, it prevailed over every part of the British possessions in the North American continent not comprised within the limits of colonies founded by charters of incorporation. The considerations ought indeed to be weighty which should induce a departure from a system recommended by so long and successful a course of historical precedent." Justified, therefore, by these reasons, he was prepared to oppose any serious change in the form of government in the colony; and if it were necessary, he would add, that it would be better for the ministers to make up their minds to the change, and take it into their own hands, than to leave the matter open for discussion, as it would be if the motion were withdrawn under an impression that the question was under consideration. He should be very sorry to say one word on the merit of the question. He should wish to consider the hon. gentleman as being in the position of any hon. member who had made an original motion and withdrawn it, after exercising his right of reply. Cautiously avoiding, therefore, the discussion of the principle of the subject, he must yet be careful not to acquiesce, by silence, in the grounds on which the hon. member had thought proper to withdraw his motion. Lord Glenelg stated, in the instructions which he had addressed to the commission, in the sixty-seventh paragraph, that a disposition existed on the part of his Majesty "not to refuse those who advocate such extensive alterations an opportunity of proving the existence of the grievances to which so much promineney has been given." What he feared was, that the necessity for change was a matter that is wholly incapable of demonstration. But suppose they should say that they were ready to correct all past abuses by the adoption of a new and improved system in future, would not that be an answer to the demand made upon the legislature? It might be easy enough to establish the existence of abuse; but as to the proof necessary to show what would be the best form of government in the colonies, that was a question which it would be utterly impossible to submit to any test which would lead to a satisfactory result. After all the experiments they could try, they would find that the opinions of men remained unchanged as to the wisdom of their own particular theories; and although they might have abundance of allegations of specific grievance, still they would not bring home to the breast of any one the conviction, that his particular notions with respect to the form of government which ought to be established were founded in error. If, however, the ministers purposed to make a change in the constitution of the government of those colonies, he hoped that they would bring their proposition forward with as little delay as possible, because, if it were not their intention to take that course, if they meant to preserve that "vital principle" in our colonial governments, which they said was sanctioned by long and "constitutional usage and analogy," he must express it as his opinion that they had better at once avow what they really intended, and by that means prevent any party from cherishing false expectations—expectations which, if permitted to exist without the voice of a single independent member of this House being raised against them, were calculated only to embroil still more the unfortunate affairs of the Canadas.

Mr. Roebuck's motion was withdrawn, and the Order of the Day read for a Committee of Supply, but the Committee was postponed.

TITHES AND CHURCH (IRELAND).

JUNE 1, 1836.

The Order of the Day for the second reading of the Tithe Bill (Ireland), having been read—

Lord Stanley moved as an amendment, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill for the conversion of Tithe Composition into Rent Charges, and for the better distribution of Ecclesiastical revenues in Ireland."

A long discussion ensued, and the House adjourned.

JUNE 3, 1836.

In the third day's debate on Lord Stanley's amendment, and in reply to Mr. O'Connell,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL spoke as follows:—I hope the hon. and learned gentleman is not about to quit his place,—[These words were followed by the most deafening yells and cheering from the Opposition benches, which continued for some time. Mr. O'Connell left the House for a minute or two, and returned.] It certainly is much more agreeable to a person rising to notice observations, made with considerable vehemence and warmth by another, that he should have the opportunity of noticing them in the presence of that person. And as the hon. and learned gentleman did personally suggest to me, the taking a note of what he was saying, and challenged me to give an answer to the statement which he was making, I think I could hardly have expected that the first act of his on closing his speech, would have been to deprive me of the opportunity of making my comments in his presence. The learned gentleman commenced his speech by a warm eulogium on a speech delivered the other night by the member for Weymouth (Mr. F. Buxton). He considered that speech as a complete exemplification of Christian charity; as a proof that it was possible for a man to maintain his own opinions, and to urge strongly his own views, and yet do that without insulting his opponents—without imputing to them impure and corrupt motives for the conduct which they were pursuing. The learned gentleman advised that, as a specimen of true Protestant feeling, the hon. gentleman would not trust his speech to a reporter, but would report and publish it himself. For the purpose of giving force to the contrast, will the learned gentleman report his own speech? He admires the example which has been set him, he admires this proof of Christian charity and truly Protestant feeling; but in the speech which he has made to-night, in his imagination in the character of a West Briton, it is quite clear that, while he admires the example, we have not made him a convert to Protestant charity. The learned gentleman says that it is right we should understand the bill, as statesmen, before we pronounce upon it. I listened to him, having great doubts whether I did understand the bill, having doubts whether I did comprehend the real motive from which it sprung, or the object which it professed to gain. I did listen with patience and attention to him for the purpose of having any deficiency of information supplied to me. The learned gentleman was exceedingly severe on the hon. gentleman beside me (Mr. Harvey), whom it is no part of my duty to defend—whom it is no part of my duty, because the hon. gentleman, I think, opposed the proposal of the noble lord, as he did the bill before us. But I must say, after the avowals made by the learned gentleman, that although it is no part of my duty to defend the member for Southwark, I do not conceive why he was subjected to the attack of the hon. and learned gentleman. The hon. and learned gentleman says, that the member for Southwark entertains extravagant notions on this subject, that he contemplates the appropriation of tithes to the purposes of charity or of public utility; and then he says, that he will tell us what his own opinions on the subject are. Why, they appear to be about as extravagant as those of the hon. member. He says that the true notion would be that of turning tithe to land, giving up the corn-laws to commerce, and paying the clergy out of the Consolidated Fund. Why, that seems to be pretty nearly as hopeless a proposition as that of the hon. member. The hon. and learned gentleman says that this bill will settle the tithe question. [Mr. O'Connell: No.] Not effect an arrangement of the tithe question? [Mr. O'Connell: At present it will not.] Then why does he invite us to accede to it? If it is to effect no settlement, if it will continue the discontent and disorders which prevail, what is the argument by which the learned gentleman asks the vote of the House to it? The learned gentleman makes a speech, in which, professing to be an advocate for this bill, he repudiates every one of the principles on which his Majesty's government profess to rest it. At the same moment that he is professing his adherence to it, he uses arguments which preclude its acceptance by the people of Ireland. "Make this settlement," he says, "for the Church." "Do you wish," he asks, "to put an end to scenes of bloodshed that have caused pain to every feeling mind?" We do; but what hope have we of putting an end to those scenes of bloodshed if we are to accede to this arrangement, and then hear the comments which the hon. gentleman makes? The bill of his Majesty's government proposes to allot £368,000 to the maintenance of the parochial clergy in Ireland; that sum is to be raised by annual payments, according to the bill—that bill of which the learned gentleman is the advocate, and which he condemns us for not acceding to. The whole change is to be a conversion of tithe composition into rent-charge, the rent-charge being paid, in the first instance, by the first estate of inheritance—by the landlord; but being subsequently paid to the landlord by the occupying tenant. The bill maintains an establishment. The hon. and learned gentleman says no establishment ought to be maintained. The bill makes the support of that establishment to fall on the occupying tenant, not by a direct payment, but indirectly it does so. The learned gentleman says that he is an advocate for the voluntary principle; he thinks that no man ought in justice to be required to pay for the support of a religion which he does not profess, and that the clergy of Ireland ought to be paid by the Consolidated Fund. Observe, these are arguments which he uses to induce the people of Ireland to adopt the bill, which is directly opposed to the voluntary principle for which he contends. They are to have tithe composition converted into rent-charge. He is opposed to redemption, which we propose; but “no,” says the learned gentleman, “I will not even give you leave to bring in your bill; the real extirpation and extinction of tithes shall and must be part of the arrangement.” They are to be called on for the annual payments, and the learned gentleman who invites them to pay, says that he maintains the system of the voluntary principle, and the injustice of any man supporting a religion which he does not profess. The hon. and learned gentleman says, that if we do justice, we ought to allot seven-eighths of the tithes to the Roman Catholics as an establishment. Is that the way in which he reconciles the Roman Catholics, who receive no part of the tithe, to pay the seven-eighths to the maintenance of the Protestant establishment? And finally, the learned gentleman says, that Scotland did not effect the establishment of her religion by this tame acquiescence—that her people went out in the morning on the mountain-sward with their claymores—that they were not content with liberty of conscience, but demanded establishment, and with establishment an ascendancy. And the hon. and learned gentleman, with his boasted influence over the people of Ireland, thus demonstrating his views of the injustice of this arrangement, tells us that we may hope the next winter will pass in quiet, and that there will be a universal and cheerful acquiescence, because tithe composition is converted into rent-charge. The learned gentleman, too, calls us men of blood, and insinuates that we view without horror—almost with satisfaction—the melancholy consequences of enforcing legal rights. He details, as is his wont, the scenes of Rathcormac; he tells us of the widow and of the orphan; and by this enumeration of horrid details he works on the feelings and on the passions. Now, let me ask of the learned gentleman, after the views which he has expressed of the injustice of maintaining an establishment, if the wrong of departing from the voluntary principle, and the grievous oppression of withholding from the people of Ireland seven-eighths of this fund, for an establishment of their religion—if for an establishment they were disposed—let me ask of the learned gentleman what security he can give that, next winter, without the shedding of blood the enforcement of his rent-charge will be possible? Will he abandon it to the first threat of opposition, or if opposed will he enforce the law—and if the civil power be insufficient, will he call in the aid of the military force? If he will, he will be responsible, as he attempts to make us, for the scenes of suffering which he details—for the cries of the widow and the orphan. If, on the other hand, he advises, that on the first show of resistance you should abandon your right, then let me ask you what becomes of your security for the rent-charge? There have been many speeches delivered in the course of the debate, many parts of which I should have been glad to notice, but on account of the lateness of the hour, and because I feel how completely exhausted the subject is, I shall refer only to their speeches which were peculiarly important, either from the ability which they manifest, or the station of those who delivered them; and first and shortly, I shall refer to the speech of the learned gentleman (the member for Weymouth), which has excited the admiration, but has not insured the imitation of the learned gentleman. That hon. gentleman (the member of Weymouth) has, I think, for some reason or other—I am sure a conscientious one—abated somewhat of his anxiety for the Protestant establishment. The anxiety and apprehensions which he expressed last year have been considerably diminished. The hon. member then insisted that ample precaution should be taken in case of an increase of the number of the Protestant establishments, for holding ample reserves for the purpose of ensuring the spiritual care for their increased numbers; and he now makes his vote for this bill dependent on one condition—he, a determined friend of this bill, was yet prepared to withhold his assent from it and oppose it, unless he received some assurance that immediate inquiry should be instituted into the subject of Irish education. But can the hon. gentleman be surprised at other persons entertaining a similar jealousy? If the hon. gentleman thinks that there is a prima facie case for inquiry—and he is prepared to withhold his assent to the bill unless inquiry be conceded, let me ask him what he would do supposing inquiry were conceded, and the result to be unfavourable? Surely, if there be ground sufficient to withhold your assent from an important measure unless inquiry be granted, it follows as a matter of course, that assent ought to be withheld if the result of inquiry should be unfavourable; and can the hon. gentleman be surprised if when he thinks it necessary to demand inquiry, the members of the establishment in Ireland should view with some reluctance and apprehension, before the inquiry, the irrevocable alienation of their property by act of parliament, for the purposes of advancing the object of this bill. The hon. gentleman says, “You contend that there is no surplus, and if then,” he triumphantly asks, “there be no surplus, what can be the possible objection to appropriation?” I tell the hon. gentleman, in the first place, that to discuss hypothetical questions with respect to excess of property, is dangerous to all property. I say that it signifies not what the character of the property be; I may see the distinction between corporate and individual property—I may recognise that the one is a trust, and that the other belongs to individuals without a condition annexed to it. But although there be that distinction in the character of the property, let me tell the hon. member that the danger to all property of discussing hypothetical cases with respect to excess is precisely the same. Establish the fact of a surplus, and with your principle, having determined the amount, proceed to appropriate. But there is danger, you being uncertain whether there be a surplus or not, in your assuming the contingency and providing for its appropriation. Suppose the hon. gentleman said to a man engaged in trade, or having large landed possessions, “We will provide that in case of there being an excess of property, more than is sufficient for your wants, it shall be devoted to some other purposes.” If that were objected to, the answer would equally apply, that “if there be no surplus where is the harm done?” It is a bad precedent to establish, and on that account it is objectionable; it is objectionable to set the precedent of legislating for hypothetical cases. If the hon. gentleman has watched the course of legislation this session, he must have seen that we have enough to do with practical matters. This is the 3rd of June, and we have made no great advance in practical matters. The clap-traps of the last government have been held up to public scorn; but so satisfied is the hon. gentleman of the progress which we have made in the remedy of grievances, and in administering practical measures of relief, that he is content to provide, on an assumption of the future, for contingencies which may never arise. But there is another evil. If there be no surplus, you are practising a gross and unjustifiable delusion. You are deluding the tithe-payers of Ireland. You have not taken a surplus from the Irish Church. You have appropriated nothing from the Irish Church. You have taken £50,000 from where? From the consolidated fund. Who provides the consolidated fund? The tithe-payers of Ireland, by taxation, contribute towards it; and the delusion which you practise on them is this—that, after the lapse of years, you will perhaps be enabled to obtain something from the surplus of Church property for the payment of that £50,000 which you now take from the consolidated fund. The noble lord told us, that it would be years before a surplus arose for that purpose. And this is the question about which we are debating. This is the matter on which apparently parties are at issue; then, years hence, a few hundreds will be raised for the purpose of paying a surplus which does not exist, but which you are giving a fictitious existence to by taking it from the produce of the general taxation of the country. That, then, is my answer to the hon. gentleman—that if there be no surplus, although in one sense the concession of appropriation may be small, it is objectionable in principle, as endangering property, and objectionable in fact, because it is a delusion. The three speeches to which I wish more particularly to refer are, the speech of the noble lord, the secretary of state for the Home Department, the speech of the noble lord, the secretary for Ireland, and the speech of the learned gentleman, the member for the county of Tipperary. I select these three speeches because I consider them of importance themselves on account of the abilities of those by whom they were delivered, and on account of the station of the two noble lords, and also because one of them, as we are told, indicated the principle on which the government has proceeded. That was the speech of the noble lord, the secretary of state for the Home Department. The speech of the noble lord, the secretary for Ireland, administered what he called in his jocose phrase, "a dose of calculation." The speech of the learned gentleman was important, he being the able and eloquent representative of a class, and explaining the grounds on which he gave his apparently cordial support to this proposition. The noble lord, the secretary for Ireland, told us last night, that in the speech of the noble lord, the secretary for the Home Department we must look for the principles of this measure. He said that the measure was founded on broad and fundamental maxims, and that those should be explained by the noble lord, the leader of the House of Commons; he intended to perform the part—which he performed with great ability—the subordinate part of supplying the arithmetical calculations. He said, "Important as are the principles—although we rely on them—although they are broad and fundamental—and although we are almost inclined to disregard statistical and arithmetical calculations, yet the inferences which we draw from our philosophy are confirmed by our arithmetic; we stand on the double ground—we defy opposition, and, fortified by philosophy and figures, we are prepared for the contest." I want to examine both the philosophy and the facts. I first want to examine the principle on which this rule professes to be founded; and then the principle having been established, I want to ascertain whether the calculation be correct. I want to show that not acting on my own assumption—not defending the abuses in the establishment—not urging extravagant compensation for sinecures, or insufficient duty—the arithmetical calculations of the noble lord fail him. I want to show—taking his own data, with the new amendments which have been introduced into the bill—he has been again deceived. I am almost afraid to do this, because the noble lord next year will tell me that the scheme is mine. I expect that, because I assume the principles of the government—because I attempt to show that on their own data, they have hardly the means of executing their own intentions, the noble lord will hereafter tell me, "This was your plan of Church Reform, and you ought to be satisfied, because we have adopted your suggestions." The noble lord (the secretary for the Home Department) had risen professedly to reply to the noble lord, the member for North Lancashire, who, the question turning necessarily on arithmetical details, had confined himself naturally to this narrow compass, not whether in the case a large surplus should be proved to exist, it would be proper to appropriate it in such and such a manner, but whether any surplus at all did exist or not. The noble lord, the member for North Lancashire, had gone on step by step throughout his speech to show, that if the clergy of Ireland were adequately provided for there would be no surplus. The noble lord, the secretary for the Home Department, gave a short explanation of the principle on which the measure was founded, and then, having made a declaration against figures as of very little importance, the noble lord flew into a declamation on the course which he stated we were about to take. "On the same grounds," said the noble lord, "on which you brought in or acquiesced in the coercion bill, or in the same spirit in which you resisted corporate reform, and in which you have misgoverned Ireland for seven centuries—on the same grounds and in the same spirit you now refuse to appropriate a contingent surplus, and I cannot condescend to argue the question when placed in this its true light." Such was the declaration of the noble lord. But was the principle a new one on which this measure professed to be founded? I thought, until the noble lord had spoken, that the principle adopted by his Majesty's government was, that the first claim on the revenues of the Church was for the purposes of the Church. I thought, that on that view the claims of the Roman Catholic population were necessarily excluded, not only here, but by the government, until the fact of the existence of a surplus was ascertained. "But," said the noble lord, "you talk of £200 per annum for the Protestant clergyman, and for supplying the spiritual wants of Protestants; but you omit from your calculation the 6,500,000 Roman Catholics: you consider them as aliens in blood—as subjects of a lower class than yourselves; you totally forget their claims on the Church revenues.” Sir, for myself, I disclaim entertaining any such view with respect to my Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen. I have always said this, and I repeat it, that civil disabilities having been removed, I admit no civil distinctions between any of the classes of his Majesty’s subjects. They stand in that respect upon a perfect equality. But if I admit that the first claim on the revenue of the Established Church is the spiritual wants of the Church, I have a right to exclude the claims even of the 6,500,000 Roman Catholics. I don’t say, neglect those claims—I don’t say, withhold the means of supplying the deficiencies on which they rest—I don’t doom the Roman Catholics to the darkness of ignorance, and eternal deprivation of the light of knowledge—I say, consider their condition and ameliorate it; and if they are in such a state of ignorance as they have been represented, surely this kingdom is powerful and prosperous enough to find the means of enlightening such a class of her Majesty’s subjects. I do not, therefore, exclude the 6,500,000 Roman Catholics from a share in the benefits to be derived from instruction and knowledge. I only doubt the legitimacy of their claims until the spiritual claims of the Church of England in Ireland are satisfied. I only say, don’t satisfy these claims from that source. I do not say that these claims do not exist, neither do I say, postpone the consideration of these claims, and doom those who urge them to ignorance. All I maintain is, that their instruction should be provided for from sources not affecting the revenues of the Established Church. When I heard the noble lord declare his willingness to try a new principle with respect to the Church Establishment, I thought that new principle would at least be a common one. This I know, that the principle I have laid down was a common principle. What new colleagues the noble lord may have, or how he may have been compelled to change his opinion, I know not. Having no surplus, your arithmetical calculations fail you. Your old principle not answering your present object, it became necessary to devise a new one. With that I have no concern; but I would prove to you that your old principle was in conformity with my view. In the year 1833, the noble lord’s (Stanley’s) scheme for Church reform was proposed. It was that scheme by which extensive and important reforms were effected. The number of bishops were reduced from twenty-two to twelve; provisions were made for the complete extinction of all sinecures; power was taken of dealing with every existing living, and apportioning to them stipends of not more than £800, and not less than £200 per annum. He who proposed the bill explained the principles on which it was founded, and the means taken by his Majesty’s government with respect to the principle of the appropriation of Church revenues. The noble lord, who was the Secretary for Ireland, is now considered as entertaining extreme opinions on the subject of the Irish Church, and on the inalienable nature of the revenues of that Church. But was that bill proposed by the noble lord? No, but by Lord Althorp, who, as if to give more emphatic proof of the fact, that it was not the bill of an individual, but the measure of government, distinctly declared, in proposing it, that “it had been agreed that this measure should be brought forward as a measure of the government; and it had been thought best, on the present occasion, as on former occasions, by a person who filled the situation in the House that he filled, rather than the particular minister with whose department in the government of Ireland the measure was more especially connected.” The noble lord, in the course of that speech, having explained the details of the measure, continued—“However great the difference of opinion may be, as to the right of parliament to apply the property of the Church to the purposes of the State, both those who think it has no right to transfer it, and those who think that it has, all are agreed, I think, in this, that the first claim on the property of the Church is, the Church itself.” No parties are likely to dissent from this opinion, except those who either think that there ought to be no Church Establishment at all, or those who think that a different Church ought to be established in Ireland. The noble lord repudiated the notion that seven-eighths of the property of the Church Establishment should be disposed of, in proportion to the number of those who differed from it on religious opinions. “We have heard,” said the noble lord, “frequently of benefices in which no duty is performed at all, or where there is no Church, or where there is no resident minister. We have heard these statements frequently made; but it is also well known that there are many places where there are congregations in which there is a difficulty in the due performance of public worship; and that the working clergy, whilst their superiors enjoy large revenues, have very inadequate incomes, and are frequently placed in the most distressing circumstances. There are 200 livings in Ireland of less value than £100 a-year. Whilst this is the case, where there are Protestant congregations who require to be supplied with the means of attending divine worship, it cannot surely be said by any one that the Church of Ireland ought not to have the first claim on the property of the Church." These were the opinions adopted by the government of 1833, and explained by Lord Althorp. Then, Sir, what is the principle now assumed by the noble lord? I took a note of his words. I hope it will be found accurate. I hardly think there is a mistake in it. Now, observe, that the opinion of Lord Althorp and the government of 1833 was, that in case you admitted the Established Church to the first claim upon the revenues of the Church, it follows as a necessary consequence, that you must have this country divided into districts of a convenient distance, and a proper stipend attached to each. But the principle which the noble lord maintained was this—"When you talk," said he, "of the State, I contend that it is the duty of the State not to choose or select a religion which shall be in accordance with the religious opinions of the legislature or supreme authority, but to secure the means of inculcating instruction and morality amongst the great body of the people. If we were to maintain any other opinion, we must extend the Established Church of this country to Hindostan, and the clergy of our Established Church should repair thither, in order to spread throughout these, and all our other dominions, one religion, and to enforce a conformity to one faith." Now, I have heard of an established religion, of which the propagation of its doctrines was not the main object. If that object be not the propagation of its doctrines, there is an end to the Establishment. How is that possible, but by inculcating the subscription to those doctrines which the professors of that religion maintain? "But," says the noble lord, "it is the duty of the State not to select a religion in accordance with what the legislature, or the supreme authority, may consider right; but to inculcate instruction and morality amongst the people." I say, that doctrine is fatal to the Reformation. It may be the duty of the State to take measures for the general instruction of the people—it may be the duty of the legislature to provide the means of moral instruction in a country circumstanced as Ireland is, it may be proper to provide some mode of supplying instruction on a national principle, precluding the prevalence of any special religious doctrines from such a system—but if an establishment is kept up at all, it should be for the purpose of maintaining the doctrines which it was established to enforce. What are these doctrines? The doctrines of Protestantism, as opposed to the creed of the Church of Rome. If we are not ashamed of the Protestant faith, can we maintain the principle that it is not the duty of the legislature to provide the means of inculcating, not merely the moral instruction of the people, but affording the inhabitants of the country the means of worshipping God according to the rites of the Protestant religion, and selecting the ministers of that religion with the view of inculcating it. And if we determine on this course, the noble lord argues that we must extend to Hindostan the clergy of the Established Church. Why? What! is the Church of Ireland placed in such a position as to make the question, whether the established religion should be extended to Hindostan an analogous case? Is not the Protestant religion introduced by law into Ireland? Is not the King sworn to maintain the Protestant religion in Ireland? Does not the Act of Union guarantee its maintenance? And shall I be told that the question of the maintenance of the Protestant religion, and establishment of it in a portion of the empire, with respect to which its continuance is guaranteed by the compact of the Act of Union, should be argued in the same way as the question, whether the Protestant clergy should be diffused over Hindostan? If there be one established religion, the inculcation of its doctrines—let the noble lord say what he will—is an essential condition of it, and it cannot exist without it. If it be not our duty to inculcate the especial doctrines, it is our duty to abolish the establishment. Paley argues that the religion of the majority should be the established religion. But if Paley were right, and we were wrong, still it must follow, as a necessary consequence, that the doctrine of the established religion must be inculcated. The question, whether you choose the religion of the State, in conformity with what the supreme authority considers the truth; or whether you take the religious belief of the majority as the foundation for your establishment—and the latter proposition seems to have had the support of Paley—may be open to doubt. But whether Paley were right or wrong, that after you had selected the religion of the State, you are bound to inculcate its doctrines, seems to me to be a principle altogether incontrovertible. If, indeed, the noble lord's principle be correct; if it be our duty to inculcate general, moral, and religious instruction, rather than the doctrines of the Established Church; then, indeed, the noble lord is justified in maintaining that the revenues of the Church should not, in the first instance, be applied to Church purposes, but without reference to the demands of the Church, the order of distribution should be reversed, and moral and religious instruction be administered to the people through other means than those which the establishment supplies. But the system of instruction proposed by the noble lord, and to the support of which the supposed surplus is to be applied, excludes all reference to religious doctrines. The noble lord's intended system excludes all reference to religious opinions, and the first claim on the revenues of the Established Church, is to provide means for the maintenance of such a system. If Lord Althorp's principle be adhered to, namely, that the first claim on the church revenues is the supply of the spiritual wants of the Protestants, we are entitled to see what is really required to satisfy those wants. If, however, that noble lord's principle be correct, we are bound to inquire, not what may be requisite for upholding the Protestant Church, but what may suffice for affording moral and religious instruction to the people. But how does the noble lord satisfy the conditions of his own proposition? If it be the duty of the legislature not to support the establishment, but to devise means for promoting the moral and religious instruction of the people, why does he consent to postpone it? If it be his duty to the people of Ireland to take from the revenues of the Protestant Church, why does he make a boast of a plan which is to depend upon a contingent surplus, and which must take many years before it can be carried into execution? The noble lord having assumed the principle of Lord Althorp, that the first claim is the wants of the establishment, I will prove to him that his large surplus would have no existence if the reasonable wants of the church were supplied. The whole question turns on the accuracy of the noble lord's calculations. Now, I am going to question their accuracy, and without ascertaining whether his magnificent surplus should be devoted to general moral instruction or not, I intend to show that his estimates are fallacious, and if he was prepared to uphold his own expressed intentions with regard to the Protestant Church, there will, in point of fact, be no surplus. And if that be the case, then I say, it furnishes an undeniable argument in favour of the amendment of the noble lord, and I have a right to call on you not to countenance those delusions, and not to hazard the security of the church and of the peace of Ireland, by holding out expectations which cannot be realized, and which can only end in disappointment. I will make no allusion to the fund for the building of churches, but I entreat the noble lord's attention to a scrutiny of his calculations. The noble lord proposed that 1,250 benefices should be continued in Ireland. He had, with a view, as he said, of consulting the feelings of the people of England, given, as an average amount of income for each clergyman, £295 a-year. Of this £295, forty-five pounds were to be supplied by glebe; and, consequently, £250 would remain to be supplied by tithes. The total revenue which the noble lord, according to his plan, would require for the parochial clergy of 1,250 benefices, would be £368,750. Deduct the glebe—for that calculation included glebe, which amounted to £56,000—and the sum which the noble lord would require from tithes would amount to £312,750. There is an error in the noble lord's calculation; but I will take the noble lord's own figures. The noble lord estimated ecclesiastical tithes at £511,000: he thought they only amounted to £507,000, but he would take the noble lord's estimate, and, deducting the thirty-two and a half per cent., which would amount to £166,000, from the £511,500, and there would remain £345,500. The tax on benefices is £7,300, which will reduce the amount of ecclesiastical tithes to £338,000. The noble lord calculated on 250 curates, which was a large reduction on the present number of 450. The curates were to be allowed £100 each; £75 of which is to be paid out of the general fund, and £25 by the clergyman. Still, though drawn from different sources, £100 a-year must be drawn from tithes. The fund thus created will amount to £25,000. The amount of tithes has already been reduced to £338,000, take from it £25,000, and there will remain £313,000. The noble lord said not a word about reopening compositions, or the purchase of glebes, which, in my opinion, will amount at least to £20,000. I have already reduced the sum to £313,000, and if I am correct in the statement of what is to be allowed for the purposes just stated, it will reduce it to £293,000. But to this must be added, £10,000 ministers' money, which, upon his own showing, will raise the sum calculated upon by the noble lord to £303,000. Out of that sum 1,250 benefices are to be provided for at £250, which will amount to £312,000. By deductions from the noble lord's own principles, it is plain that he wants £312,000, and he having only £303,000, instead of there being any surplus, it is plain that there will be a deficiency of £10,000. Where will this surplus be derived from? It can come from no other source whatever but the sale of church lands. The noble lord has taken power by the bill to sell church lands on the next avoidance; tithes are uncertain property, but land is not. They left, as the bill stood, the clergy in the possession of a rent-charge, and they took the power of selling every acre of church land into the hands of the Crown. What is the case which they heard stated to-night? There was a clergyman deprived of every shilling of his tithes; but having the good fortune to have twelve productive acres of land, and God having blessed him with sons able and willing to work—ashamed to beg, but not ashamed to dig—he contrived to eke out a miserable subsistence by the produce of some potatoes, gleaned by the sweat of his own sons' brows. The noble lord last night made a great impression on the House, by attempting to show what is the amount of duty committed to an English clergyman, compared with that of an Irish clergyman. The comparison which the noble lord instituted between a clergyman in Scotland and in Ireland is wholly inapplicable. The noble lord estimated the average extent of parishes in Ireland at 10,000 acres, the area of an English living at 3,460 acres, or five square miles. Now, it did not at all follow as a necessary consequence that the duties of a clergyman were in proportion to the number of the inhabitants of his parish; for a small number scattered over an extensive area would impose duties much more burdensome than a larger number living in a small extent. In Ireland the noble lord computed there were 10,000 acres in a parish comprising an area of from thirteen to fourteen square miles. But that estimate is altogether incorrect; and if I prove that, what confidence can be placed in such statements, and what becomes of the conclusion that the Irish clergyman is assigned a sufficient stipend for the duties which he has to perform? There are 20,000,000 statute acres in Ireland. Divide 20,000,000 acres by 1,250, the number of the benefices, and there would remain 16,000 statute acres for every parish. The noble lord's estimate is 10,000, so that here is an error of 6,000 acres. The noble lord also said, that the limit of the area was fourteen miles. But there are 640 statute acres in a mile; and divide 16,000 by 640, and it will be found that the noble lord has made an error of about twelve square miles, when he estimated the area of the parishes in Ireland at from thirteen to fourteen miles. The average is twenty-five square miles, instead of fourteen. The average number of Protestants in each benefice is 650, who will be intrusted to the charge of every minister of the Church of Ireland. Now there being 650 members of the church, and the duty being extended over twenty-five square miles on the average in every benefice, is it just to limit three-fourths of the establishment to £250 per annum at the maximum of emolument? Why, then, talk sarcastically of acres? That is a wretched sophism put forth to extort a cheer from a party. And you who have repeated with so much levity this doctrine, will you allow me to read to you what was said by Lord Althorp when the Church Temporalities' Bill was under consideration. The noble lord's words were:—"Sir, a great deal has been said with respect to the number of bishops in Ireland, as compared with the number of bishops in England. I do not consider that, however, to be quite a fair mode of making the comparison, because the duties of the bishops in Ireland do not depend wholly on the number of souls in their dioceses, but on the space over which those duties are to be exercised: the duty of a bishop requiring the regular visitation of the different parts of his diocese." So that Lord Althorp admitted, that the consideration of space ought to be one of the elements of the question. Now, what is the scheme with which I have been finding fault? My object is to show you, that even taking your own plan of supporting the church, even with the scanty pittance which you dole out to its ministers, you can have no surplus. I shall take the dioceses of Cashel and Tuam, comprising very nearly one half of Ireland, for those dioceses contain nearly 10,000,000 statute acres, and include the counties of Tipperary, Limerick, Kilkenny, Waterford, Cork, Kerry, Galway, Clare, Roscommon, Mayo, King's County, Queen's County, and Sligo. In these two dioceses, by your plan there will be only eleven livings exceeding £300 a-year, and which must be under £400 a-year. What hopes of advancement can be held out to the clergy, when for one-half of Ireland there will be only eleven benefices exceeding £300 per annum? In the diocese of Cashel there are 469 benefices; in Tuam only 103; making a total of 572 benefices; and in the two dioceses there are 423 churches. Now out of the 572 benefices, by this bill of his Majesty's government, 489 can in no case exceed the value of £200 per annum, and may be only worth £100. I have, however, that confidence in the noble lord opposite that I do not believe, while he holds the office of secretary for Ireland, that he will ever hesitate to use the power he will possess, to raise the £100 livings to £200 per annum. Thus, then, out of the 572 benefices, the prizes are to be eleven livings varying from £300 to £400 per annum. I know that the number of Protestants in these districts is small, and that Roman Catholics have the preponderance; but still I never shall believe that it can be for the interest of the established church, that for one-half of Ireland there should be allotted only £100 a-year for each of 489 livings. I share, in common with the noble lord opposite, all the revolting feelings he so strongly manifested when he stated the other night, how painful it was to discuss what ought to be the lowest stipend of a minister of the Church. If this were res integra—if this were an allotment out of the consolidated fund, there might be something in the proposition; but this is an allotment to be made to the clergy out of property which is their own. I am as ready as the noble lord to say, "prohibit sinecures, abolish pluralities, curtail superfluities;" but when it is said, that there exists a necessity for limiting stipends to £200 a-year, I really must ask from what cause does that necessity arise? Is it a necessity created by engagements into which the government has entered? Is it entailed by the obligation imposed upon them of finding a surplus revenue? or is it a necessity produced by a provident view to the wants and interest of the Church? £200 per annum for a minister of the Church? Is that the great inducement to be held out to the ordained servants of that Church? Look to the inducements held out to members of other professions: take, for instance, the poor-law commissioners, the assistant-commissioners, the commissioners for consolidating the criminal laws, with the grants to them of £5,000 and £10,000 per annum. Do I mean to say that this remuneration has been too great for the gentlemen forming these bodies?—Certainly not; but I call upon the House to maintain at least some decent proportion in dealing with members of a profession, of at least equal respectability. If it be desired to degrade the Church—to banish from it men of educated and enlightened minds, able to defend the doctrines they inculcate—if it be wished to expel such men from the service of the Church;—tell them at once, that they must expect nothing but the mere means of daily subsistence, and that they must abandon all thoughts of independence of character—and your object will then be understood; but if it be intended that the minister of religion should be enabled, not only to exist himself, but able, as he ought to be, to relieve the wants of the distressed and wretched—consider not his interests, but the interests of charity and of religion; and allot to him, at least, a decent stipend, and give him some hopes of, at least, moderate advancement. There are many men who now hear me, possessed of ample fortunes, acquired by their own industry—there are others enjoying property, which has been gained for them, and handed down to them by their fathers;—to these I would say, "You know what a stipend of £200 would be to a clergyman with a large family—a man who has to pay £20 on receiving his appointment to a living; do not grudge an increase to him—if you will not grant it for the sake of the individual, at least do so for the sake of religion." Compare his position with that of the member of any other profession—of the bar, the army, or as connected with commerce. Remember, not only to what, by this bill, he is limited, but also that which he is ever precluded from attaining. Let hon. members compare the position of the Irish clergy, with that of the messengers of this House. In the early part of the session, the hon. and learned member for Kilkenny put a notice on the books, of which I certainly have since heard nothing, that he would move a special instruction to the committee on the fees and salaries of the messengers and door-keepers, to provide for the vested interests of those officers during their lives. Here is an acknowledgment of the necessity of providing, for important offices, men of respectability. God forbid! that I should throw any disparagement upon any situation; but even in these days of apology, I will offer none to these officers, whose interests are thus watched over, for saying that I do not think them superior to the ministers of the established church of Ireland. Neither shall I shock their feelings by saying that all situations are not equal. From the report of the committee, however, it appears that there are three door-keepers, and one of them, Mr. Pratt, returns that he has received, annually, on an average of the seven years 1829 to 1835, the sum of £1,060. The committee, however, are of opinion that his income might be fairly taken at £911, and they recommend that he may be allowed that sum in lieu of all perquisites. The select committee, in 1835, recommended that the salary of the head door-keeper should be £500; but the last committee recommends that in any future appointment to those offices, after Mr. Pratt and Mr. Williams shall retire, the salaries of the door-keepers, be £400 each. The report concludes thus:—"Your committee having consulted Sir William Gossett, the Serjeant-at-arms, respecting his department, agree in opinion with the committee of 1835, that the future establishment should consist of two door-keepers, as already recommended; of one head messenger to be designated "Assistant to the Serjeant-at-arms," with an annual income of £425; of four messengers at £300 each; of two messengers at £200 each; of four extra messengers at £105 each, increasing to £120 after ten years' service, with discretionary power in the Serjeant-at-arms, to employ, on any emergency, according to the recommendation of that committee, an extra door-keeper and such temporary messengers, at weekly wages, as may be wanted during the temporary pressure of business."

Such is the amount of remuneration which the House of Commons thinks just and reasonable for the purpose of securing the services, in places of trust, of respectable men. This scale of remuneration is not, in this instance, thought extravagant. Now what is expected from the Irish clergy? The noble secretary for Ireland last night said, that he hoped ever to see the clergy of that country, now, as well educated, able, enlightened, learned, amiable, and men of refined manners. If they enforce the law, when unhappily they are driven to do so, with what vigilance are they watched! The utmost courtesy is expected from them,—the qualifications of angels are required in them,—the long-suffering and forbearance of martyrs;—and is it, then, too much to ask the House to allot to men, in whom all these qualifications are expected, half the amount of stipend which is considered necessary for the salaries of the door-keepers of the House of Commons? I have already trespassed so long upon the attention of the House, that I should feel inclined to pass by the speech of the hon. and learned member for Tipperary, did not that speech,—eloquent as it unquestionably was—prove that the question now under discussion is not—whether £50,000 shall be allotted out of the revenues of the Church for purposes of education? On the contrary, the question, according to the views of the hon. and learned gentleman, is neither more nor less than this,—Shall the established religion of Ireland be protestant or Roman Catholic? If it be not so, why did the hon. and learned gentleman refer to the example of Scotland? Why did he say that Scotland, having banished episcopacy, has assumed the aspect of a flourishing country? Why did he say, that agriculture is creeping up her mountains,—that commerce has filled her coffers since she has relieved herself of episcopacy,—if he did not anticipate that the same results would follow a similar course on the part of Ireland? The hon. and learned gentleman has called upon the House to settle the question of tithes by passing the bill introduced by his Majesty's government. What guarantee, however, has he afforded that this bill will be a settlement? The arguments by which the hon. and learned member has supported the measure, are fatal to the proposition itself. It would be acting with perfect consistency if, after the passing of this bill, the hon. member for St. Alban's should move to reduce the number of bishops to four, and the hon. and learned member for Tipperary were to say, that the Roman Catholic religion was entitled to be established in Ireland. On these grounds I distrust the assurances of the hon. and learned gentleman, that this measure will prove a settlement of the question. I always listen to the hon. and learned gentleman with the greatest attention, and I much admire his powers of imagination; but I must say—and I do so with all respect—that I distrust his sagacity as a prophet. The hon. and learned gentleman says, “Settle this question now, and all will be peace in Ireland.” The hon. and learned gentleman, long ago, said—“Settle the Roman Catholic question, and all will be peace in Ireland.” The two measures, it is true, rest on perfectly different grounds—the one was a definite measure, for the restoration of civil equality, and the abolition of every disability affecting the Roman Catholic subjects of the realm—the other, that now before the House, contains nothing definite; and there are, according to the supporters of the plan, many other questions left, of which a satisfactory settlement will, in due time, be demanded. With respect to the definite and “final” measure of Catholic relief, this was the language of the hon. and learned gentleman himself, in 1825. The hon. and learned gentleman was asked:—“Do you think, in case the general question of Catholic Emancipation were settled by parliament, there would be a power existing in any individual to get public assemblies together, and to create a combined operation in Ireland?”

He answered,—“I am convinced that it would not be in the power of any man, no matter however great his influence might be, to draw large convocations of men together in Ireland; nothing but the sense of individual injury produces these great and systematic gatherings, through the medium of which so much passion, and so much inflammatory matter is conveyed through the country.”

Such was the prophecy made by the hon. and learned gentleman well acquainted with the character and feelings of his countrymen; that prophecy has not been fulfilled, and therefore I now distrust the hon. and learned gentleman in his character as a prophet. Let me, however, beg of the House to observe these remarkable words. On the same occasion, to which I have just referred, the hon. and learned gentleman proceeded to say:—“Whenever any mention is made in a Roman Catholic assembly of the evils of that measure, it is made for the purposes of rhetorical excitement, and not with any serious view, on the part of the speaker, to disturb that which, in my humble judgment, is perfectly indissoluble. In answer to the question, I beg to add this; that I am perfectly convinced that, neither upon tithes, nor the Union, nor any other political subject, could the people of Ireland be powerfully and permanently excited. At present, individuals feel themselves aggrieved by the law, and it is not so much from public sentiment, as from a sense of individual injustice, that they are marshalled and combined together.”

The hon. and learned gentleman may probably find it difficult to afford a solitary instance of the verification of this prophecy. I can, however, find an instance to the contrary, and that instance is the hon. and learned member for Tipperary himself. This is the more striking, as the hon. and learned gentleman declared to the committee, that at least he could answer for himself, that if he had a fair chance of rising in the profession for which he had endeavoured to qualify himself—if the exasperating impediments to advancement in that profession which grew out of his religious creed were removed, he should give himself no further concern about politics; but should devote himself exclusively to his professional avocations. I hope the hon. and learned gentleman, after this failure, and his prophecy of last night, will endeavour to lay some better claim to the character of a prophet, and will forbear from exerting, in agitation, the great talents he unquestionably possesses. I do not know that there is any other speech to which I need advert, except that of the hon. member for Waterford, who complains that out of a revenue of £760,000, an allotment for the purposes of education, £50,000 is refused. Can the hon. member guarantee that there exists a revenue of £760,000? If he can, cadit questio, and I shall be perfectly content. If any one can show that out of tithes, after the deductions contemplated by this bill, there will be a revenue, not of £760,000, but even of £400,000, I will admit Ireland to be in a much better condition than I have supposed. I have now stated the reasons for which I have supported the bill, which has been proposed on this side the House, and opposed that which has been brought forward by his Majesty's government. Why is it that the hon. and learned member for Tipperary, with his strong feelings against an Establishment, is able to consent to the bill of his Majesty's government? How is this mystery to be unravelled, when the hon. and learned member holds that an Establishment for the minority is fatal to the peace, tranquillity, and happiness of Ireland? With these sentiments, how is it that the hon. and learned gentleman can give his support to the bill? The supporters of the measure submitted from this side of the House, profess a readiness to cure abuses, to reduce superfluities, to abolish pluralities, and destroy sinecures; they do not want to make the Church Establishment a source of political influence, they contend for an equal distribution of its preferments. Do I believe that the hon. and learned member for Tipperary expects to gain anything by the allotment of £50,000 a-year, out of the revenues of the Church? No; I believe that the hon. and learned member gives his consent to this bill, because he, a Roman Catholic, is convinced that, coupled with this allotment, and a reduction of income, there is involved in the measure a principle which, once admitted, will be fatal to the independent character, and the very existence of the Protestant Church. Take away the glebes from the Church, enable the Crown to dispose of them, to re-allot them, and will not that alter the whole character of the Church Establishment? And will it not, instead of being an independent corporation, possessed of its own property, become, and be placed on the footing of, a mere stipendiary Church? Is this desirable? Is it politic? For what object is it that the dignity of rector is to be abolished, and that future incumbents are to be mere vicars, removable at the will of the Privy Council? Is this in accordance with Lord Althorp's views, who thought that even the Church Commissioners should be independent of the government? A portion of the security rests, not merely on its possession of its own lands, but upon its self-government. I repeat, that this bill would alter the Church from an independent corporation to a mere stipendiary Church, and would shake its very existence. I have very carefully looked through the whole of the bill, and, in my opinion, the least prejudicial part of it is, that which takes from its revenues the sum stated. The great evil of the bill is to be found in the provisions which divest the Church of its property, which change its character, and destroy its independence. The noble lord opposite has justly stated, that between the views of two conflicting parties on this question, the good sense of the people of England must be the arbiter. In that I fully concur. It must be left to the people of England to determine whether I, and those with whom I act, are or are not warranted in refusing to be parties to the bill of the noble lord. I do not hesitate to say that I view the condition of the Church of Ireland with the deepest regret and anxiety—that so far from rejoicing in the application of force, or the execution of process for the payment of dues, I declare, before God, my object would be to cause a cessation of all religious discords, to put an end to all religious distinctions, and to obliterate for ever all former animosities. Such, of all others, are the objects I would most cordially cherish; but, at the same time, believing the Church Establishment in Ireland to be perfectly consistent with the political rights of my Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen—believing it to imply no degradation to them—conceiving that Establishment to be essential to the best interests of religion, and conducive to the permanent happiness of the empire—I cannot consent, unless convinced by reasoning, to the introduction of a principle, which, I believe, will be fatal to both. I wish to see an amicable arrangement of the question effected; and it would be a most ungrateful return for the Church of Ireland to make to the people of England, who have shown such a generous sympathy in her behalf, if her members were to manifest a less anxious desire to expedite that settlement. If the people believe that I, and those with whom I am associated, have, in our opposition, any sinister object in view, or any wish to protect abuses for political purposes, they will decide against us, and ultimately overthrow us; but I trust the people of England will not expect from us, that if we are not satisfied by fair argument, that the measure of the government is essential to the interests of religion, but, on the contrary, if we believe it is necessary for the interests of religion, that the Protestant minister should be enabled to support his family in decent competence—then, Sir, I am sure, the people of England will not expect from us, that we should betray our duty to the Church, by pretending to be convinced by arguments, the transparent fallacy of which we have exposed—or by calculations, the glaring inaccuracies of which we have demonstrated. On the contrary, remembering that penal laws, and civil disabilities have ceased—believing that the progress of knowledge will ensure adherents to the pure doctrines of our Church—relying upon the justice of our case—we shall firmly refuse to cut off from that Church its means of usefulness—to reduce its ministers to a state of stipendiary dependence on a department of the government; and we will not consent to strike a blow fatal to the interests of civil liberty, and of true religion, by destroying the independence of the Establishment, and of degrading the character of its ministers.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND)—LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

JUNE 10, 1836.

The Order of the Day for resuming the adjourned debate on the question of disagreeing to the Lords' Amendments to the Corporation Bill for Ireland, was read, and a long debate again ensued, towards the close of which, and rising after Mr. Sheil—

SIR ROBERT PEELE said, he felt under a double obligation of making an apology to the House for offering himself to its notice. He felt that the subject had been completely exhausted, and the hon. and learned gentleman must have risen under the same impression; for, although his speech abounded in much lively allusion, much personal comment, and much eloquent declamation, yet not one single approach to argument did the hon. and learned gentleman discover throughout the whole of it. He felt, as he before said, a double obligation to apologize to the House on the present occasion, not only on account of the exhausted state of the House and of the subject, but because the hon. and learned gentleman had read so long an extract of a speech of his, that he was somewhat doubtful whether the strict rules of the House did not incapacitate him from speaking. He, however, thanked the hon. and learned gentleman for this extract from his speech, because as to-morrow he should have the honour (it being the anniversary of the day) of again dining with the respected corporation before whom that speech was delivered, he should have an opportunity of repeating the sentiments he then expressed, and which he still entertained. He did think the government of this country could not be conducted without a good understanding between both Houses of Parliament. He should not call that a safe and efficient system of government in which there was a constant collision between the two Houses. He thought that the affairs of the government could not go on where there was this perpetual conflict. But he did not mean by this to imply that the House of Lords had no other course to take on these occasions than to relinquish its independent right to act, and merely register the decrees of the House of Commons. The hon. and learned gentleman had referred to the doctrine laid down by Mr. Canning with respect to collisions between the two Houses; but he (Sir R. Peel) did not understand by the speech of Mr. Canning, which the hon. gentleman had read, that Mr. Canning meant, whilst he maintained the privileges of this House, that the maintenance of the privileges of this House was inconsistent with the maintenance of the rights and independence of the other branch of the legislature. Mr. Canning was referring to the question of the Corn Laws, which had produced a difference of opinion between the two Houses. Mr. Canning was happily relieved from witnessing the political conflicts which now agitated the country; but on this same question he (Sir R. Peel) would refer to another authority—a living authority—an authority from whom it had been his fate to be separated altogether during the whole of his political career, but for whom he felt the utmost respect, and, in all their political disagreements, not one word of disrespect towards that eminent individual had ever fallen from him: he referred to the language used upon a similar occasion by Earl Grey. Lord Grey did not deny the independent right of the House of Commons; but Lord Grey, at the same time, felt it to be his duty to maintain the equal independence of that branch of the legislature of which he was a member. But he would first refer shortly to the speech of Mr. Canning. The two Houses differed in respect to the corn bill; would the hon. and learned gentleman advise the House of Commons, out of respect to the authority of Mr. Canning, to adopt the same course of proceedings as in the corn bill? Mr. Canning said, on that occasion, "My first proposition is, to let loose the corn now in bond, by the operation of the principle of the bill itself; and then to let in, under the same restrictions, the corn of Canada, which has been shipped on the faith of the bill. To neither of these parts of the bill was the smallest objection made in the House of Lords; and the amendment which lost the bill was, as far as I understand the matter, one which did not touch them in the least. In proposing them, Sir, for the consideration of the committee, I am, therefore, doing that which will not bring us within the risk of a conflict with the other House, since the principles on which I now wish to act are those which met with no objection, and were in fact adopted from us." He did not say that the House should pursue the same course now; he did not say that this House should abandon its right; but he said, that after the argument used by Mr. Canning, there would be no degradation in adopting the measure of the House of Lords; and on that occasion, Mr. Canning by adopting the course of conciliation ended the conflict, and led to an amicable and conciliatory settlement. What was the language of Lord Grey? Lord Grey said, "I stand here one of a body which will always be ready firmly and honestly to resist such effects, which always considers anxiously and feelingly the interests of the people, even when it must oppose the people themselves, and which will never consent, under the influence of fear, to give way to clamour. If I am told we run the risk of having a worse bill, I shall never suffer myself to be intimidated by any such threat; and if a worse bill should be sent up, I am sure your lordships would pursue the course you have pursued by the present bill. You would consider it, and you would amend it; and if you could not make it good, you would reject it. I am sure that any such measure should be met by me with a firm opposition, and that I should be prepared to do my duty to myself. I have said thus much, and I might say a great deal more. If there should come a contest between this House and a great portion of the people, my post is taken; and with that order to which I belong I will stand or fall. I will maintain, to the last hour of my existence, the privileges and independence of this House." On that occasion, these words, the hon. and learned gentleman would find were spoken by one whose authority he had ever held in great respect. He had omitted to notice the first part of the hon. and learned member's speech; and those who forgot the precept, could not fail to learn, by the effect of example, a warning from the hon. and learned gentleman, unless there was some cogent reason to abstain from personal explanation. The hon. and learned gentleman had found it absolutely necessary to explain a speech he had delivered at Thurles; and the hon. and learned gentleman had been provoked by a look, or something like it, from his right hon. friend, the member for Sligo, into an apparent position of hostility towards the members of the late government—he said apparent, because he who admired the hon. gentleman's talents, and did not expect or desire to entertain other feelings than those of respect for him, whatever might be the difference of their sentiments in regard to measures of government, felt no hostility towards him. But the hon. and learned gentleman had thought it necessary to explain a misapprehension as to a supposed statement of his, of a compact between the Irish members and his Majesty's government; and if the hon. and learned gentleman had simply said that it was a misapprehension, and that he denied the interpretation put upon the expression, it would have been quite sufficient for him, and the hon. and learned gentleman would never have heard of it from him. But the course pursued by the hon. and learned gentleman in his explanation, had a tendency rather to confirm the misapprehension. The hon. and learned gentleman said, "You suppose that I said there was a compact between us and the government; but this is an error, for there has been an important omission in the text of my speech; for where it seems as if I had used only the word 'compact,' the words I really used were, 'a compact and indissoluble junction.'" Now, there certainly might be a junction without a compact; but the hon. and learned gentleman had admitted that there had been an "alliance," and an alliance was not very different from a compact. But the hon. and learned gentlemen went further, and said that there was an alliance "on honourable terms;" and he defied the hon. and learned member, with all his acuteness and ingenuity, to point out any real distinction between a compact and an alliance on honourable terms. The word "compact" did not necessarily imply a "dishonourable compact;" it had not been said that the price paid to the hon. and learned gentleman and his friends was admission to office. But the hon. and learned gentleman had admitted that there had been an alliance, and on terms which might indeed be for the public good; but it could hardly be said that there was no compact, for it seemed to him that there was no distinction between a compact and an alliance on terms. He was sorry, that in following the explanation of the hon. and learned gentleman, he had been diverted from the subject of the bill; but he would enter into a "compact" with the House, that the moment he departed from the proper course of argument, the slightest notice from the House would induce him either to abstain or to sit down. In fact, the argument on the main question had been completely exhausted in the debate on the question before; and he should have been content to rest the case on the original debate, if it had not been for the speech of the noble lord last night, which had placed the question on new grounds. The noble lord had argued as if the question at issue was whether or not there should be local government in Ireland. The noble lord had quoted the case of Prussia—a case not calculated to excite feelings that would lead to conviction—and the noble lord had proceeded on the assumption that the question at issue was, whether the local governments of the towns of Ireland should be abolished or not. That was not the question at issue, and he would prove that it was not. The noble lord proposed to force twenty-one towns in Ireland to adopt the provisions of the 9th George IV., not that it should be left to their option to adopt them or not, but to compel them to adopt those provisions. Did the noble lord mean to deny the right of these towns to adopt a local government or not? Surely, it was more consonant to the principles of self-government to allow these places to determine whether or not they would adopt the provisions, than to force them to do so. But the noble lord said, "I will enforce them on all towns in Ireland." How did the opposition propose to leave the law? Why every town in Ireland would have a right, if he thought fit, to adopt the very act which the noble lord would enforce. In what cases was the act to be enforced? On the application of twenty-one inhabitants rated at £20 a-year. In any populous city, however averse to a local government, according to the noble lord's plan, the act was to be enforced on the application of twenty-one inhabitants, rated at £20 a year. This was to be applied to every town in Ireland not governed by local acts. The legislature had passed an act for England; but had it enforced the act? No, it left the application of the 9th Geo. IV. optional. The noble lord intended to enforce it; he had not introduced any judicious scale of taxation; but he had left the enforcement of the act to the application of twenty-one inhabitants rated at £21 a-year. The noble lord proposed that there should be municipal government in Ireland, whether desired or not. He thought that sufficient provision was made for local government, when it was left optional with the inhabitants to have it or reject it. Another fallacy in the speech of the noble lord was, that he assumed that municipal institutions were absolutely necessary for good government: that fallacy pervaded the whole of his speech. The example of Prussia could have no effect here. Was this an essential part of good government, or not? In his opinion it was not, and the principle of the noble lord's bill might turn out to be a violation of the rights of the people. Where corporations had existed before, there custom made them popular. If the noble lord thought that municipal institutions were essential conditions of good government, why were not corporations enforced throughout this country? Why was Manchester, Birmingham, and the districts in this great metropolis to which representatives had been granted, comprehending a population of 1,120,000, without corporations? The large districts on the other side of the water, which were rapidly advancing in manufacturing industry, Southwark, and Lambeth, and even the city in which they were now assembled, as well as the boroughs to which the boon of representatives had lately been given—Finsbury, and the Tower Hamlets, and Marylebone, were without corporations—and could the House see municipal institutions enforced in Ireland, and not in the large districts belonging to the metropolis, if these institutions were requisites to good government? If corporations were thought essential to good government, why were not the provisions of the bill to be applied in every instance? But the cases of Dublin and Liverpool were compared, and it was said, that looking to the rapid communication between them, it was disgraceful that one should have a corporation and not the other; that a merchant of Dublin would feel himself disgraced on a visit to Liverpool. But if corporations were so essential to good government, what must be the feelings of a merchant of Manchester going to Liverpool? Manchester was as near Liverpool by the railroads as Dublin by sea; and did the hon. and learned member think that a rich merchant of Manchester, proceeding to Liverpool, would meditate as he was conveyed in the rapid machine, that he was soon to come into a place where he would see by contrast his unhappy lot, and that he would return to Manchester insulted and degraded, and be compelled to hide his head under the mortifying impression that he was not an inhabitant of Liverpool? Did the hon. and learned member believe that a single individual would transfer his residence from Manchester to Liverpool for the express purpose of enjoying the luxury of a corporation? The real question came to this, Would the denial of corporate institutions interfere with the good local government of towns in Ireland, or with the prosperity of the country? He did not disregard the preference which arose from feelings and habits, rather than from the prospect of advantage; but were they proposed for the purpose of local government? The next question he should look at was, whether these institutions were to be formed, not for good local government, but for political purposes, and to be made subservient to illegitimate ends. Unless it could be shown that the reconstruction of corporate institutions in Ireland was compatible with the proper government of towns, with the due administration of justice, with the interests, not partial but equal, of Protestants and Catholics, he should overlook all the arguments derived from analogy of institutions. In the case of Dublin, the administration of justice was refused, no magistracy was given, and the noble lord refused to grant the control of the police to the most popular and most important city of Ireland. "You take from the municipal corporations (continued the right hon. baronet) the appointment of sheriffs, and vest it in the Lord-lieutenant; but then, of course, you give to it the direction and management of the watching, paving, and lighting of the city? Not at all. Well, but you invest it with the powers of widening and improving the streets of the city? By no means. But at least you give to it a control and superintendence over the port of Dublin, in which the municipal body of that city must be so much interested? Nothing of the kind. In constituting this municipal body, then, you withhold from them everything which in a municipal institution can be considered of importance. You do not allow them to interfere in the appointment of sheriffs, you give them no control over the police, you take from this all-important body, this body so essential in your opinion to good government, the appointment of even a single watchman; you invest in other authorities the charge of lighting, paving, and watching; you commit to the care of others the widening and improving of streets, the superintendence of the port. Now, allow me to ask, when you have taken all those powers away, for what purpose is it that you continue it as a municipal body? I ask you, when you have removed those powers and authorities which ordinarily belong to the municipal corporations, for what purpose do you leave it? I tell you, that if you leave it only for political purposes, it is you and not we who are the enemies of Ireland." Much had been said of the appointment of commissioners, who were to take charge of corporate property and those for charitable trusts heretofore administered by corporations. He would not enter further upon that point, which did not involve any principle of the bill, further than to remark, that if a corporation were to be abolished, it was almost impossible to avoid the appointment of commissioners for a limited time. He would have preferred that the time should have been limited, and that was the intention when the bill was before in that House, that the commissioners should continue for a time, or until parliament should determine otherwise; but it was, he repeated, unavoidable that some commissioners should be appointed to take charge of corporate property where corporations were abolished—for there were many towns which had no local act. He would not enter into the question of the appointment of weigh-masters and butter-tasters, for those were points on which there could be very little difference between him and the noble lord. When he heard the language used by the hon. member for the county of Meath, he hardly thought that the bill deserved the epithets which that hon. gentleman had applied to it; nor could he have thought that the corporate property in Ireland was so great as that hon. gentleman had set it down. When he heard the hon. member for Meath, he was strongly reminded of that familiar quotation from the

Emollit mores, nec sinit esse feros.*

Without stopping to inquire into the amount of corporate property in Ireland, he would come to a much more important point—namely, whether it was for the advantage of Ireland, that after the abolition of the old corporations, new ones should be established in their stead. It was said, that the objects were the dissolution of the old corporations, the mitigation of the present evils, and the reconstruction of new corporations in place of the old. He would admit that the existing corporations were very different from those of former years, and that they had ceased to produce those good effects which it was originally intended they should produce; but the noble lord (Lord John Russell) seemed to consider that those who voted for the abolition of the old corporations were also to vote for the reconstruction of new ones. “The noble lord, adverting to some observations of mine (continued the right hon. baronet), addressed to the company at the Goldsmiths’ Hall, said, that I was right in complimenting them on having built their new hall on the old foundation; but the noble lord added, what would have been thought of you had you told them, they were wrong in building on that foundation—and still more, what would have been thought of you, if you told them they were wrong in building a new hall? But the question in that case would be, Is the new hall as good for useful purposes as the old? If the old corporations of Ireland, like the old Goldsmiths’ hall, had served to promote social harmony and good fellowship—if they had tended to promote good and kind feeling between man and man, then, indeed, I should have been justified in advising the noble lord to build on an old foundation; but if I find that those corporations have not tended to promote social feeling—if I find that they have not tended to bring man to a good and harmonious understanding with his fellow-man if I find that they had ceased to promote the good objects for which they were instituted, then I should be exceedingly inconsistent if I praised the noble lord as I did the Goldsmiths, for rebuilding on the old foundation.” The old corporations were at one time of great use to the country, but of late they had become institutions for the purpose of keeping up exclusive interests and privileges: but then if, in looking at the state of society in Ireland, in considering the probable, nay, the almost certain effects of the reconstruction of the corporation, they should find that the new would be equally intolerant and equally exclusive as the old, would the legislature be justified in reconstructing them out of the scattered materials of the former? He had no doubt that if this question were viewed distinct from the prejudices with which it was connected, as one affecting national feelings and national honour, the opinion would be general that the removal of the old corporations, and the refusal to construct new ones on their foundation, would be pregnant with immense benefits to Ireland. He was sure that by refusing to reconstruct the corporations we should have much better guarantees for the promotion of domestic peace and harmony in Ireland, for the investment of capital, and the promotion of industry than we now possessed. When the proposition was first made in that House, he was sure that it received the not open, but quiet and tacit, sanction of many cool, calm, and considerate persons in and out of that House. He held in his hand a letter addressed to Lord Mulgrave, signed by one who called himself “A dissatisfied country gentleman.” He had no knowledge of the writer, but whoever he was, he was no friend (politically speaking) of his. That writer took extreme views of political measures, but in his letter he said that there were four measures required for the improvement and the pacification of Ireland, and that we were now in progress to them. The measures which he recommended were—1st., the complete and unqualified extinction of tithes; the 2nd., was the reduction and remodification of the Church Establishment; the 3rd., was the annihilation of the Orange Lodges. Now, what did the House think was the 4th recommended by this writer, who was certainly a man of acuteness and ability. The 4th was the total dissolution of all municipal corporations. It might be said, perhaps, that the abolition of the corporations did not necessarily imply that they should not be reconstructed; but what was the argument of this writer—an argument penned in a cooler moment than could be expected in the excitement of such a debate as the present? He said, look at the two great corporate towns of Dublin and Cork. The former, in every point which could constitute a great town, had retrograded nearly a century, while other parts of the country, which had no corporate bodies, had advanced and improved to a great extent. What was Cork?—a city possessing local advantages belonging to few cities in the kingdom, with a splendid harbour, in the midst of a fertile country, enjoying a fine climate, the metropolis of the largest county in the empire, and yet a very large proportion of its inhabitants were sunk in the lowest state of poverty; their morality was in a low state, and in the excitement of election times they were most violent and riotous. He would not say, to use the noble lord's quotation, "Sic fortis Etruria crevit." The writer next noticed Belfast, a town worthy of England in arts and industry, nominally the third, but in reality the first in commercial importance in Ireland; yet fifty years ago Belfast was an insignificant town. What was the cause assigned by the writer for the increase of the one town and the decrease of the others? He said, that perhaps Mr. Mortimer O'Sullivan and others who took his view, might attribute it to the fact that Belfast was a Protestant town, but the writer attributed it to the fact that Dublin and Cork had the most numerous, and, until lately, the most wealthy corporations in Ireland, while in Belfast they had what scarcely deserved the name of a corporation, and which did not exceed twenty members. These, then, were the reasons assigned by a clear and intelligent writer for wishing to put an end to all corporations for the benefit of the country generally. He would now quote another authority on the same subject—that of a noble lord with whom he had had the honour of an acquaintance. That noble lord had not only written a letter, but also drawn up a bill on the subject. One great object with the noble lord contemplated as necessary for Ireland was the abolition of fiscal powers by grand juries and corporations. He proposed a general tax, which should be administered by commissioners appointed by the Crown, aided by local commissioners elected by rate-payers, and he pointed out the mode of election. One clause of the bill drawn by the noble lord, provided that the Crown commissioners, aided by some of the local commissioners, should have the power to inspect corporate charters, in order to ascertain if any property possessed by them had been intended to promote public works, and if any such were discovered, the amount should be handed over to the chief commissioner, to be applied as originally intended. This was the opinion of an individual well acquainted with the wants of Ireland, and who had made the remedy of many of the evils affecting it a subject of mature consideration. He was of opinion, that chief commissioners, whose office should be in Dublin, aided by local commissioners elected by the people, should take on themselves all the fiscal powers at present intrusted to corporations and grand juries, and he thought those who proposed the establishment of institutions with similar objects could not be fairly accused of intending to insult Ireland or to place it below the level of England and Scotland as to municipal rights. He would put it to hon. members opposite, whether the reconstruction of those corporations would conduce to that civil equality of all parties which some hon. members asserted—for unless it was shown that it would have that effect, there was no ground whatever for the proposition. In considering this question he could not overlook the analogy between the circumstances of England and Ireland; for, if any such existed, it ought to be clearly made out. Now, to him it did not appear that that had at all been made out. So far from analogy, there was a vast difference between the circumstances of the two countries. It was true that within the last few years a great moral and social revolution had taken place in Ireland. Within six years we had removed those great barriers which had separated two classes. That removal had been acquiesced in by the Protestants. Those Protestants had not even petitioned against the plan for giving up the privileges which they had so long enjoyed, and was the House to overlook those who had thus acted? The House should not forget what the late corporations were. Did any member believe that the new corporations, backed as they would be by the physical strength of the country, would be more careful of the rights and privileges of others than their predecessors had been? Did any one believe that they would be willing to share their newly-acquired power with those to whom they were opposed? Then, if such powers were to be granted to parties so supported, did any man believe that their exercise, as they would be exercised, would be otherwise than injurious to the country? Hon. members were greatly offended and indignant at the proposition that the property of corporations should be placed in the hands of commissioners. But how did they themselves propose to deal with a corporate body of another description—with the Church? The church had a prescriptive right to property long anterior to the existence of most of those corporations. The security of that property had been guaranteed in the fullest manner by one of the articles of Union between the two kingdoms. By that article the Churches of England and Ireland were to be called the United Church of England and Ireland. Now let hon. members look at the 70th clause of the tithe bill, and see how far that guarantee of the church property had been respected by those who were now so loud in their exclamations against the investment of any corporate property in the hands of commissioners. By that clause it was enacted, that when a living became void, the glebe, glebe-house, and offices, were to become invested in the hands of commissioners appointed by the Crown. And this is (said the right hon. baronet) from you, who deprecate interference with corporate property—you, who profess anxiety to keep sacred from the slightest violation—you, who cannot reconcile it to your views of justice to transfer property from a corporation to the management of a commission appointed by the Crown, felt no compunctions visitings when you enacted, that on the voidance of every living, the glebe-house, offices, and glebe, should be transferred from the Church and vested in the Crown. What is it that you have done? You say to us, that those suspicions and surmises on our part are unreasonable, that we ought not to object to the exercise of power, that we have no reason for objecting to it but antipathy to the Roman Catholic Church—that, in point of fact, religious bigotry is at the bottom of our opposition, that we hate you as Roman Catholics, that we are unwilling to cement the union—a union of heart and affection—with you, and refuse to you corporate institutions, for the purpose of obstructing your prosperity and insulting your feelings. But what have been your own words? Have they not been the justification of the distrust you have experienced? Have you not told us that those institutions have been in England, and will be in Ireland, the schools of political agitation? May we not object to convert institutions that were intended for the purposes of local government into the arena of civil discord? You tell us that your object is, unless justice be done—a repeal of the Union—you tell us that you will never be satisfied without making the House of Lords responsible. You tell us that the arrangement made with respect to tithe is wholly unsatisfactory. You use arguments implying a present acquiescence in it, by a determination to take the first legitimate opportunity of defeating it. Why can you be surprised, then, if we are unwilling to consent to the institution of those societies, after the warning you have given us, that they will not be applied for the purposes of local government, but will be consecrated to those of political agitation—to objects which appear to us destructive of the constitution under which we have lived, and think we have flourished, and fatal to the integrity of that empire, the bonds of which we wish to see indissolubly compact? We think that, in the present circumstances of Ireland, practical civil equality is the right of the citizens of that country; we say that that practical civil equality does not depend upon the formal and nominal adoption of similar institutions existing in England and Scotland, and that, if the adoption of these similar institutions will destroy that equality, we have a perfect right to object to them, on grounds stronger than the argument from analogy of institutions. We believe that Ireland wants repose; we think that these institutions will increase her agitation. We do not deny that there may be agitation independent of these institutions. You prophesied to us that there should be agitation; and, I am sorry to say, that the truth of that prophecy we have too good reason to acknowledge. But we are averse to making ourselves participators in it; we are unwilling to lend the sanction and encouragement of the law to the objects which you propose to yourselves. We believe that the institutions of these corporate bodies, if perverted to purposes like this, will, in point of fact, reconstitute in another shape that political ascendancy which we, on our part, are perfectly willing to abandon. Our wish is, with respect to the government of Ireland, to see perfect freedom from civil disability, perfect equality of civil privileges; but we do not deny that our object is to maintain in that country that established religion which we know to have been guaranteed at the time of the union, and which we believe to be essential to the best interests of Ireland and the Irish nation. We do not, at least I, speaking for myself, do not dissent from this measure from any national prejudice; I do not dissent from it from any hostility which I entertain towards Ireland; but I do dissent from it—and I do intend to exercise the privilege of free judgment regarding it—I dissent from it on the ground that, instead of promoting civil equality, it will constitute political ascendancy, instead of giving repose it will insure agitation. Instead of really destroying the monopoly of power and exclusive privileges, it will, under present circumstances, and in the present condition of Ireland, merely operate as a transfer of that monopoly and those privileges from a body which is perfectly willing to resign them, but which protests against their being transferred to others.

The House divided on the question, that it do disagree with the Lords' amendments, when the numbers were: Ayes, 324; Noes, 238; majority, 86.

COMMUTATION OF TITHES (ENGLAND).

JUNE 24, 1836.

Lord John Russell moved the Order of the Day for the further consideration of the Report on the Commutation of Tithes Bill.

On clause 38, which provides for the case of charge of culture of hop grounds and market gardens, being proposed—

Mr. Hume moved, that all that part of the clause after the word "land," line 40, should be left out.

SIR ROBERT PEEL observed, that if, when they came to discuss the proposition of the hon. member, he had not more cogent arguments to adduce than those which he had now employed, a more futile motion could never have been made; and, as he had put forward these arguments in advance, he presumed that they were the most efficient which he had at his command. But he would inquire, if this exception applied to hop-grounds, why should it not apply to market-gardens? And where was the injustice if hop-grounds and market-gardens were put on the same footing? The hon. member seemed to assume that all market gardeners were small freeholders, each cultivating their acre of land, and that their interests were to be neglected because they were humble people. But he apprehended that, although the market-gardeners cultivated a small portion of land, the owner of that land might be a very rich man, possessing a great quantity of this kind of ground, let out to tenants-at-will, and whatever advantage would be derived if the hon. member's proposition were agreed to, it would not benefit the tenant-at-will, but the great proprietor; for they might depend upon it, that when the land was out of lease he would have the advantage. The object of the bill was to get rid of an uncertain charge on the application of capital to land, and that if a large amount of capital were expended in the improvement of land, it should not be subjected to the payment of the value of one-tenth of the produce, but of a definite sum. The bill divided the charges made upon the land in lieu of tithes, into two classes, an ordinary and extraordinary charge, but the extraordinary was equally definite with the ordinary charge. It would not be an uncertain sum, varying with the amount of produce, but ascertained and fixed. One would indeed exceed the other, but each would be equally definite.

The amendment was negatived, and the clause agreed to. On clause 53 being read—

Sir R. Peel remarked, that the alleged grievance in Ireland was, that parties were called on to maintain a church from which they derived no benefit. Now, let the House consider what might be the operation of the present clause fifty or a hundred years hence. He saw nothing in the clause to prevent tithe due on land in one parish from being apportioned on tithe situate within a different parish. Now, if a dissenter should become possessed of the land thus subject to tithe, he would certainly have a greater grievance to complain of than that which it was alleged the Catholics of Ireland laboured under; for he would have to pay not only for the support of a church from which he derived no benefit, but he would also be compelled to contribute to the support of the incumbent of a different parish from that in which his property was situate.

This clause was agreed to. The bill to be read a third time.

On the Order of the Day for the third reading of this bill having been read—

SIR ROBERT PEEL was anxious to say a few words on the general question as to whether this bill should be read a third time or not. In the anterior part of the session he had introduced a bill, the provisions of which were identical with the bill he had introduced last year, when he had the honour of being a minister of the Crown. The object of that bill was to facilitate the voluntary commutation of tithes. He stated that the principle of a compulsory commutation might be made the subject of a future bill, when the experience of voluntary commutation would have suggested the most equitable principles on which compulsory commutation might be applied. He still preferred the bill he had himself introduced, to the bill of the noble lord. He felt great difficulty in determining, without the experience of voluntary commutation, and without the advantage of minute local inquiry—he felt great difficulty in determining the principle upon which compulsory commutation should be forced upon the country, consistent with justice, and to the satisfaction of all parties. The question, however, which he had to ask himself was, whether, now that there was a prospect of their coming to an arrangement on this great and complicated question, he would incur the responsibility of attempting to defeat this bill? The bill proceeded upon the principles of his (Sir R. Peel's) bill, as far as voluntary commutation was concerned. It proposed to effect it for a limited period, through the intervention of commissioners. His own bill proposed that two of these commissioners should be appointed by the Crown, and the other by the highest representative of the interests of the Church, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and on this point the noble lord had adopted his suggestion. This bill gave till October, 1837, for the purpose of voluntary commutation. This bill did away with £75 and £65 as a maximum and a minimum, and proposed instead the amount of tithe taken in kind for the seven years preceeding 1835, and that the sum paid should rule the future payments. That arrangement was still open to this objection—that where there had been great forbearance on the part of the tithe-owner, he would permanently suffer, and where there had been greater rigour, and extreme rights had been exacted, there he would gain, and the permanent rent-charge would be governed on that principle. There was, to be sure, a power of relaxation to the amount of twenty per cent., and to that extent the parties would have an opportunity of mitigating the severity of the bill. He found that the bill had arrived at this stage without any division being taken against it. He hoped, sitting there in an assembly of landlords, that he need not conceal that his object was to protect the interests of the Church. He considered the Church the weaker party; he considered that the great majority of the House were interested in this question, and therefore he felt specially bound to take care that the interests of the Church were attended to. He did not find that there was on the part of the Church any decided objection to the principles of this bill. None of those hon. gentlemen who more particularly watched over the interests of the Church, materially dissented from the principles of the bill. Amongst the tithe-owners and the tithe-payers, there was an impression, and he believed a similar impression prevailed amongst the public generally, that this question should be settled on a satisfactory principle. There was a general concurrence of all parties in the House in favour of the settlement of this question, and it appeared that they were now approaching to an agreement on amicable principles. Under these circumstances, considering the little difference there was between this bill and his, the question for him to consider was, whether he should press upon the House the adoption of his measure, to which he doubted that the assent of the House would be given, or whether he should give up his opposition to this bill. He thought he was consulting the interests of the Church in acceding to the third reading of this bill, as it appeared to him to be the general wish of the House to come to a settlement on this long-agitated question, and he felt that the longer they suffered this agitation to continue, the longer interval of time that was suffered to elapse before it was settled, the greater would be the difficulties of the ultimate settlement, and it might not be so perfectly settled to the advantage of the Church. Retaining, therefore, his preference for his own measure, thinking that a voluntary commutation would suggest the means of a more just application of the compulsory principle—still, not finding on the part of those more immediately interested any very strong expression of dissent, he was unwilling to interrupt the progress of the House towards the present experiment.

Bill read a third time.

REGISTRATION OF BIRTHS.

On the motion of Lord John Russell, this bill was read a third time. On the question that the bill do pass—Mr. Goulburn moved as an amendment, “That in clause 19, page 7, after the word ‘child’ the words ‘except the name of the child’ be inserted.”

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, it was gratifying to observe, that this discussion had been carried on in a tone and temper worthy of the House, and suitable to the gravity and importance of the subject under consideration. It had been admitted on the opposite side, that it would be a great evil, by any legislative enactment, to relax the sense of the importance which at present attached to the performance of the baptismal rite. The question then was, whether such was likely to be the result of this bill. He did not think that the object of those who framed the bill was to bring the baptismal rite into disrepute or abeyance. His complaint was, that they undervalued and overlooked the probable practical working of the measure. By law and usage the name of the child had been associated with the baptismal ceremony. This was and had been the universal practice of the Church of England. It had also, he believed, been the practice of the Roman Catholic Church; and if he were not mistaken, the majority of the Dissenters looked upon baptism as essential in naming their children. What was proposed by the bill? By a legislative enactment, to sanction the naming of a child without the baptismal ceremony. Could that be looked upon by the unthinking and uneducated in any other light than as a disregard of that ceremony? An act of parliament separated the naming of the child from the baptismal rite, and made the registration as valid as the ceremony. This might not be productive of any evil consequences amongst the upper and more respectable classes, who would most probably resort both to the registration and the baptism; but what would be its effect upon the great mass of the population? Would it not be an inducement to them to rest content with having the name entered upon the civil record? Many plausible arguments had been used in support of the measure, and amongst others this, that where there was a true sense of religious feeling, the ceremony would be resorted to. Now it was of the utmost importance, that where this religious sense did not exist, the House should, as much as possible, indicate its necessity. It was impossible to say how the feeling in favour of the religious observance could be best created; but surely the omission of the ceremony, as proposed by this bill, was not the way to promote it. It had been urged, that if registration were not enforced in the manner pointed out by the bill, the trouble of effecting the registration would render it difficult to obtain a perfect record; but would not the same argument hold good the other way? If the avoidance of trouble would prevent registration, would it not also prevent baptism? By this bill was encouraged the omission of the rite. Not by a direct obligation, but by sanctioning the omission of that which the great mass of the people at present considered of great importance. By passing a law in contradiction to that feeling, they were led to suppose that the legislature disparaged the ceremony. Why violate, in that manner, the consciences of a great mass of the people? Suppose there were a large body of Dissenters placed by this bill in the position which those of the Church of England hold now. Suppose they said, “We do not want any change. We wish to retain the ceremonial. Legislate as you please for yourselves, but leave us as you find us.” Should not they say, in answer to this just demand, “Seeing the importance which you attach to this ceremony, we will not do any act which would have a tendency to desecrate it in your opinions, or to violate that which you hold sacred.” He objected, then, to this part of the bill, because it violated the conscientious opinions of the members of the Established Church, and he never could consent to the omission of a rite which that Church considered so solemn and necessary. He would merely state further, that he gave his cordial support to the amendment of his right hon. friend.

MARRIAGES.

JUNE 28, 1836.

This bill, on the motion of Lord John Russell, was read a third time, when Mr. Goulburn moved the addition of a clause, whereby it was required, that in all cases where marriages were solemnized not in a church or chapel according to the rites of the Church of England, the parties should make the following declaration:—"I do solemnly declare that I have conscientious scruples against the solemnization of marriage according to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England."

SIR ROBERT PEEL thought it quite unnecessary, however natural it might be, for the noble lord to disclaim having had any communication with him on the subject of this clause; still, however, he was desirous of adding his positive declaration to the assurance of the noble lord, that all which had passed between them had transpired publicly in that House. Having made his proposition, to which at the time no human being made any opposition, the noble lord, from a perfect conviction of its justice, had voluntarily, and without any communication with him, adopted and introduced it as a clause in the bill. He repeated, the noble lord had given no intimation whatever of his intention to introduce that clause, and therefore it had been forced on him by no hostile display on the part of those on that (the Opposition) side of the House. He merely stated, that it would be a great satisfaction to the religious community to come to an arrangement upon this subject, without making any distinction between the members of the Establishment and the great body of the Dissenters; and the arrangement which he wished to see effected with respect to marriage was this—There being no objection whatever on the part of the members of the Church of England to be married according to its ceremonies, he was anxious to leave the members of the Establishment bonâ fide exactly as they now stood, he would not interfere with them at all; no human being, a member of the Church of England, having expressed any objection to its rites; he did think it unjust, in giving relief to the Dissenters, unnecessarily to interfere with what gave universal satisfaction to a church. At the same time, he had no hesitation in saying, although the avowal might possibly subject him to the disapprobation of some, that the arrangement he also wished simultaneously to be made, was one which would give entire relief and satisfaction to the feelings of the Dissenters. He wished to see Dissenters placed on the same footing as the members of the Church of England; he wished to see their religious ceremonies held, in point of law and practice, as of equal obligation with those of the members of the church. He believed this bill would effect that object. Indeed, it appeared to him, that this bill possessed an advantage over that which he had introduced, because, requiring as it did, that in almost all cases the ceremony should be performed in places of worship, it certainly appeared to give an additional sanction to the contract of marriage. The words proposed by his right hon. friend were intended with the view, not of wounding the feelings of the Dissenter, and requiring from him any religious test which could be considered as a mark of the slightest inferiority, but to guard against the possibility, in giving relief to the Dissenter, of interfering with the practice of the Church of England, which gave entire satisfaction to its members. As the bill now stood, the Attorney-general had stated, that it was not the intention to interfere with the rights of the Church of England, and the object of his right hon. friend's proviso was merely to guard against the embarrassment which might possibly arise in certain cases, the members of the church remaining precisely as they now stood, bound to conform to rites with respect to which they had expressed no dissatisfaction; that the religious ceremony of the Dissenter should be equally respected, and all should join in discouraging, or at least in not encouraging exemption from the religious ceremony. He saw no connection whatever between the amendment of his right hon. friend and the proviso contained in the 18th clause, with respect to which the noble lord had announced his intention to strike it out of the bill altogether, rather than agree, in consistency with the proviso the noble lord had introduced into the bill, to the amendment of his right hon. friend. Now, he did not think there was any occasion for anticipating the dilemma contemplated by the noble lord. If his right hon. friend's proposition were negatived, the noble lord would have an opportunity of fighting manfully in defence of his own proposition, and he hoped the noble lord would not on that occasion be shamefully deserted by those who sat behind him. But he hoped the disagreeable alternative would not be presented to them, and he ventured to prophesy, that the noble lord would be enabled successfully to resist his right hon. friend's suggestion, and then to rally round him a powerful body in defence of his own proposition. That was his prophecy; but the noble lord, before committing himself, might at least have waited until the painful dilemma had occurred. In fact, there was no necessary connection between the two propositions, and there were many persons who might dissent from his right hon. friend, and still cordially approve of the proposition of the noble lord. What, he asked, was the proposition of the noble lord? It stood thus:—We invite you to perform the religious ceremony—we tell you, members of the Church of England, that it is open to you to be married according to the rights of the church; and with respect to you, Dissenters, we will register your places of worship, and respect your religious ceremony. But there may be a limited class, whose conscientious scruples are so excessively fastidious, that no church, no chapel, no dissenting meeting-houses, no registered place of public worship will please them; and we say to you, you also shall have an opportunity of being married; our wish is to encourage the religious ceremony, but not to enforce it; and therefore all we ask of you is, to say, that you dissent from the Church of England. Any thing more reasonable, by way of respect for other men's religious opinions, he could not very well conceive. Could any man deny, taking an enlarged view of society in general—could any man deny, that it was for the benefit of the public at large that the marriage contract should be enforced by the religious ceremony, and that the policy of the legislature should be to encourage it? He, for one, was prepared to give his assent to the proposition of his right hon. friend; but, at the same time, he did not think that those who objected to it were involved in the slightest contradiction if they still declared their wish to afford some encouragement on the part of the legislature to the religious contract. This was a matter in which the Church of England had no separate interest. If, therefore, the clause proposed by his right hon. friend should be rejected, he still hoped, without any reference to party considerations, there would be a prevailing feeling in favour of the very mitigated and qualified enactment of the religious contract afforded by the noble lord's proviso, superadded to the civil one, so that the noble lord would be enabled to maintain the clause he had adopted without compulsion on his own deliberate opinion, because the suggestion of his political opponent was founded in truth and justice.

On the question that the bill do pass—some remarks passed between Sir Andrew Agnew and Mr. Baines, as to the consistency of the latter gentleman's vote on this occasion, as compared with his speech when the right hon. baronet (Sir R. Peel) introduced his bill to the House.

Sir Robert Peel: It was just the kind of bill that was at total variance with the course pursued by the hon. gentleman last year. The objection of the hon. gentleman to the bill which he then introduced was, that it did not impose on Dissenters the necessity of a religious ceremony. ["No, no," from Mr. Baines.] He would read to the House the hon. gentleman's speech made upon that occasion.—"Mr. Baines wished to unite his tribute of acknowledgment to the right hon. baronet at the head of his Majesty's government, for the friendly spirit towards the Protestant Dissenters in which this measure was conceived, and for the clear and satisfactory manner in which he had conveyed his sentiments to the House. He did not think that there would be felt amongst the Protestant Dissenters any objection to the bill, as far as related to constituting marriage a civil contract, or to the registration of their marriages through the medium of the magistrates; but there might be objections to some of the details; though those he hoped might, without much difficulty, be removed. He was afraid that there might be a jealousy created throughout the community, by requiring that the marriages of some should be celebrated by a religious ratification, whereas with others, that it should be only a civil contract. To give the greater solemnity to marriage in all cases, he thought that some religious service ought to be ingrafted upon the civil contract, and that the service should be performed by the minister of the religious body to whom the parties were attached." Did he propose that? He did not go that length. All he asked was, if the party should object to the religious rite, they should precede their entering on the contract by stating that they did so object. That was all. The hon. gentleman thought they ought to have had by law a religious contract superadded to the ceremony. His words were—"To give the greater solemnity to marriage in all cases, he thought that some religious service ought to be ingrafted upon the civil contract, and that the service should be performed by the minister of the religious body to whom parties were attached." By his bill, he left the parties at full liberty to take that course. It was left altogether voluntary. He must say, as the bill now stood, it did a positive injustice to the members of the Church of England. He was desirous throughout to give full satisfaction, and afford not only a full remedy for every grievance; but believing that no remedy would be effectual unless it consulted the fastidious feelings of Dissenters, he was desirous of seeing them fully respected. But the bill had now assumed quite a different aspect, and while it provided for the relief of the Dissenter, passed a gratuitous and most intolerable insult on the feelings and principles of the members of the Church of England. The noble lord had, out of his own good feeling, introduced this clause, under the impression that it would be more comfortable to the feelings of the religious part of the community, both of the Church of England and the Dissenters; he had now, at the instigation of those behind him, abandoned it. He was satisfied that the course which the noble lord had pursued was without precedent on the part of one who attempted to be the leader of that House.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND).

JUNE 30, 1836.

Lord John Russell moved that the minutes of a conference, held with the other House, relative to the amendments of the Lords to the Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Bill, be read, which, having been done, the noble lord moved, "That these amendments be taken into consideration that day three months."

Mr. Hume expressed his belief that measures should be taken to force the Lords to concur with that House in its views of the necessity of giving reform to Ireland.

SIR ROBERT PEEL—I did not rise immediately after the noble lord opposite concluded his speech, because I perceived, from the manner of the hon. member for Middlesex, that he was desirous of addressing the House, and I wish to ascertain to what extent the noble lord had been a fair representative and expounder of his opinion. I must say, I did not expect on this day, that we should have been called on to take into consideration the amendments of the House of Lords; still less did I expect that we should be called on without notice, and on the instant, to vote for the rejection of those amendments. I should have thought it would have been more consistent with usage, and the importance of the subject, that a motion should have been made for printing the amendments; and that, on a subsequent day, a sufficient interval being permitted to weigh the nature of them, we should be called on to pronounce our opinion. Nevertheless, although I feel it necessary to express my dissent from the proposition of the noble lord—although I disapprove of postponing for three months the consideration of this question—yet, as it has been understood that no division would take place, I will not call upon the House to divide, lest an erroneous conclusion should be drawn from the numbers which would appear on either side. My conviction, however, of the propriety of delay in this matter, is confirmed from what has fallen from the noble lord. In the first place, the noble lord himself attaches great importance to some of the declarations contained in the reasons of the House of Lords, and he has said, there were some expressions of the House of Lords which made him hope for an amicable settlement of this question at a future period. If that be the noble lord's view, it would be only decorous to afford us every opportunity for considering the reasons of the House of Lords, and we ought not at once, hastily, and perhaps after not a very intelligible reading of those reasons, to be called upon for an immediate, a final determination. Another reason for delay—one that, in my opinion, makes it most desirous, is, that I think the noble lord has placed a most erroneous interpretation upon a passage in the reasons of the House of Lords to which the noble lord had referred. The noble lord stated, that one of their lordships' objections was, that it was proposed by the bill, that corporations should be confined to twelve towns in Ireland; and he excited considerable laughter among his supporters by observing, that the House of Lords were anxious to establish more corporations than the House of Commons had considered necessary. I think the noble lord's interpretation of the passage referred to is erroneous; and if it be erroneous, that is an additional reason for taking the precaution of printing the reasons, before refusing to take them into consideration. It appears, by the paper read by the clerk, that "the Lords are unable to acquiesce in the proposition now made by the House of Commons—that the corporations of Ireland, as reconstructed by the bill, should be confined to twelve cities and towns." That is, that the Lords resist the proposition of the Commons, which was, that corporations should be confined to twelve places. But was the noble lord justified in stating that the real and bonâ fide objection of the Lords is—that corporations are to be confined to twelve towns only, and, therefore, they wished to have them extended? The noble lord's description of their lordships' reasons is most imperfect; and if he had condescended to give them a second perusal, he would have found that their lordships do not object to the bill because corporations are confined to twelve places only, but "because it is in those cities and towns of larger population that the most extensive evils would, in their opinion, result from such reconstruction." That is the real reasons assigned, in distinct terms, by their lordships; their reason is not, that corporations is confined to only twelve cities and towns. The House of Lords, in the course they have taken, have acted in conformity with the opinion of no inconsiderable minority of this House—a minority not unimportant with respect of numbers, station, and respectability; and I am bound to add (not, of course, with reference to myself), powerful also in respect of ability. On the first day of the session this question was discussed—whether we should bind ourselves by a preliminary resolution, to extend to Ireland the principles on which we had given Corporate Reform to England and Scotland? On that occasion the House of Lords made, without a division, an amendment to the address, by which they declined to give that pledge. In this House I moved an amendment similar to that adopted in the other House, which was negatived by a majority of forty-one only. I believe that the course I then proposed—speaking with all respect of the decisions of this House—I believe that the course I then proposed—a course in which I consented to one great principle of the bill—namely, the dissolution of existing corporations, the extinction of the monopoly of power, heretofore confined to one party, making a sacrifice of the present power held by one party in the state—I think that the course I then pursued in proposing to make that sacrifice, to dissolve those corporations—but at the same time declining to establish other corporations, under the apprehension that the evils would not be removed, but only transferred, was the correct one. I concur, therefore, in the course which the House of Lords have taken. It is in conformity with the course which I have taken, and I should be ashamed of myself if, in the face of a majority, I shrunk from this avowal. I concur, too, in the substance of the concessions made by the House of Lords. There have been concessions, it should be remarked, by the House of Lords, upon matters, I admit, of a subordinate nature. I do not pretend to attach any undue importance to them as bearing upon the main point in this bill, respecting which great difference exists; but, let it be recollected, great importance was attached to them during the debates upon this subject. Upon these points the Lords have receded from their opinions. Let us see whether this concession does not show the spirit that actuates them; let us see whether it does not show, upon their part, a dignified resolution to reject all menaces, to despise all imputations of sordid and sinister motives, and, after collecting what they believed to be the prevailing opinion of the House of Commons, to meet them in a corresponding spirit, and make an advance towards a conciliatory settlement. The noble lord contends that the House of Lords have rejected the vital and popular principle of the measure. I must say that a greater exaggeration of the extent of the difference between the two Houses I never heard. What is the extent of the difference between the two Houses? The House of Commons proposes that there shall be corporations in twelve cities and towns in Ireland, and that twenty-two other towns shall, whether they wish it or not, be compelled to adopt the provisions of the Act 9 Geo. IV. The Lords, on the other hand, leave to every town in Ireland, the option of calling the Act 9 Geo. IV. into operation. It was objected, in debate here, that supposing the inhabitants of a town were to place themselves under the provisions of that act, still the property of the preceding corporation would be vested in the commissioners to be appointed. This was one of the objections most strongly urged against the Lords' amendments in the first instance. The Lords, however, have now decided that in all cases in which the Act 9 Geo. IV. may be adopted, the corporate property shall be vested in commissioners chosen by the popular voice. The noble lord admitted that this was an important concession. That admission is totally inconsistent with the noble lord's declaration, that the House of Lords have divested the bill of its vital and popular principle. We may differ with respect to the maintenance of corporations in Ireland; but I cannot understand how a measure can be said to be deprived of its popular principle which allows five-pound householders in towns, in that country, to elect commissioners for the purpose of local government, which commissioners are to have exclusive control over the corporate property of the place. Great objections were made to the continuance of certain corporation officers, who were, I think, called butter-tasters and weigh-masters. We heard a great deal of them. Now, have the Lords shown any desire to prolong corrupt interests (as they have been termed)—by perpetuating these appointments? As far as I can collect from the Lords' amendments, they have obviated all objection on this head. In the administration of justice, too, objections were urged with respect to certain officers; and the Lords have completely abrogated the compulsory clauses which related to those officers. These, then, are all important points which the Lords have conceded. Though I dissent from the proposition of the noble lord for the amendments being summarily rejected, I am bound to say, that, in the present temper of the House, I do not see any advantage to be obtained from a postponement of the discussion. I am bound to say so; I do not think that any nearer approach could be made towards a settlement by protracted conferences. I doubt whether, if ever the elements of a reasonable and satisfactory settlement are to be collected, there could be any advantage in looking for them now, on account of the influence of strong feelings which exist upon all sides, and the excitement of passions produced in the discussion of these questions. The noble lord has referred to the part taken upon this subject by a noble and learned friend of mine. A great part—much too great a part of his speech—was occupied by a reference to what has taken place in the House of Lords. The noble lord complains of the animadversions of my noble and learned friend, upon a speech delivered here by the noble lord. The noble lord ought to recollect, that if any offence has been committed, he was the first offender. I put it to the noble lord, whether, if a peer of parliament, admitted by courtesy to listen to our debates, had gone into the House of Peers, and there declared that he had heard with his own ears certain expressions used here—and had made a charge against the person who had so used them—whether or not the member of the House of Commons, so charged in the House of Lords, would not be justified, instead of involving himself in a question of order, or appealing to privileges, in defending himself, or in administering reasonable chastisement for the offence. That is the course which would be pursued, I am sure, by the noble lord himself. The noble lord has expressed his surprise, that on the second night of the debate there was no reference to the speech delivered by my noble and learned friend. He seems to think that a former colleague of my noble friend ought, on the second night of the debate, to have offered some explanation on the subject. Surely, the noble lord is not under the impression that I shrunk from defending my noble and learned friend from imputations cast upon him? The noble lord refers, I suppose, to the explanations called for, from me, by the hon. and learned member for Tipperary. Upon that occasion I was asked this question—"Do you subscribe to these words? Do you adopt them?" My answer was—"I am here to explain my own sentiments and my own opinions." I have frequent opportunities of stating what are my own views and principles, and no one has a right to repeat to me words used by another person, and ask me, whether I subscribe to them. I did apply to my noble and learned friend to ascertain how far the interpretation put upon the words alleged to have been used by him was correct; and the answer I received was, that my noble and learned friend wished to reserve to himself the opportunity of making an explanation on the subject. My noble friend has explained the words referred to. He has put his own construction upon them. He has declared the intention with which they were used; and that having been done by my noble and learned friend, I am under no obligation—but the reverse—of entering into any explanation upon his part; and on my own, I refer to my own declarations with respect to Ireland, and the principles upon which I think she ought to be governed; and if at any future period you bring to me the words of another, my answer must be, "I speak my own sentiments; I explain only my own language." If, with respect to this bill, I have not explained what my sentiments are—if I have not made my opinions and principles manifest to you—I despair by any subsequent explanation of giving to you an exposition of my feelings. There is only one other point in the noble lord's speech to which I feel it necessary to refer. The noble lord has thought proper to declare, that under a certain alternative he should despair of the maintenance of the British constitution. It was with deep regret that I heard such a sentiment uttered by a minister of the Crown. At any rate, I disclaim any participation in the noble lord's despair. I do not entertain a doubt that the British constitution will be upheld. I do not believe that there is any desire entertained by the people of England to part with the advantages of a mixed government under which they have so longed lived! You say—you must not refuse to do justice to Ireland. No doubt you must not. But then you have no right to prescribe and enforce upon us, that which, in your opinion, constitutes justice. Hon. gentlemen may say, that noble lords shall not wantonly exercise this power; hon. gentlemen may declare that they shall not exercise the privileges which they have been vested with by the constitution for their individual benefit. No doubt they are not to do so. They are responsible for the power they exercise. They are not responsible to constituents as we are; but they are responsible to God [laughter]. I say, sir, solemnly—that the Lords are responsible to God, to their own consciences, and to their own intelligent fellow-countrymen. No doubt, they feel and act upon that responsibility. What does the noble lord say? "That, judging of the course which the House of Lords has hitherto pursued, he does not despair of an amicable arrangement of this question." Can you hold, that the House of Lords have pertinaciously adhered to their own opinions, without reference to the public good? I believe that the House of Lords will continue, as they have done, to give satisfaction in the exercise of a public duty—a duty that they owe to the people. I believe that, on account of the great functions with which they are intrusted, it is absolutely necessary that the power they possess should be maintained. I believe that they exercise those powers, not with a view to the mere exercise of power, still less on account of personal privileges, but upon enlarged and enlightened views of what is necessary for the public good. If they think it not necessary to yield to the first impulse of popular passion, I believe they are not only satisfied in their own consciences that they are doing what is right, but I believe they will be supported by such a mass of public opinion in this country—by such a preponderating mass of the intelligence and public opinion of this country—as will long secure the British constitution from the dangers which some appear to apprehend. There may be gusts of popular passion directed against the House of Lords; but I firmly believe that our mixed form of government is rooted in the hearts and affections of the people, and when they reflect what mighty changes in legislation have taken place in the last eight years, they will not believe that the House of Lords have set themselves up as perpetual barriers against the reform of all abuses—as is most unwarrantably alleged. I believe, that the more the Lords are threatened because they will not yield or adopt particular opinions, the more that hold will be confirmed, which they justly have, upon the respect and the affections of the people of this country.

Lord John Russell's motion, That the amendments be taken into consideration in three months, was agreed to.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH BILL.

JULY 8, 1836.

Lord John Russell rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to carry into effect the recommendations of the Commissioners of Ecclesiastical Duties and Revenues.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, upon the proposal of the noble lord to go into committee, a motion had been made and seconded, to prevent the translation of bishops. The hon. gentlemen who proposed and seconded the amendment, confined themselves strictly to the merits of the amendment. All the other hon. members who supported the views of the mover and seconder, had rather strayed away from the amendment in their remarks. With respect to the see of Durham, as he did not perceive that it had any necessary relation to the question now before the House, he could not discuss it at present. He thought, however, that before the motion was debated further, it would be very convenient to know whether the hon. member intended to press his motion to a division or not. In case he did, he thought the best form he could take would be as an instruction to the committee; it would be advisable, however, that the House should be assured upon this point, in order that it might know how to proceed. [Mr. Lushington meant to press his motion to a division.] In that case he should certainly support the bill of the noble lord, because he cordially approved, in the main, of the principle upon which it was framed. Throughout the whole of the labours of the commission upon whose report this bill was founded, political views appeared to have been carefully excluded, in the laudable desire to extend the sphere of usefulness of the Church to the furthest practicable limits, and in so doing, to attach the hearts and feelings of the people to the Church establishment of this country. He did not believe that there were any sincere friends of the Church more desirous to clear it from its imperfections, and to promote its usefulness, than the bishops who composed the late ecclesiastical commission. The whole conduct of those rev. prelates showed how desirous they were to give practical efficacy to remedial measures; and as one of their first steps, they unhesitatingly followed the example which had just been set them by the then ministry, and relinquished a large share of patronage in order that it might be applied to purposes of general utility. The hon. member for Liverpool, in the course of the present debate, had endeavoured to raise a distinction between what he was pleased to term the aristocracy and the democracy of the Church. The hon. member seemed to assume, that clergymen in the lower stations of the Church had no interest in the emoluments attached to the higher preferments. That was a position which he (Sir R. Peel) must deny. He maintained, on the contrary, that by upholding the dignity and the emoluments of the higher offices in the Church, they were also defending the interests and the rights of the so-called democracy of churchmen. Let the hon. member look to the first five names attached as signatures to the report of this commission. The first name was Dr. Howley, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the second Dr. Harcourt, Archbishop of York, the third Dr. Blomfield, Bishop of London, the fourth was the late Dr. Van Mildert, Bishop of Durham, and the fifth Dr. Sumner, Bishop of Winchester. When they read the names and recollected the history of those pious men, who had risen by the force of their own merit and great learning to the highest dignities in the Church, could the House require any argument to show that there was no distinction between the democracy and the aristocracy of the Church. By maintaining those high places, he was holding out, he thought, a stimulus to the emulation of the clergy at large, and a reward for distinguished merit or extraordinary service. By that means, too, they were encouraging a very laudable and a cheering spirit of ambition amongst them. No doubt considerable irregularity existed in the emoluments of the different bishoprics; but he apprehended that, from the peculiar usages and customs in different sees, and the difference in expense attendant upon them, that inequality was less in reality than was generally reported. To put the see of Durham, for instance, on the same footing in point of revenue with the see of Chester, might apparently be to put them upon an equality, but in reality would result in a gross inequality between them. But there was another point of view in which he thought this subject should be considered. It appeared to him, that by allowing of some degree of inequality between the different sees, they would assimilate the Church establishment in some degree to the other civil institutions of the country, and with an evident advantage to the Church and to the country itself. Certain he was, that the system of unequal division had not been countenanced, either by preceding governments or the present government, with any view to influence the bishops in their political conduct by the hope of promotion. The hon. gentlemen spoke against the propriety of holding out an object of ambition to the bishops. Now this involved a question of great importance, which ought not to be hastily decided—namely, whether the bishops ought, or ought not, to be wholly excluded from all participation in political matters, and all share in the management of the civil affairs of the country. For his own part he was free to declare, that he believed that, on the whole, it was of great advantage to the country that the bishops were permitted, under certain restrictions, to take part in the general affairs of the community. A class of ecclesiastics, totally disconnected from all concerns in civil affairs, and altogether removed from politics, would form an infinitely less enlightened, and an infinitely less liberal body of men in every respect; with less capacity for the religious duties of their station than our present clergy. The hon. gentleman had further complained, that the government in power for the time being, always selected their own friends for promotion to a vacant see. Now that appeared to him to be a very natural consequence, as long as parties in power had the choice in such matters. Yes, he maintained that it was a very natural, and he did not think a very blameable, course of proceeding; at least he felt pretty confident that if his Majesty's present advisers had acted upon a different principle, when occasions offered to them for selection—if, for instance, they had chosen a person to a vacant see who was known to be opposed to their views in politics—the government would have had to listen to a very severe lecture from their friends. Whilst, therefore, on the one hand, he maintained that these preferments were not made use of as the reward for apostasy, or as inducements for the avowal of a particular set of opinions; on the other hand, it was equally clear to him, that if once the propriety of admitting the bishops at all to participate in the political affairs of the country was admitted, it must be a natural and inevitable consequence that those persons would be selected for promotion to that sphere of political action, who were supposed to be most likely to support, by their voice in the assembly of parliament, the views of those who placed them there. With respect to the bill now before the House, it was undoubtedly a great measure of reform, and one the more likely to be of permanent utility, because it had, to a great extent, been brought about through the cheerful co-operation of the ecclesiastical body themselves, and because it had been framed with a friendly regard to the safety of the whole Church establishment. There was no desire on the part of the Church to maintain the system of pluralities; at the same time the necessity, which every one must be aware of, of providing for the duties of certain smaller livings, must render it impracticable entirely to abolish pluralities. He believed that the point to which the present bill went in that particular, was the utmost extent which, with safety to the Church establishment, could be attempted. The House would observe, that there was to be a surplus raised by the bill, which was to be applied in aid of the smaller livings; and although this principle might not be carried out to the full extent some hon. members might wish, he trusted they would not on that account oppose the bill, the passing of which, he thought, would operate as a great practical advantage both to the Church and to the country at large.

An amendment moved by Mr. Lushington was negatived, and the original motion carried by 142 to 22; majority, 120.

JULY 12, 1836.

Mr. Jervis (on the motion that the Speaker leave the chair) begged to move, that it be an instruction to the Committee, that they have power to receive a clause that no clergyman not fully conversant with the Welsh language be appointed to any see or benefice in the principality of Wales.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that agreeing as he did in the principle advocated by the hon. member for Chester, and believing that the majority of the House conceded to that principle, he hoped that the hon. gentleman would not divide the House upon his motion, because, as there appeared to be certain difficulties apprehended in the way of carrying his object into effect in the manner which he suggested, a wrong construction might be put upon the feeling and opinion of the House; and it might be supposed that the House did not agree in the principle of the hon. gentleman, because they did not accede to his proposition: although he (Sir Robert Peel) could not go along with the hon. gentleman in making it an absolute condition upon induction into a living or see in Wales, that the person inducted should be conversant with the Welsh language, he cordially agreed that the object he wished to attain was a very desirable one. He (Sir Robert Peel) owned that, he was not influenced in his opinion upon this subject by being told that, if this motion were carried, it would be impossible to resist another motion for extending its principle to the case of the judges who went the Welsh circuits. He was not quite sure whether that would not be advantageous; and whether justice would not be much more satisfactorily administered, when the judge himself could understand the evidence of the witnesses directly from their own mouths, than when that evidence must be received through the medium of an interpreter. Neither could he agree with those who apprehended from this motion being carried, any tendency to widen the separation between the two countries. He believed it would have a contrary effect. Depend upon it, that by sending into Wales clergymen who would be able to converse with their parishioners in their own tongue, so far from producing a greater separation between the countries, you would be taking the most effectual means for promoting the disuse of the Welsh, and the prevalence of the English language, because you would thereby inspire the Welsh people with confidence in the English government, and assure them that their interests were considered in this House. On the whole, although he hoped and believed the Bishops of the principality would see the advantage of exercising a proper discretion in the appointment of clergymen to Welsh parishes, and though he believed this debate would go some way in promoting the object of the hon. and learned gentleman, he (Sir Robert Peel) hoped the hon. gentleman would not, by dividing the House upon a proposition to which he for one could not agree, give rise to the supposition that the House, in negating his motion, did not adopt his principle.

The amendment, in an amended state, was agreed to, as were the remaining clauses of the bill, and the House resumed; the Bill to be reported.

JULY 14, 1836.

The Report on this Bill was brought up. On the question that the amendments made by the committee be read a second time—Mr. Hume moved, as an amendment, that they be read a second time that day six months.

SIR ROBERT PEEL was of opinion, that his Majesty's government having duly considered what were the best means of securing a measure of practical church reform, had actually brought forward a measure to accomplish that. If the House rejected the bill, they would reject a great benefit. If, for instance, the House rejected the bill, they would enable his Majesty's government, in the event of a vacancy occurring in the diocese of London, to appoint a bishop, who would retain all the emoluments that at present belonged to that see. If the House agreed to press that bill, they would establish the principle, that the maximum revenue of the Bishop of London should not exceed £10,000 a-year. He cordially approved of the course taken by the King's government on the present occasion. If they had adopted any other course—if, for instance, they had proposed to submit the minor details of the measure to the consideration of a committee of the whole House, it would be impossible for the legislature to pass any bill upon the subject in the present session of parliament.

If the House felt generally satisfied with the principle of the measure, he thought that the details of it might very safely, and very properly, be left to the consideration of a commission appointed by themselves. At all events, he thought that that would be a better course for the House to adopt than to reject the bill for the present session. So much as to the mode of proceeding. He would now say a word or two as to the principle of the bill. He apprehended that the bill proceeded upon the principle, that bishops were to continue to sit in the House of Lords. If that were the fact, the House, when it came to consider the expenses to which the bishops were subjected from the necessity of residing a portion of the year in London, independent of the claims upon their charity and benevolence, would see that the amount of emolument proposed by this bill to be left to the office of bishop was by no means extravagant. An hon. gentleman opposite had asked why the income of each should not be limited to £4,500 a-year? When that question was put, he thought sufficient consideration was not given to what must necessarily be the difference in the expenditure of the holders of different bishoprics—£4,500 a-year might be an abundant income in one bishopric, whilst in another it would hardly be more than sufficient to provide for the ordinary claims upon the benevolence of the diocesan. As to what had been said of the advantage to be gained to the government from the translation of bishops he must say, that he thought a most erroneous impression existed upon that head. But even if it were possible for a government to obtain any undue advantage in that way, he thought that the check of public opinion would be much more effectual than any law that could be passed upon the subject. He thought, however, that no government that could exist at the present time was likely to attach the slightest importance, or to look for the smallest advantage, from the translation of bishops. It seemed to be taken as an objection to the bill, that it did not provide directly and positively against the translation of bishops. But although the bill contained no positive enactment upon that head, it must be obvious to every one that it afforded every possible discouragement to translations, by producing as nearly as possible an equalization of the incomes of all the bishops, or by far the greater number of them. Under the provisions of the present bill, the incomes of the majority of the bishops would vary from £4,000 to £5,000 a-year. The utmost difference between them would not exceed £700 or £800 a-year, yet some of the hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to think that such a sum would be sufficient to influence their political conduct: he confessed that he could not join in such extravagant notions of the corruption of human nature. The amount of fees, and the many other expenses consequent upon the translation of a bishop, would leave so small a pecuniary inducement to obtain a translation, as to render it extremely improbable that any would sacrifice a political opinion for the sake of obtaining it. He felt opposed to any provision that should positively forbid translations, because he could imagine many cases likely to rise in which it might be convenient for the church, and highly beneficial to the church, that translations should take place. He approved of the arrangement proposed to be made by the bill, from a full and firm belief, that so far from the emoluments being disproportioned to the actual expenses of the bishoprics, if the bishops acted as they ought to do—if they attended to the claims of benevolence and charity which were continually made upon them, and which he believed most of them did—he considered, that the incomes of the bishops, instead of leaving them rich men, would not be more than sufficient to provide for the actual wants of their situation. Upon the whole, therefore he still thought the bill might be very beneficially adopted, and that no delay ought to be opposed to its progress in the present session.

The amendment was negatived, and the report agreed to.

STAMP DUTIES.

JULY 18, 1836.

The House in Committee on the Stamp Duties' Bill.

Mr. Grote proposed the insertion of a clause having reference to the stamps or dies of newspapers, which was opposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer,—

SIR ROBERT PEELE did not see the force of the objection made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the proposition of the hon. member for the city of London. He did not see why, consistently with the alteration they were about to make in the law, they should not go one step further, and impose on all newspapers the use of a distinctive die. There might be an objection to this in point of time, but in point of principle he thought there could not be any; because, by the 173rd clause it was made penal for any person to take out stamps in the name of one paper to be used by another. It was therefore required that the party should take out stamps for his own use only. It was also required that a return should be made of the number of stamps so taken out, so that the stamp-office would always know what the extent of the circulation of each newspaper was. The question whether the number of stamps issued to each newspaper should be published or not, would remain precisely the same, whether the clause proposed were adopted or rejected. It did not follow as a necessary consequence, that if each newspaper were required to use a distinctive die, therefore the public would know how many stamps were taken out. The right hon. gentleman might still resist the publication of the number of stamps issued, upon the ground that the principle was not a right principle. Whether the argument of the right hon. gentleman would be a valid argument or not he would not stop to inquire. Be it as it might, the adoption of the present clause would leave the principle the same. The right hon. gentleman had said, that under his optional clause newspapers which were of extensive circulation would take out the die, and those which did not would lie under the opprobrium of being of small circulation. But if, in point of fact, the legislature indirectly required them to take out a die, or else subject them to public mistrust, why will you not go to the length of saying—that the law requires you should take out the die? It appeared to him to be infinitely better to take one or the other of these courses. Either to say, the newspaper proprietors should be at liberty to transfer stamps from one to the other; or to say, they should take out the die. But to say that it should be permissive was altogether delusory. Unless effectual security were taken, nothing could be accomplished. He was not aware that any objection existed to the adoption of the die. The expense would be exceedingly trifling. He thought, therefore, that to make it compulsory on newspapers to use a die, would, upon the whole, be perfectly fair. It would be the most effectual security to all parties, and it would still remain for the House at any time to determine, whether or not returns should be made to show the actual amount of circulation of each paper. He therefore, for himself, not having heard on the part of the newspapers any objection to the taking out of the die, was rather inclined to support the proposition of the hon. member for the city of London.

Clause postponed. In reply to a question by Mr. Hume, in reference to the additional halfpenny charged upon supplements to newspapers, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the duty was imposed upon the same principle upon which letters paid postage. Single letters all paid the same postage, and if a double letter were put into the post it was charged double. There must be a limit somewhere. The question had, however, been already discussed, and settled on the basis of a penny stamp, and if they were to say that half a sheet of paper should only pay a halfpenny stamp, they would be abandoning the principle upon which the House had already decided to act.

Sir Robert Peel said, there was a still stronger reason. When newspapers have the temptation to publish double sheets, they do not do so without giving the public an equivalent. It was not done because the newspaper had double the quantity of news, but for the advertisements, and upon each advertisement the sum of 1s 6d. was paid, and therefore, though they permitted double sheets for the same stamp, in point of fact they were in another way deriving great advantages. Take for instance The Times newspaper. The amount of its advertisement duty was £10,000 a-year. This was much more than sufficient to pay the expenses of postage. He confessed that he thought it much better to place a duty of 1d., and he was sure that newspapers which had the temptation to publish double sheets, would, in so doing, be giving the public some equivalent in the way of advertisements. At the same time, his right hon. friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, had met the proposition of his right hon. friend (Mr. Goulburn) with so much fairness, that he would withdraw all objections to the restrictions. He was of opinion that it was quite just and reasonable that the restrictions should be placed on the quantity of the printed matter. If they took the mere size of the newspaper, it would be subject to inconvenience, because sometimes there was a difference of size in the sheets on account of the great rapidity with which they were cut off; and if they took the size of the paper, it might happen that 100 newspapers would be subject to the additional duty, whilst the remainder, containing the same quantity of printed matter would be free from it. The compromise proposed was a perfectly fair one: it was founded on principles of justice; but his right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was justified in reserving the further consideration of the means of giving it practical effect.

Later in the evening, Sir Robert Peel said, that there was one part of this subject to which he was anxious to draw the attention of the committee—he meant the subject of copyright. He hoped that it was the intention of his right hon. friend (Mr. Rice) to make the protection of copyright concurrent with any changes in the law. They were about to make a great revolution in the mode of conducting newspapers, simply by the reduction of the stamp duty, which would destroy what some called a monopoly, but what others considered to be the true cause of the very high character of the press of this country, more particularly with respect to its intelligence. In making these great changes, it was a matter of strict justice and sound policy to devise some means of giving for a short period some copyright. Unless there was, at the same time, a remedy of a summary nature, in point of fact no copyright could be effectual. He must say, that of all the phenomena of civilized society, he doubted whether there was any thing more remarkable than the mode in which the people of this country were supplied with intelligence. It was one of the most wonderful instances in which, without the intervention of government, merely by dint of private exertion and expense, the public was supplied from all parts of the globe with that intelligence, the possession of which constituted one of the great sources of rational amusement and instruction. Some said that the press of this country was less eminent in point of intellect and ability than that of other countries. He did not entertain that opinion. Of course, in the free discussion of political questions there would be always much of acrimony, of personal comment, and reproach; but upon the whole, comparing the press of this country to that of France, or the United States, or to the press as it existed in any other country, or ever did exist, it was a remarkable instance of ability and intelligence, of readiness, of application in the mode in which the public intelligence was procured through the intervention of private men, and a most remarkable instance of the application of capital. He hoped, at the same time that they reduced the amount of duty, which might have operated as a monopoly, that they would act consistently with justice, and make concurrently some regulations by which those who had been at the trouble and expense of procuring the earliest intelligence might be protected from being deprived, for a few hours at least, of the exclusive advantage of that intelligence. He hoped, that in the course of the session some effectual means would be devised also to prevent all interference with the title of a newspaper for the purpose of imposing on the public, and he hoped that, within certain limits (for there must be limits,) those who had gone to the expense of many thousands in procuring intelligence, would, in the first place, be allowed a copyright; and next, that it would be made effectual by some summary process.

The remaining clauses of the bill were agreed to. The House resumed; bill reported, and ordered to be printed.

CHARITABLE TRUSTS.

JULY 19, 1836.

Mr. Vernon Smith moved the further consideration of the report on the Charitable Trustees' Bill.

SIR ROBERT PEEL was rather surprised at the remonstrance, gentle as it was, that the hon. gentleman had made, as to taking the discussion of this bill on the report. If the hon. member had, at an early period some evening, asked leave to bring in the bill, and invited discussion; or had he pursued the same course on the second reading, and given ample notice of when the second reading would take place, then he might have expressed some surprise at the debate being taken on the report; but when leave was given to bring in the bill after the hour of midnight, and that it was also read a second time on the 17th of June, at an hour nearer one in the morning than twelve at night, it having on both occasions escaped the vigilance of the hon. member for Salford (Mr. Brotherton), he thought that the hon. member might spare his expression of surprise that a discussion should now take place. When the report was brought up at half-past eleven o'clock, he (Sir R. Peel) made no objection; but he did take an objection to the principle of the bill, and asked the government to delay it, and he had said on the occasion—do not take silence as an acquiescence. He thought every precaution, therefore, had been used, that the hon. member should not be taken by surprise. The question was, whether the House would enact some temporary arrangement, as regarded the charitable trusts of corporate towns; or whether it would establish finally and irrevocably the principle, not only of popular election, but an indissoluble connection between these municipal bodies and the administrators of those charitable trusts. The bill before the House professed to be a permanent measure, not only from its professions, but from the nature of its enactments. If they once vested these reversionary interests in a popular body, and the interests of contingent remainders on these estates, they would be making an arrangement to place them practically beyond the reach of control, and a political body would have the control over these trusts. He agreed with the hon. gentleman, that it would be preposterous to revive the old corporations for the purpose of administering these trusts, and those who were opposed to the present bill were desirous of disuniting the administration of the trusts from a political body, giving, as those who agreed with him on this subject did give, a strong proof of their disinterestedness. The power would be vested, if the amendment of the Lords to the Municipal Corporation Act Amendment Bill was not agreed to, in the Lord Chancellor; and if held by him temporarily, and until some permanent arrangement could be come to by parliament, and until parliament could consider what the arrangement might be; although the Lord Chancellor was a political character connected with the administration, yet, even upon that understanding as to the exercise of the trust, he would rather prefer it, than consent to pass this bill, and thus establish a permanent connection between political bodies and those who were to have the administration of charitable trusts. In the other case they would have the advantage by letting the matter stand thus, that it would be merely provisional; for no appointment of secretaries and clerks could be considered as making the arrangement of a permanent character, and it would be open to parliament, in the next session, to consider the whole subject of these trusts, and make some permanent arrangement with respect to them. He implored the House to consider the necessity of making some provisional arrangement with the view of preventing a connection taking place between charitable trustees and these political bodies. The hon. gentleman had referred to some passages in the report of the committee, tending to show the manner in which the charitable funds had been misapplied in the hands of the late corporations to political and interested purposes. He would, with the permission of the House, read an extract from the report of the same commissioners on the same subject:—

“Other specific trusts are connected with charitable institutions and the administration of charity funds, which are under the control of the corporate authorities. Here, again, we find mismanagement and misappropriation to a considerable extent. The patronage connected with these trusts has in numerous instances been exercised by the corporate authorities to gain or reward votes both at the municipal and parliamentary elections. The instances given in the report are sufficient to illustrate the character of the abuses which are connected with specific trusts and patronage. They not only prove that the object of the trust has been lost sight of, but that a provision for the poorer classes of the community in the hands of the corporate authorities, has become a source of corrupt influence.”

Was the House, then, to remain perfectly satisfied that under the system of popular election, which had been introduced into the management of corporation affairs, they would have an effectual security against such perversion of charitable trusts, and to precisely similar purposes, for the future? By the present constitution of corporate bodies, the members were almost invited to take part in politics. Although popular control provides many remedies for abuse, yet, where the passions were inflamed, and the struggle for political predominance was obstinate—he would ask, did popular control afford any security against the perversion of power; and was it not likely that the same political feelings which had been roused at the elections of members of parliament, or members of the town-council, would prevail when the same constituency was called upon to elect trustees to administer funds by which they expected to be benefited? All the proceedings of this House had been directed to the removal of this abuse, because where patronage was possessed by a political body, it had been used for political purposes. It was no compensation for this evil to be assured, that in one certain borough the Whig party might predominate, and in another the Tory party might rule, over the administration of charitable trust estates, and that therefore, on the aggregate, power would be apportioned fairly between them. The objection which he had to this principle was of a much higher kind. He had the same objection to the operation of political influence and patronage in the case of these charitable trusts, whether that influence were in the old corporations or the new. He desired to prevent the future application of charitable trust-funds to political purposes, and to preclude the possibility of corruption in their administration from flourishing. The evidence already laid on the table of the House, in the reports of the charity commissioners, fully showed, that placing the management of charitable estates in the hands of individuals chosen by popular election, afforded no check to practices which all must condemn. It was clear that where patronage existed, it would be exercised by either party for their own purposes; and this ought to be prevented, whether the patronage were vested in the government or in popular bodies. In order to show the intimate connection which, by this bill, would exist between the town-council and the new trustees of charitable funds, he would merely remark, that the constituency which was to elect them was to be precisely the same, and that the qualification for a town-councillor and for a trustee were also the same, with the exception that a clergyman might be a trustee, though he might not be a member of the town-council. Now, supposing the parties to be fairly balanced in the election of trustees, and that half the number represented one party in the borough, and the other half represented the other party in the borough, yet, as they were subject to annual change under the bill, the one party or the other might gain for a period, at least, the preponderance; and it was this liability to a constant change in the preponderance of the body, that, in his judgment, formed one of the greatest evils of this bill, and against which he wished to guard. By its provisions abuses would be perpetuated, though the power were transferred from one party to another. Would not those powers continue to be used for the promotion of political purposes? Why, the bill provided that the town-council (a political body) should have a control over the trustees; for the books of the charities were to be always open to them, and they were to have, at all seasonable hours, access to them. The bill contained another important provision, which went to establish even a still closer connection between the corporate body and the charitable body—a provision to which he especially wished to direct the attention of the hon. member for Southwark. He believed it to be a principle established beyond all doubt, that where there existed a surplus of a charity estate, over and above the amount specially directed by the donor to be applied to any particular purpose, in such a case the surplus should be disposed of as nearly as possible in accordance with the intention of the original donor—in other words, where, by lapse of time, by change of circumstances, or from any other cause, the charity estates and revenues had increased, that in such case the increased revenues ought to be applied and devoted as nearly to the objects which the original founder had in view as might be consistent with the existing state of society, and with that view applications had sometimes been made for an act of parliament. But what did the bill propose to do with any existing surplus? The bill enacted, that in every case in which the hereditaments or personal estate of which the charitable trustees of any of the said boroughs now stand seized and possessed, are chargeable for the purposes of the trust with a fixed sum, or with a charge wholly satisfied by less than the whole of the rents and profits of the real estate, or of the interest and dividends of the personal estate of which they are so seized or possessed, the whole estate was to go—how did the House suppose?—not to be applied according to the principle he had stated, to purposes of benevolence, of charity, or of education, as the case might be; but, “the whole estate, right, interest, title, powers, and liabilities of the said trustees in the said hereditaments and personal estate, should, immediately after the passing of this act, be vested in the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the said borough, subject, in the first instance, to the charge created for the purposes of the trust.” The clause did not contain one word as to the application of the surplus funds to purposes of charity, benevolence, or education. On the contrary, the remainder was to be paid over to the borough fund, which was applicable to the purposes of lighting and watching. Provided there was a specific charge made in a will when that was to be considered as satisfied, the whole was to be transferred to the corporate body. Again, it ought not to be forgotten that the freemen, and those most interested in the charity funds, were not given, by this bill, any voice in the election of the trustees; but the choice was given to those who, by establishing a certain fixed charge, as in the terms of the clause he had read, might gain the surplus, and by it save their own pockets from contributing to otherwise borough rates. On the construction of the clause many great and important questions arose. He would take one case out of many that might be cited. In Stratford-upon-Avon, for instance, the property of the corporation consists of two estates, one called the guild estate, and the other the college estate. This property was vested in the corporation by a charter of 7 Edward VI. The maintenance of an alms-house and a free grammar-school was expressly mentioned in the charter as the main object of this grant. The charter directed that 4*d.* each should be paid to the poor men in the alms-house, and that an annual stipend of £20 should be paid to the school-master. A further sum of £20 was also, by the charter, directed to be paid to the vicar. It appeared from the report, that the vicar complained to the corporation commissioners, that the charity trustees did not make any increase to his stipend commensurate to the change in the times, the increased duties of his office, and the increased price of provisions. The commissioners had, therefore, to inquire whether or not the claim of the vicar for an increase was well-founded; and in their report they said—

“We think there is an obvious distinction between a direction to pay a specific stipend for the express purpose of maintaining an institution, and a direction to pay a stipend to an individual without reference to an object to be maintained by such payment. In the former instance, we conceive that the payments must be increased to the full extent of the revenues granted, if such additions become necessary for the proper and effectual support of the institution. In the latter case, the whole obligation is discharged by the payment of the specific sums directed.”

On these grounds they hold that the vicar had no claim whatever, though there existed a surplus. This was a case in point, and many other cases presented similar difficulties. He could not consent to a proposition embodied in the bill, which, without carrying out the intentions of the original donors, transferred the means of patronage to a political party—until, at all events, the subject shall have received much more consideration than as yet had been given to it. Let hon. members bear in mind what took place last year with reference to this subject. A select committee was then appointed to examine and consider the evidence contained in the reports of the charity commissioners—to devise the means proper to be adopted (and to report the same) for the more prompt, efficient, and economical administration of the charitable funds of the country. The committee made their report, in which, after stating their hope that early in the year 1837, the whole of the reports of the commissioners would be received, they suggested a remedy for the evils of the system which prevailed. That remedy, however, did not apply the surplus charitable revenues to the lighting, cleansing, or watching the corporate town in possession of the charitable estates, but had regard to the objects contemplated by the original founders. Neither did they recommend that the town-council should have the entire control (as under this bill they would have) of the charitable funds. They reported:—

“The last head of inquiry upon which your committee are to report their opinion—namely, the mode by which charity funds may be more efficiently, promptly, and economically administered—comprises many considerations of great interest and difficulty. When it is considered that these funds amount to about £1,000,000 per annum, it is obvious that their proper management and right application are matters of national concern, the more especially as the objects of their appropriation embrace, to a very large extent, the education and comfort of the people. The committee, then, recommend that the superintendence, and, in certain cases, the administration, of all property devoted to charitable uses, should be intrusted to a permanent board of three commissioners, or some other independent authority, on whom should be imposed the duty of superintendence and control over the administration of all property devoted to charitable uses; that such board should have authority to summon before them all persons concerned in the administration of any charitable institution or funds; in case of necessity to appoint—and upon adequate cause established to remove—trustees; to prevent the sale, mortgage, or exchange of charity property without their concurrence; to take care that all charitable funds be invested upon real or government securities; and generally to authorize such arrangements as shall appear calculated to promote the object of the founder, and in cases in which that object is useless or unattainable, to suggest such other appropriation as may appear desirable.”

The House must observe that the recommendations of the committee were wholly at variance with the provisions of this bill, which bore no similarity to the bill introduced by a noble and learned lord in another place, who had devoted much attention to the subject of charities, and whose state of health, which he regretted, had prevented his presence in his place during the present session—he alluded to Lord Brougham. That noble and learned lord introduced a bill on this subject into the other House, and his plan was, that a board of commissioners should be created to consist of the Lord President of the Council, of the Lord Privy Seal, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and of three other commissioners, to be paid a salary, and to be appointed under the sign-manual. The noble lord's bill was silent as to placing charitable trusts under the management of individuals chosen by popular election; neither did it propose to appropriate the surplus revenues to the borough funds; on the contrary, it empowered those commissioners to confer with the local authorities for the purpose of applying the funds to the extension of charity and education. With all these difficulties in the way of a satisfactory settlement of this question, would any man venture to affirm that it would be wise, in the month of July, to come to a permanent arrangement, and especially an arrangement vesting the election of the trustees in the popular body? It would be much better to make some temporary arrangement, and to take up the subject early next session. He wholly and entirely disclaimed any desire to have charitable funds applied to any political purposes whatsoever—but he objected to any permanent arrangement being now made, which would preclude full and ample consideration of the whole matter. What permanent arrangement ought finally to be made he was not prepared to say; but he must object, at this period of the session, to proceeding with a bill giving the control of those funds to popular bodies, and so completely at variance with the terms of the report of the committee, and with the provisions of the bill introduced into the other House of Parliament by Lord Brougham. He did not impute to the hon. gentleman opposite any desire to gain a party advantage. The question was one of a most important character; and, hereafter, individuals would look to see how far the intentions of charitable benefactors of former times were regarded, and on that, in a great degree, would depend the extension of a similar bounty by benevolent individuals of the present age. He entreated the House to pause, and, by making some temporary arrangement, to reserve to themselves the opportunity of more fully considering the subject, and of carrying out the intentions of the original donors.

The original motion was agreed to.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

JULY 19, 1836.

On the question, that this Bill be read a third time,—Mr. Hume moved, that it be read a third time that day six months.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he was unwilling to rise, from an apprehension that what he thought it necessary to say might expose him to misconception. The hon. gentleman opposite (the member for Liskeard) had seemed to argue, as if the introduction of the present measure ought to be regarded in the light of a great political triumph to the opposition. There was not the least foundation for any such opinion; he himself had not the slightest interest in the result, and he could not look upon the proceeding at all in the light of a concession. The hon. member for Liskeard had spoken of the present proceeding as a political manœuvre which had proved quite successful—it was no such thing. He and his friends were no parties to the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. When he was appointed to the chief office in the administration by the crown, he advised the crown—seeing a strong feeling in favour of reform in the church—to issue a commission; and he did so in the full conviction, that a reform which was sanctioned by the heads of the church, which had the weight of their authority, and came recommended by their high example, would be the most likely to prove satisfactory to the great body of the people, and be, therefore, permanently advantageous to the church itself. He did think that, by means of that consent, they would be enabled to carry a measure of reform better calculated to impart efficiency to the church in all its portions, than if it came without the approbation and good-will of the bishops and of the dignitaries of the establishment. When he retired from office, he retired from any connexion with the commission; its continuance was a matter of perfect indifference to him; at the same time he felt bound to say, that he could not at all understand what object the present government could have in bringing forward the present measure, except to increase the efficiency of the established church; but, in addition to that remark, he begged again to say, that he had no personal or political interest in the result; he had had no connexion with the measure, or with the noble lord who had undertaken its introduction. To him it was no favour—no concession; justice, however, required him to say, that the parties concerned in the production of the measure, appeared to have acted upon perfectly independent grounds; there was, therefore, no triumph on the one hand, and no disappointment on the other; and it would have occasioned him much regret if there had been any thing of personal or political feeling. There existed nothing that in the least approximated to feelings of that nature. The best possible proof that honest and upright feelings governed the parties concerned in the proceeding was to be found in this, that those who advised, and those who continued the commission—that the crown, the commissioners, the heads of the church, and others possessing patronage, were willing to relinquish that patronage, and to place it at the disposal of the commission, to be made available for the purposes of a just, a useful, and a salutary reform. Who was there that did not know how valuable canonries and sinecures in the church were? And yet many of these valuable pieces of preferment were given up by bishops and others who possessed in them vested rights, and who, according to usage, might have bestowed them upon members of their own families, who naturally looked up to receiving such species of provision. They were clearly, then, influenced by a bona fide desire to promote the general good of the church. With respect to the particular bill then under consideration, it did appear to him to go far enough in diminishing the incomes of the bishops. He desired to see them in possession of incomes sufficient to support the decent and decorous dignity of their rank. He would not listen to any thing less; they ought to be in a condition to provide for their families, to defray the expense of residences in London and in the country, of contributions to charities, and of keeping up a liberal and becoming hospitality—in short, of all that might be requisite for enabling them to live upon terms of equality with other persons of similar rank. Bearing in mind these considerations, he should say, that £15,000 a year was not too much for the Archbishop of Canterbury, and he should defend £15,000 a year as well on these grounds as on that of the general interests of the church. To those who proposed to reduce such an income still lower he should say, that they ought to inquire, could the expenses of the rank and situation be defrayed for less? and not apply themselves to a minute inquiry as to whether there existed elsewhere incomes inadequate for their purposes. To such description of inquiries he saw no limit. Their duty was to see what the highest rank in the church required, and not to injure the efficiency of that for the sake of pushing inquiries to an extreme point in the opposite direction. Upon these principles, then, he should support the bill, and he hoped nothing he had said would prejudice the success of the measure.

Debate adjourned. The bill read a third time, July 25, 1838.

AGRICULTURAL COMMITTEE.

JULY 21, 1836.

In consequence of a remark by the Earl of Darlington, who expressed his regret and astonishment that this Committee had determined to make no Report—

SIR ROBERT PEEL thought it necessary, as he had been a member of this committee, to trespass upon the House with a few words on the present occasion. When the committee was originally appointed, it would be recollected, perhaps, that he had reluctantly given the proposition his assent; and the reason upon which he assented to it at all was, that being perfectly aware that distress did prevail to a very great extent in many of the agricultural districts, he knew with what feelings of bitterness and alleged hardship men who were deeply concerned in these interests, deeply and personally affected by that distress, might view an unconditional refusal, on the part of the government and of the House, to inquire into their condition. But well he recollected also, that whilst he gave this as his reason for acquiescing in the appointment of this committee, he at the same time predicted that nothing but disappointment would be the result. He foretold this upon many considerations. In the first place, he recollected the committee upon this very subject in 1833, which reported its opinion to the House, that the agriculturists should seek relief from their own exertions rather than from any extraneous or collateral sources. In that report he had acquiesced, and he remained still unaltered in his opinion, that, let the newly-appointed committee make whatever report they might, it would come in the end to the same result—and it would be a delusion for them to tell the country, or to hold out a hope, that parliament had the relief of the agriculturists at all within their power. He certainly could not deny, that the present system of tithes was a very serious burthen upon the land; and, so far as it went, a fundamental cause of the distress which at present prevailed. But this subject was one which could only be dealt with by the House itself; nor did he expect that the House would, on that question, suffer itself to be guided by the opinion of a select committee. Then there was the currency. The inquiry before the committee was certainly a general one; and, therefore, it would have been unwise to have thrown the slightest impediment in the way of their examinations even upon this point. He had interposed, therefore, no impediment in the way of the particular question mooted in the inquiry, fixed as his own opinions were and are, that—(without discussing the expediency of the new system of currency which some years ago was adopted)—great distress must inevitably prevail throughout the country, if any attempt were to be made for returning from the present convertible currency, to the inconvertible paper currency which formerly existed. He thought it would be impossible now to return to the old system, without materially endangering the stability of the property and interests, not of one, but of every class of persons in this kingdom, and giving rise to doubt and anxiety in the public mind of the most painful character. A metallic standard and a convertible currency had existed during a period of fourteen years; and all the transactions during that period having been engaged in under that currency,—and upon the faith pledged, time after time, by this House, that the currency and standard should not be again departed from—it would be, in his opinion, useless and hazardous in the extreme, to hold out any prospect of a re-opening of the question. It was now agreed upon, on all hands, that parliament never adopted a measure more like to secure to industry its reward, and to preserve a fair equality in the prices of labour and of necessaries, than that for a just and unfluctuating currency.

The result of the inquiries in the committee went to prove the beneficial operation of that measure; the condition of the working classes was found to have been gradually improving under the present system of currency, and it was shown that any alteration in that system could now only act injuriously upon those who depended upon the price of their daily labour for their support. With respect to the course adopted by the committee in declining to frame a report, he must say that, for his part, he was not surprised at it: and whatever disappointment might have been felt by some parties at the absence of such a report, that disappointment had been small, compared to that which would have been experienced had the committee merely reported opinions upon which they had all agreed. That any discussion had taken place upon the subject at all, he looked upon as no mean compliment to his noble friend (Lord Chandos), who, by merely giving a vague notice of an intention to move for an inquiry upon the subject, caused his Majesty's government to anticipate him by a passage in the King's speech at the beginning of the ensuing session, recommending such an inquiry to be made. His noble friend's influence with the government must undoubtedly have been very great, when, by a casual intimation of this kind, he caused the subject to be taken up in his Majesty's speech, and subsequently put in course of inquiry by the noble leader of his Majesty's government in that House. To show still further the deference which the noble lord (Lord John Russell) paid to the influence of his noble friend, when the noble lord came down to the committee to state his reasons why he thought no report should be made, the noble lord said he came to that conclusion in deference to the opinion of his noble friend. Really, his noble friend (Lord Chandos) must wield a potent influence in the state, when he had caused the government to institute this inquiry, in the first place, merely by having entered a notice on the subject,—and then to make no report, in deference to him. It had been alleged that he could be but little affected by the state of the agricultural interest. But he could say, that he had a much deeper personal interest in agriculture than in any other interest or branch of industry in the state. He felt the most strongly-rooted attachment to agriculture, and he believed that these were the strongest reasons to justify a feeling of preference.—At the same time, he was so perfectly satisfied that the hopes of the agricultural interest must rest eventually upon their own exertions, that he could not bring himself to encourage the delusive expectations, on their part, that the legislature, either by an alteration of taxation, or any other change in the financial system of the country whatever, could permanently or substantially place them in an improved condition. He should rather tell the agriculturists to look at the farmers of Scotland, and endeavour to work out some plan of amelioration, and consequently of relief for themselves, which, however inadequate, perhaps, to meet the temporary pressure, would eventually be found much more beneficial than any which parliament could afford. To say the truth, he must own that he did not anticipate that any immediate or striking amelioration could at present be afforded, either by the exertions of parliament or of individuals. Such important changes, and such stupendous improvements had been made, of late years, in the mechanical arts, and in the application of them to the wants of society, that every interest in the kingdom must be expected to be affected by them to a considerable extent; and above all others have they wrought mighty changes in the relative situation of the farmer. It must not be concealed from them that steam-navigation was making a great revolution in this country, bringing as it did the produce of distant lands into competition with old and exhausted soils, and that this was the great reason why the stiff and clay lands of this country were subject to the disadvantages under which they at present laboured, and to which they must continue to be exposed till a check was interposed to the progress of human improvement. This, he would repeat, was the principal and strongest reason why the occupiers of stiff and clayey soils could not enter into a successful competition with the farmers of other lands which were more favoured by circumstances. Taking these circumstances into consideration, he acquiesced in the resolution of the committee not to submit any report to the House. But, if he might be allowed to say so, his recollection was not exactly the same as the noble lord's with respect to the course of conduct which the noble lord had pursued in reference to the proposed report. He was bound to say, however, in the outset, that in his opinion both the House and the committee were under great obligations to the chairman of the committee, for the industry, the ability, and the great impartiality which he had shown throughout the inquiry. But as it seemed that they were at liberty to divulge the secrets of the prison-house, he would venture to state what, as far as his recollection guided him, the noble lord did when that report was submitted to the committee. The noble lord went through that report, reading it, like a magician, backwards, and as he went on he struck all the brains out of it. The noble lord stated, when he objected to parts of the report, that he would give most satisfactory reasons why they should not be retained. There was this objection to any observation on the subject of the currency, that a distinct resolution had been passed by the House,—that any alteration in our monetary system, which would have the effect of lowering the standard of value, was highly inexpedient and dangerous to the best interests of the country. Now, when a select committee was appointed to consider the subject of the currency—a question of immense importance, and immediately interesting every member of the community,—I cheerfully resigned any advantage I might have derived from the resolution, and relied on the intrinsic force of truth, and on the weight of the evidence collected in the course of the inquiry. Then we came to the question of the malt tax, and to the question of increased duty on foreign corn. The noble lord said, that these were questions for his right hon. friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and of too much importance to be reported on by a select committee, and he wished the paragraphs in which those questions were referred to, to be omitted. The noble lord acted in the same manner with respect to one or two other points, and when he came himself to look at the report, he found that the noble lord had, with his sickle, so carefully cut down and gathered up every important resolution of the committee, that hardly any thing was left to report upon; and he had nothing to do but to assent to the proposition, that the committee should not present any report. On the whole, he thought that there would be less disappointment felt from giving the evidence unaccompanied by any report, than would be the case if the committee presented a mere mutilated document relating to matters of comparatively little importance. The noble lord did, indeed, propose a panegyric upon the reduction which had been effected in the county-rates, a reduction amounting altogether to £70,000, and which was attained by the partial transfer of expenses of criminal prosecutions to the government. He believed that the farmers were quite aware of the fact, and that in consequence their rates had been reduced a farthing in the pound; the noble lord's proposed resolution was at any rate a proof that he thought either that we were not informed of the fact, or were not sufficiently alive to its importance. The noble lord also recommended that the report should specify the tithe bill as a measure of great importance, and likely to afford great relief to the agricultural interest; but he suggested to the noble lord that the tithe bill had not yet passed into a law—that it was then before the House of lords; and that, although he sincerely hoped it would receive their assent and concurrence, he deemed it to be rather premature to dwell upon a measure as being a great boon to the agricultural interest which had not yet become law. The noble lord then adverted to the progress which had been made under the new poor law in diminishing the burdens upon agriculture, but he did not think that it was exactly the province of the committee to enter upon the consideration of the poor-law; for very little evidence had been taken upon the subject, and although that question would doubtless have formed a useful head of inquiry, yet, as the committee did not enter upon it, the consequence would be,—if it had ventured to say too much, and to predict great benefits from the measure, that that report, although future events might confirm the conjecture on which it had proceeded, would not be founded on any evidence that had been received. There was, however, a paragraph in the report relating to stiff lands which had been left undrained, and recommending the Scotch method, of an application of the plough and draining the sub-soil. We all felt, on reading the report, that if we omitted every thing relating to the corn-laws, every thing about the malt-tax, and the corresponding duty on foreign corn, the plough, in a report thus presented, would stand in rather too bold a relief. Then other gentlemen said, they had heard of harrows, and other mechanical improvements, which they thought deserved mention. He was at first, certainly, disposed in favour of presenting a report; but when he considered all the circumstances to which he had referred, and the expectations which had been formed, he most willingly acquiesced in the propriety of making no report at all; and he was very sure that the disappointment which would be felt, would not be so great as if the committee had presented a report in which all the remedies that had been proposed for the relief of agriculture should have been discussed. He had attempted to state, and he hoped he had succeeded in stating correctly, the proceedings before the committee; and he must say, that if the noble lord was the original author of the proposal for a committee, and therefore responsible for what the committee had done—[“No! No!”] Why, surely the noble lord, in advising the King to recommend that committee in his speech from the throne, was more responsible for the appointment of such a committee, than a county member who had given a vague notice that such an inquiry would probably be instituted the next session; and therefore he said again, if the noble lord without a division agreed to let the committee report the evidence only to the House, it was rather too late for him to endeavour to throw the responsibility of the committee having agreed to no report, upon the shoulders of others.

The report was brought up.

NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

JULY 21, 1836.

Mr. Hume moved, “That a humble address be presented to his Majesty, praying that in order to obtain plans for the new Houses of Parliament, in accordance with the instructions already issued by the commissioners, his Majesty may be pleased to direct a further competition in designs, without limiting the designs to any particular style of architecture, and confining them to a certain fixed sum; and which designs may be publicly exhibited previous to the appointment of a committee by his Majesty to examine and report thereon.”

SIR ROBERT PEEL had heard the speech of the hon. member for Middlesex, and he confessed it had not left upon his mind the same impression that it appeared to have done upon that of the hon. gentleman who had just sat down. [Mr. Hawes.] Notwithstanding the liberal and extended view which the hon. member for Middlesex had taken of the subject, he certainly had failed to convince him (Sir R. Peel) that the House ought now to set aside all that had been done with respect to these plans, and to commence the whole matter anew. In the course of his speech, indeed, the hon. member himself stated that which would alone be a conclusive reason against his proposition, for the hon. member declared that he still contemplated a change of the site of the Houses of Parliament. If that were so, surely it would be absurd to appoint a new commission, and to have a preparation of new plans, on the assumption that the site of the building was not to be changed. Then there was another point; supposing the hon. member's motion to be acceded to, and a fresh inquiry to be instituted, he did not know where the House would now find commissioners to undertake the task of deciding upon the merits of the plans submitted to their consideration. There certainly was one point upon which he (Sir R. Peel) had firmly made up his mind—never again to act as a commissioner upon any subject of this kind, where a preference was to be given to the skill of one man as compared with that of others who had entered into competition upon the same work; because, if gentlemen who acted as commissioners gratuitously, and at the expense of a great deal of personal convenience, were afterwards to be assailed in a manner that the commissioners in this instance had been, and, moreover, were to see the whole of their labours quashed in a way so unceremonious as that proposed by the hon. member for Middlesex, he knew not where for the future any gentleman would be found hardy enough to undertake the office. But putting aside the commissionership, the next thing that he should deprecate, if it were a thing personal to himself, would be to be the successful competitor. Nay, he would rather be a commissioner than the successful competitor, to be hunted and pursued with every species of invective in the way that Mr. Barry had been. If the consequence, of successful competition were to be exposed to such a series of attacks as those which had been directed against that gentleman, he (Sir R. Peel) would infinitely rather remain in privacy and oblivion. He thought at first, that the Crown should be left at liberty to choose its own architect, in the same way as every private gentleman was at liberty to select whom he pleased when he wanted plans for the erection of a house of his own. He thought, that if the most eminent architect of the day were directed to undertake the task, there would be a much greater likelihood of obtaining a plan which would secure accommodation, and do credit to the architectural taste of the country, than if an open competition of all artists were invited. This was his original opinion, and he confessed that the circumstances which had since transpired had not much tended to induce him to alter it. Acting upon the opinion which he originally entertained, the Crown did in the first place invite one of the most eminent architects to prepare plans for the new Houses, and that distinguished gentleman in consequence devoted several months to the task; and at last he produced a plan which was not adopted, because, from what afterwards took place, it was never examined. The reason why he objected to open competition in the first instance, was, because he thought it would discourage the most eminent architects from entering the field, and giving to the country the advantage of their designs. After alluding to the point of expense, and defending the estimates made by Mr. Barry, the right hon. baronet proceeded to observe, that the alterations subsequently made in the plan selected, by no means indicated any original inferiority, as some hon. gentlemen would wish the House to infer. The question to be considered was, comparing Mr. Barry's original plan with the other plans submitted to the consideration of the commissioners, whether Mr. Barry was fairly entitled to preference? If the commissioners thought that, combining exterior beauty with internal accommodation, it was upon the whole the best, and that it afforded the vastest elements for obtaining a building convenient for the parliament, and creditable to the national taste, then he thought they were justified in giving preference to that plan. Having given it that preference, were they to exclude it from all improvement? Could any thing be more absurd than to say, that a plan, adopted as the best of all that were offered to the consideration of the commissioners, was to be debarred from alteration? Whoever built a house and adhered so rigidly to the original plan? It would be matter for subsequent consideration whether, if they adopted the interior arrangements of the plan of another architect, it would not be consonant to the liberality of parliament to assign him a reward. The question now before the House was not, whether they should finally resolve to adopt Mr. Barry's plan, but simply whether they should declare the whole proceedings that had yet been taken, null. Perhaps some hon. gentlemen might think that they were acting under an implied engagement with Mr. Barry. To put an end to any doubt on this point, he would read a communication addressed to that gentleman by the committee, explicitly stating their views of the matter. The letter intimated, that the committee were not satisfied on the head of expense, and before any part of the building could be commenced, or any vote proposed to parliament, the most minute and correct estimate possible must be furnished, on the understanding, at the same time, that this estimate would not, in the slightest degree, bind the committee to the ultimate adoption of the plan. The committee wished to know what Mr. Barry would consider an adequate remuneration for preparing the necessary specifications, but stated, at the same time, that this must be kept perfectly distinct from the consideration whether the plans were to be ultimately adopted or not, and what should be the rate of remuneration to be allowed. No engagement could have been entered into with Mr. Barry; there was only a prima facie presumption that his plan was entitled to the preference. If the estimate drawn up on more accurate consideration, should be found greatly to exceed the original amount, it would be perfectly open for them to consider whether they would adopt it. The question was, whether they would extinguish all former proceedings in this matter, and invite a new competition, or allow Mr. Barry to proceed with his detailed estimate. If they should consent to annul all former proceedings, his belief was, that they would strike a fatal blow at the principle of competition. They would postpone the execution of a great national work for an indefinite period, and they would teach the most eminent of living architects to rue the day when, in compliance with their invitation, they sent in plans which had the misfortune to be entitled to the preference.

Motion negatived.

TITHES AND CHURCH (IRELAND.)—LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

August 2, 1836.

The Order of the Day for the consideration of the Lords' amendments on this bill having been read, Lord John Russell moved, "That the Lords' Amendments be taken into consideration that day three months."

SIR ROBERT PEEL then rose and spoke as follows: The motion with which the noble lord has concluded his speech is, of course, tantamount to the total rejection of the amendments made in the bill by the House of Lords, and necessarily amounts to a postponement, for another year, of the long-agitated question of tithes in Ireland. The noble lord has rested his opposition to the amendments of the Lords upon a double ground—first, upon his doubts whether the amendments do not interfere with the constitutional privileges of this House; and, secondly, upon the substantial merits of the case. I will follow the example of the noble lord, and consider each class of objections separately. In the first place, however, I must beg leave to remind the noble lord, that the objection, rather hinted at than expressly made by him, on the ground of interference with the constitutional privileges of this House, ought to be directly stated, and made a ground for a preliminary refusal to consider the amendments. I submit to you, Sir, that the course uniformly taken when such objections have been urged on former occasions was, that the invasion of privilege was considered a preliminary obstacle to any further proceeding with the measure; and a new bill was consequently introduced, if it was supposed possible to come to an understanding with the other House of parliament. The noble lord said, that he agreed with Mr. Pym in the declaration, that the privileges of the House of Commons were not conferred for their own benefit, but for the benefit of the country; and the noble lord added, that those privileges were not airy and unsubstantial nothings, but that whenever they were trenching upon, they ought to be resolutely defended. I call upon the noble lord to take that course. If his doubts be valid—if they can be maintained—the noble lord should urge them openly and boldly. Let him not suppose that I call upon him to take that course for the purpose of evading the discussion of the great principle involved in the question on the measure before us. If the noble lord will press his objection on the score of invasion of the constitutional privileges of the House, and the House should on that account refuse to take the amendments into consideration, I pledge myself that I will move for leave to bring in a bill similar to the present in its amended shape. Thus we should attain the double object of supporting our privileges, and discussing the question of Irish tithes on its own ground. If, as the noble lord said, our privileges are not airy and unsubstantial nothings—if, where they are trenching upon, they ought to be vindicated—let me tell the noble lord that it is not fair for a member of this House to "hint dislike, and hesitate a doubt" upon such a subject in his speech, when he ought to place upon record the nature of his objections. My view of this question is confirmed by high authority—that of Mr. Hatsell. I agree with the noble lord, as I said before, that we should be jealous of our privileges, and neither upon this nor any other occasion, permit an infraction of them; but, at the same time, we should be cautious not lightly to advance the pretensions of privilege, and then abandon them. Mr. Hatsell says:—"From the beginning of the present century, a period of above fourscore years, the claim of the House of Commons to their rights and privileges in matters of supply, have been seldom, or but faintly, controverted by the Lords. The rules which they have from time to time laid down to be observed in bills of aid, or in bills imposing charges and burthens upon the people, have been very generally acquiesced in; and the practice of both Houses of Parliament has been uniformly adapted to these rules. It may, perhaps, be difficult to express with precision and correctness the doctrine which is to be collected out of these precedents; but, as far as my observation has gone, I think the following propositions contain pretty nearly every thing which has at any time been claimed by the Commons upon this subject:—First, that in bills of aid and supply, as the Lords cannot begin them, so they cannot make any alterations, either as to the quantum of the rate, or the disposition of it, or, indeed, any amendment whatsoever, except in correcting verbal or literal mistakes; and even these the House of Commons direct to be entered especially in their journals, that the nature of the amendments may appear; and that no argument prejudicial to their privileges may be hereafter drawn from their having agreed to such amendments. Secondly, that in bills which are not for the special grant of supply, but which, however, impose burthens upon the people, such as bills for turnpike roads, for navigations, for paving, for managing the poor, &c., for which tolls and rates must be collected. In these, though the Lords may make amendments, these amendments must not make any alteration in the quantum of the toll or rate, in the disposition or duration of it, or in the persons, commissioners, or collectors appointed to manage it. In all the other parts and clauses of these bills, not relative to any of these matters, the Commons have not objected to the Lords making alterations or amendments. Thirdly, where the bill, or the amendments made by the Lords, appear to be of a nature which, though not immediately, yet in their consequence, will bring a charge upon the people, the Commons have denied the right of the Lords such amendments, and the Lords have acquiesced. And, lastly, the Commons assert that the Lords have no right to insert in a bill pecuniary penalties or forfeitures, or to alter the pecuniary forfeitures which have been inserted by the Commons. These rules, with respect to the passing or amending of bills, are clear, distinct, and easy to be understood and applied in all the cases which may occur. It has been sometimes attempted to extend this claim on the part of the Commons still further; or rather so to construe this claim, as to tend very much to embarrass the proceedings of the House of Lords upon bills sent from the Commons. This has never appeared to me a prudent measure; I think the House of Commons may rest satisfied with the observance of these rules, which they maintain upon the ground of ancient practice and admitted precedents. Their sole and exclusive right of beginning all aids and charges upon the people, and not suffering any alterations to be made by the Lords, is sufficiently guarded by the claims as here expressed; and it does not seem to be either for their honour or advantage to push this matter further; and, by affecting privileges which may be subjects of doubt and discussion, thereby to weaken their claim to those clear and indisputable rights which are vested in them by the constitution, and have been confirmed to them by the constant and uniform practice of parliament." I say, that upon the present occasion, it would have been infinitely better to waive any objection to the bill, on the ground of constitutional privilege, and to approach the consideration of the merits of the question—than, after urging in a speech, a claim to litigate the right of the Lords to make the amendments which they have effected, to reject the measure on its merits, and leave the public hereafter in doubt as to the nature of the course we have pursued. Do I advise acquiescence in any unjust claim urged by the Lords? By no means. I avow my readiness, if you, Sir, declare it to be your opinion, that the amendments do trench upon the privileges of this House, to bow at once to your authority. I will consent, on the ground of privilege, to reject the Lords' amendments, and then proceed to discuss the principle of the measure on its merits; but I say, do not mix up the double objection for the purpose of entrapping votes, by leading hon. members to suppose that it is necessary, in point of form, to reject the Lords' amendments. The noble lord, indeed, is furnished with objections suited to the most tender capacity; and he says to his supporters, "Choose what you please, but give us the benefit of your doubts." I ask the noble lord to concur with me in this proposition—that you, Sir, shall determine whether the amendments of the Lords do touch upon the privileges of the House or not? If you be of opinion that they do, let us vindicate our privileges—but by a more decisive mode of action than a speech even from a minister of the Crown. The noble lord founded his doubts upon the question of the invasion of privilege upon four grounds. [Lord John Russell: No.] I understood the noble lord to say so. The noble lord said, in the first place, that his doubts were excited with respect to the alteration of the amount of rent-charge from seven-tenths to three-fourths; but in a subsequent part of his speech, the noble lord discussed the policy of that alteration. The main question is, whether the measure is to be considered in the light of a supply bill?

Lord John Russell: I never wished to raise that question, but I expressed a doubt as to whether the Lords were justified in altering that part of the bill which contained a grant to the consolidated fund.

Sir Robert Peel: I certainly did not understand before, that the single point upon which the noble lord limited his doubts as to interference with the constitutional privileges of the Commons, was that of the amendments of the Lords affecting the amount of the payment to the consolidated fund. That, however, is a single point upon which we ought to have the benefit of your opinion, Mr. Speaker, before we proceed further. It is a matter of indifference to me which course the House may take; but I do not wish the discussion of the main question to be prejudiced by the introduction of another topic. If you, Sir, should be of opinion that the amended bill does encroach on the privileges of this House, I am ready, following the precedents which I have read, to act on your suggestion, and decide, on that ground, for its rejection. If, on the other hand, Mr. Speaker, you should be of opinion that no ground for doubt upon that point exists, I agree with Mr. Hatsell, that it would not be right for us to urge pretensions which we cannot support, and I will proceed to argue the substantial merits of the question. Before I call upon you, Sir, for your opinion, I will premise, that whatever may be the phraseology of the bill, I never understood, in the course of the debates which occurred upon it, that the surplus of the Irish Church revenues was to be carried to the consolidated fund, for the purpose of diminishing the burthens of the people. I heard it argued—and by no one more strenuously than by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—that the only legitimate application of that surplus was to the purposes of moral and religious instruction, and that he never would consent to appropriate it to a vote for New South Wales, for instance, or any other secular purpose whatever. If you, Sir, should be of opinion, that the grant to the consolidated fund was to be applied to the diminution of the public burthens, you will perhaps think, that our privileges have been trenched upon; if, on the other hand, you should think that the surplus was to be applied only for the purpose of moral and religious instruction, it is probable you will declare that there has been no violation of privilege. Before I proceed to consider the arguments of the noble lord, with respect to the substantial merits of the question, I think it would be a great advantage to the House if you, Sir, would favour it with your opinion on the point of privilege.

Lord John Russell: Before the Speaker delivers his opinion, I wish to state distinctly what I really did say. I said that that part of the bill which gave a portion of the tithes to the consolidated fund, might bring the question formally within the privileges of the House. I stated further, that it was my opinion the bill was not intended to grant a supply to his Majesty, and I added, that, in my opinion, the question of privilege was not distinctly raised, and that we might proceed to discuss the merits of the question.

Sir Robert Peel: I thought I heard the noble lord say, there were times in the history of our ancestors when a measure not differing much in principle from the present, was rejected by this House with indignation, on account of the amendments to which it had been subjected by the Lords. The noble lord described the manner in which the unlucky bill had been tossed by the Speaker over the table, and kicked by the members out of the doors of the House. I thought that the object of a remark of that kind was to show, that if we now were to rest satisfied with the gemitus columbae of the noble lord—with a mere whisper of disapprobation of the invasion of our privileges—a not very favourable comparison would be drawn between our constitutional jealousy and that of our ancestors. If the noble lord did not quote that example, I must have strangely misunderstood him; if he did, I cannot conceive for what purpose he did so, except to gain a vote on account of the supposed improper interference of their Lordships with our privileges.

The Speaker having submitted to the House his opinion on the subject,—

Sir Robert Peel said: If the lords had retained the clause relative to the consolidated fund, and altered it, I apprehend the bill must have been rejected, but the Lords have omitted it altogether. The bill did not contain a money grant, which is no longer to be found in it.

The Speaker: All I meant to say was this,—that the House of Commons, having made a grant of money upon the consideration of the bill being returned to them as it went up to the Lords, and that consideration not having been fulfilled, a question of privilege may thereby arise.

Sir Robert Peel: Then I think I may assume that the question is disembarrassed of the point of privilege, and that I am at liberty to address myself to the merits of the question. I now therefore approach the second and more important part of the noble lord's speech—namely, the objections which he urged on principle to the acceptance of the Lords' amendments. The subject has been so repeatedly discussed, and every argument which can be used with reference to it is so trite, that I am sure I shall consult the general wish of the House by contracting my observations within as narrow limits as possible. I beg to call the attention of the House to what the amendments made by the Lords will effect. What is the arrangement made by the joint consent of Lords and Commons, which the noble lord now proposes that we should reject? The bill brought down from the Lords, would, if we acceded to it, make this arrangement on the subject of tithes in Ireland, and the regulation of the Established Church in that country—it would deduct twenty-five per cent. from the amount of tithes composition. The bill we sent up to the Lords made a deduction of thirty per cent.; and the noble lord says he can see no reason why that proposition should not have been acceded to. I may make exactly the same observation with respect to the proposed deduction of twenty-five per cent. The matter is one which, from its very nature, will not admit of close logical deduction. We have been told, that by agreeing to make a deduction of twenty-five per cent., we have consented to the alienation of church property for the benefit of the Irish landlords, and that, therefore, it is perfectly absurd in us to object to its alienation for the purposes of general instruction. But we do not consent to the deduction of twenty-five per cent., as an alienation of church property; we consent to it as a just compensation to the landlords for taking upon themselves a new liability; and if the noble lord can prove that twenty-five per cent. is too much to allow for that purpose, and that twenty per cent. is sufficient, I will vote for a deduction of twenty instead of twenty-five per cent. Doubtless, in individual cases, benefit would result from the arrangement; but, on the other hand, there would be cases of individual hardship. It is impossible to apportion what is exactly just in every case. I think that a deduction of twenty-five per cent. from the amount of tithe composition is sufficient compensation to the landlords for assuming a new liability; and therefore I vote for that proposition in preference to that which would give them thirty per cent. The preamble of the bill which passed this House, expressly recited the ground on which the reduction of twenty-five per cent. was made. It was as follows:—

“Whereas, with a view of rendering the incomes arising from tithes more certain in amount, and more easy of collection, several Acts have been, from time to time, passed for the establishment of compositions for tithes throughout Ireland; but the interposition of parliament is necessary in reference to various circumstances peculiar to that part of the United Kingdom; and whereas it is expedient to make provision for uniting and dividing benefices, and for the altering the boundaries and regulating the incomes thereof, with a view to the better distribution of ecclesiastical duties and revenues; and whereas it is just and necessary for the establishment of peace and good order in Ireland, and conducive to religion and morality, that the said compositions for tithes shall be made payable by persons having a perpetual estate or interest in the lands subject thereto, a reasonable deduction being made upon the amount thereof in consideration of the greater facility and security of collection, arising out of such transfer of the liability to the payment thereof from the occupying tenantry to the owners of such estates or interest,” &c.

The bill, as sent down by the Lords, subjects to the payment of a rent-charge, in lieu of tithes, the landlords of Ireland, and relieves the occupying tenant from any payment on that account. The person possessed of the first estate of inheritance would henceforth be subject to the rent-charge. The bill altogether removes the chance of any collision between the ministers of the Church and the occupying tenants—nay, more; it removes the clergy from all collision with the landlord, by whom the rent charge would be paid, because it provides that a public department of the government shall, until redemption (the only means by which a complete extinction of tithes can be effected), or until parliament shall otherwise direct, collect the rent-charge. The bill also provides for the review of all cures of souls in every town and city in Ireland. It further provides that there shall be a review of all the rural parishes in Ireland in which the income of the clergyman exceeds £500, and the Protestant population falls short of 100 persons. The bill subjects the Lord-lieutenant to these restrictions, which surely cannot be considered unreasonable, that no benefice shall be increased so as to include an area of more than thirty square miles, that no rural benefice shall be increased which has already an income of £300, and that no benefice shall be reduced below £300. These are the limitations which the bill proposes to place upon the power of the Lord-lieutenant. The bill further provides that a separate fund shall be created, to be applied to these purposes, after satisfying the claims of the present incumbents—the surplus is to be applied, not to any secular purpose, but to the building of glebe-houses, and the repairing and enlarging of churches, giving the parishes from which the revenue is derived the first claim upon it. Is it unreasonable to propose that the charge of building glebe-houses should be defrayed out of the surplus of ecclesiastical revenues? The noble lord, by his bill, proposes that henceforth there shall be 1,250 benefices in Ireland, of which only 850 have glebe-houses. Thus they are, upon his own showing, 400 livings without glebe-houses in Ireland. The noble lord takes a power of appropriating glebe in any parish in which none now exists. Can there be a more legitimate application of any surplus, than that of building glebe-houses in parishes in which the minister is provided with glebe? The noble lord, in the course of his observations, depicted what must be the despair of the impoverished farmer and tenant, at hearing that a portion of the revenues of his parish was to be appropriated to the endowment of another parish in a distant town. The rule referred to applies only to rural parishes, and therefore the noble lord's case of Belfast or Dublin is not applicable. I was surprised, however, to hear from the noble lord, the author of the English Church bill, this objection to the re-distribution of ecclesiastical revenues. I thought it was universally admitted, that in cases of large benefices in Ireland, containing 8000 or 10,000 Protestants, in which the clergyman's stipend is £150 or £200 a-year, it was but reasonable to apply any surplus of ecclesiastical revenue which might arise to the augmentation of the latter. That has been the course pursued with respect to the English Church bill. I did not expect, at least, from the noble lord, such a confirmation of the objection urged against himself by the members for Durham—namely, that the legislature had no right to apply any part of the ecclesiastical revenues raised in Durham to any but Durham purposes. The noble lord, upon a former occasion, contended, that we had a right to apply any portion of the surplus of the Durham ecclesiastical revenues to increase a living in Nottingham, or any other great town, and he then felt no alarm on account of the anticipated complaints of the Durham farmers. The noble lord has referred to the omission of the appropriation clause by their lordships; but I apprehend that the main ground of that omission was the fear of touching on the privileges of this House. To preclude all doubt upon this point, I will state, for myself at least, that if the noble lord will prove the necessity for granting a sum of money to any amount for the purposes of education in Ireland, I will support it. It must, however, be distinctly understood, that any such vote will be strictly applied to the purposes of general education, upon the principles established by my noble friend, the member for North Lancashire, when secretary for Ireland. I believe the noble lord, the secretary for Ireland, has promised that there shall be strict inquiry into any alleged departure from the principles of that vote, and that the system shall not be perverted to the purposes of education in the peculiar tenets of the Roman Catholic Church. My noble friend, the member for North Lancashire, proposed that education in Ireland should be common; that since we were unable to educate the young in the principles of the Established Church, and unwilling to educate them in those of the Roman Catholic faith, we should resort to the only alternative left—an education founded upon the great principles of Christianity, without attempting to gain converts to any particular persuasion. When that proposition was made, at a time when I was in opposition to the government of which my noble friend was a member, I never hinted an objection. I knew that objections to this scheme of education were felt by many persons, and I am therefore the more anxious that the promises made to them should be rightly fulfilled. If the original purposes of the grant be strictly and inviolably preserved—if the scruples of Protestants be respected as well as those of Roman Catholics—if education be based on the fundamental principles of moral duty and the leading truths of Christianity, in which all concur, then to a vote to any amount that might be required for the purpose, I will not withhold my consent. I, however, object to look for the means of extending education in Ireland to the alienation of the ecclesiastical revenues. It was most unfair of the noble lord to apply his illustration of the poor farmer and tenant in the way he did. The question is not whether there shall or shall not be education, but from what source money shall be obtained for the diffusion of education? The noble lord advises us to reject the bill, because it has not embodied in it the principle of the resolution adopted by the House of Commons in April, 1835, which, whatever may have been its origin, had the effect, as was intended, of removing the administration of which I was the head. Is it wise to reject the admitted improvement effected by the bill for the sake of adhering to that principle? We should obtain by this bill a reduction of twenty-five per cent. in the amount of the tithe composition; the rent-charge would be imposed upon the Protestant landlord; the occupying tenant would be relieved altogether from any direct payment; we should remove the ministers of the establishment from any conflict with the tithe-payers, by enabling a department of the government to collect their revenues; we should provide for the reform of the Church of Ireland; we should ensure the review of every living without exception, the income of which is more than £500 per annum; we should ensure the review of every living in a town; we should ensure a consideration of the state of the church and the glebe-houses; and we should have it in our power to take effectual precautions against alleged abuses, against the holding of pluralities, for instance, or of benefices with exorbitant incomes attached. All those beneficial objects we should ensure if we consented to adopt the bill as it now stands. But the noble lord says, "No, I will not; and I advise the House not to consent to these improvements—I advise the House to reject the bill as it now stands, because it does not embody within itself the principle of an alienation of church property." In the first place, the noble lord says there is a surplus. I will not enter into a calculation upon that point; it has been too frequently, and, as I should have supposed, too convincingly done before; but I deny, even upon the noble lord's own showing, that there is a surplus. Give me the 1,250 livings into which Ireland is to be divided—give me that to which the noble lord says the government is pledged—namely, the 'Church Temporalities' Bill—give me the revenues you have already established for the higher orders in the church, and I say that the stipends you propose to attach to the lower clergy are totally inadequate to their proper support. But taking your 1,250 livings even with the small amount of income you propose to apportion to each, and I deny, when these have been provided for, that you will have any surplus. But even if there should be a surplus, I, for one, must protest against the mode in which it would be obtained. The noble lord says that the other House of parliament has increased the incomes of the clergy in Ireland to £300, for the purpose of preventing a surplus; but I tell the noble lord that the course he proposed to take for the purpose of ensuring a surplus, was infinitely more objectionable. Of the 1,250 benefices into which Ireland is to be divided, each will contain within itself on an average 16,000 statute acres, and each will require that the labour and exertions of the clergyman should be extended over an area of twenty-five square miles. Can I say, then, that it is reasonable or just, when I allot to a man such duties as are here to be performed, to limit the maximum of his income, supposing him to have 500 Protestant parishioners, to £200 a-year? That is the maximum assigned by the government bill. I do say, comparing the duties to be performed by an educated and intelligent man,—looking at the expenses of his education,—looking at the public advantage which will be derived from his being enabled properly to attend to the spiritual duties of a flock so dispersed, to administer to their wants in time of famine and disease,—looking to the propriety of enabling him to uphold his own station, by the exercise of charities suited to his character and calling,—I do say, when I consider all this, and compare the emoluments derived by persons embarked in any other professional pursuits requiring the same degree of education, and the same devotion of time and talent, a stipend of £200 a-year is a most inadequate provision for the incumbents of the greater number of livings in Ireland. I might press this argument if I were proposing to found a church establishment de novo; but surely it applies with tenfold force when I am speaking of a church already established, and out of the proper funds of which its clergy are to be paid. The question is not whether we shall allot to them a new means of subsistence from the Consolidated Fund, but whether, for the purpose of creating a surplus, we shall impose on ourselves the painful necessity of allotting a miserable stipend to those who now possess their incomes by as ancient a prescription as any by which the rights of property are guarded? The noble lord asks, if we reject this bill, and make ourselves responsible for the non-adjustment and non-settlement of the question, what hope can we entertain of any future satisfactory and peaceful settlement? I will tell the noble lord that I cannot entertain hopes of satisfaction or of peace, if I acquiesce in the settlement proposed by him. He must see, he must read, the declarations of many hon. members on his own side of the House; and, after seeing and hearing those declarations, is it, I would ask, rational to believe, that the Roman Catholic occupier or tenant, who is called upon to pay a sum of 5d. as a charge in lieu of tithe, will be perfectly satisfied, after un-settling the question in this manner, to pay 4d. out of the 5d. towards the maintenance of the Established Church? Does the noble lord believe, that the Roman Catholic will pay this sum with satisfaction and entire accord, because the other penny is to be devoted—to what purpose? to an immediate provision for education? No, not at all. The claim of all existing incumbents must, in the first place, be provided for. Then, is education necessarily provided for at all? Not in the least. It is from the Consolidated Fund we are to provide for education. The bill enacts that the penny shall be devoted to repay to the Consolidated Fund what we may have advanced for the purposes of education. The question is, are the rights of property, which rest upon ancient prescription, to be held secure—and is it to be believed that, if we acquiesce in the principle that the church has not a right to the property, there will not be a similar unwillingness to pay the four-fifths of the demand after the other fifth has been given up? I cannot conceive upon what ground, after having conceded this principle, we can expect such an acquiescence; it is not the amount of the sum taken from the church which I consider; that is not the chief ground of my objection; it is this—I object to any alienation on account of the objects proposed by this bill, as I conceive such an alienation to be pregnant with danger. My objections are infinitely greater to the principle of alienation, and to the mode in which it is meant to be applied, than to the amount of it. I can conceive that in some great national calamity, we might be justified in taking from men part of their property, against the usual course of law. In time of war there have been forced contributions—the inhabitants of a town may have been required to pay a specific portion of their property; that may be a hardship and an injustice; but when the demand is limited and definite, and the remainder is left clearly and unquestionably the property of its owner, then we have at least this protection, that the tyrant's plea—an overruling necessity—has been the only justification which could be offered for the alienation, and that until such a necessity again occur, there will be no repetition of such an act. But here no necessity is pleaded; the sum of £50,000 which is required, may be taken from some other source. Here, contrary to the case of a forced contribution, no specific demand is made; you do not say to the church, we require from you a sum of £50,000 or £100,000 a-year, and the occupier shall still continue to regulate his own concerns and possess the remainder of his property, but you lay it down as a principle, that, after providing for the spiritual wants of the Protestant population of Ireland, the whole of the remainder shall be delivered up to the people of Ireland. In what position do you then place that portion of these revenues which is to provide for the spiritual wants of the Protestant population of Ireland? Who is to estimate the amount that will be required to provide for these spiritual wants? The amount will vary with every administration. It may vary with every majority. The present administration consider £300,000 sufficient for this purpose, and that the remaining £60,000 or £75,000 ought to be devoted to purposes of education. The moment that the rights of property are disturbed, there is no knowing where we can stop. I contend not against the amount proposed to be alienated, so much as I do against the principle its alienation establishes, which affects, as I think, the independence of the Church of Ireland, by subjecting it to the control of a committee of the Privy-council, who are indefinite in number, and holding office at the will of the Lord-lieutenant. I will say, that my main objection is to the principle involved in the bill, to the nature of the dependence which it establishes, and to the perfectly undefined nature of the demand it authorizes. The noble lord (John Russell) says, that he relies much on the force of popular opinion in support of this measure. As far as we have had any means of ascertaining the bias of public opinion, since the question was discussed in 1835, it is not in confirmation of the noble lord's assertion. The government is in office, and whatever influence office confers is in favour of the principle. There have been several vacancies in the representation, and I will ask, Have the constituencies decided in favour of this principle? We have had attempts at the settlement of the tithe question in Ireland, supported by vast majorities in the House of Lords. We have had the same attempts supported by a powerful minority in the House of Commons, approaching, within twenty-six on the last occasion, to the majority which decided in favour of this principle. The opinions of the two branches of the legislature are therefore divided, and the opinions of the two parties in the House of Commons very nearly approximate. We have had since that principle has been embodied in the resolution adopted by the House, independent of vacancies on account of office—we have had thirty-one vacancies in this House. When that resolution was voted in April, 1835, the occupiers of those thirty-one seats, if my recollection be correct, voted in favour of the principle in the proportion of twenty-one to ten, being more than a clear double. If I mistake not, the representatives of these thirty-one seats having been changed, did, on the last, or would on the present occasion, vote in the proportion of sixteen to fifteen. Thus, they are as nearly as possible, equal, instead of remaining more than double. I do not think, therefore, considering these indications of public opinion by the intervening elections—considering that this bill, which we all must admit to be a great improvement of the present system, is sent down to us from the House of Lords—and considering that it is in consonance with the opinions of a very powerful minority in this House, a minority approaching, in point of number, within twenty-six of the number which voted for the settlement of this question on another basis, I cannot see the full force of the exultation of the noble lord, that we are bound in honour—that the majority is bound in honour—to an adherence to the former principle embodied in the resolution, and to reject this attempt at a settlement, because it does not contain all that that majority voted for. Is there anything embodied in this bill which calls upon hon. members opposite to express opinions in direct contradiction to the principle of their own resolution? Are we called to retract those principles? This bill does much good—as much as is found to be possible. Are we, then, prepared to reject it because it does not go further? The noble lord does not in general act in conformity with a doctrine so prejudicial; he considers it compatible with sound policy, not being able to effect all the good he desires, to grasp at what is offered, and to leave for future discussion what he cannot now obtain. Why, then, do not hon. members opposite take the same course? If they do not think that there will be a clear surplus,—if they doubt that any surplus will exist for many years,—why should they insist upon the practical enforcement of the principle of appropriation? They should rather consent to attain a great degree of practical good, not assenting to the abandonment of the principle of appropriation, but reserving the practical enforcement of that principle to a future occasion, when the necessity of settling the question may arrive. If there be not any surplus, and if the occasion for the practical enforcement of the principle have not arrived, is it, I would ask, consistent with the policy of prudent and wise statesmen to reject attainable good, because the shadow of some future good cannot be obtained? I object to come to such a resolution. But it is said, that the House is pledged to reject this measure, as it does not embody the principle of the resolution which it has adopted, unless we are at the same time prepared to reject that resolution. We have had many warnings of the danger of establishing abstract principles before the time comes for their practical enforcement. But hon. gentlemen will make their vote on this question, not one of practical consideration, but the consideration of a point of honour! I know that amongst honourable men this is a point sometimes much more insuperable and difficult than the consideration of what is right. I protested against the resolution at that time, as shutting out the means of retreat, as depriving us of an opportunity of considering what, under present circumstances, is the best course to be pursued; and I must say, that my subsequent experience has only confirmed the truth of the objections I then took. The noble lord (John Russell) contends that the settlement of the question, as provided for by this bill, will be for the benefit of the Church of Ireland, and I consider that in passing this bill we shall be giving a security for the collection of the revenue of the church. The noble lord has also reminded us of the American war, and of the concessions consequent thereon, then made to the inhabitants of the United States; but the question to be considered is, whether the same principle which dictated these concessions applies in the present instance? Either the demand is in itself reasonable and just, and ought to be conceded—or, if not reasonable and just, then the analogy from former concessions does not arise. When the noble lord (Russell) was asked to consent to repeal the Union, he was told that public opinion in Ireland was in favour of that repeal—that the cause of Catholic emancipation had been carried by public opinion—and that the repeal of the Union would be effected in the same way. The noble lord considered whether or not the demand was reasonable and just, and whether, unless he acquiesced in the demand, the same system of agitation would be again pursued. The noble lord found that this concession was not demanded by the people, and he resisted it. But the noble lord says that this bill is for the benefit of the church. The noble lord's opinions do not meet with the concurrence of the high authorities who are combined with him in the administration. Last year, when this bill was brought forward in the House of Lords by the chief of the government, that noble lord did not urge the acquiescence of the House of Lords in that bill, on the ground that it gave additional security to the church. My noble friend, the member for North Lancashire (Lord Stanley), has quoted a passage from the speech of the noble Viscount (Melbourne), of which the noble lord opposite (John Russell) seemed to doubt the correctness, but that speech was revised and corrected. It has never been denied but in juxtaposition with the opinion of the noble lord (John Russell) as to the security which this measure added to the Church of Ireland, and partially in vindication of the grounds he had taken;—I will repeat that passage from the speech of the noble Viscount (Melbourne). It is as follows:—"I am deeply sensible and much concerned at the impression which I feel this measure is likely to make. I cannot conceal from myself that it will, in the first instance, and for a certain time, be a heavy blow and a great discouragement to Protestantism in Ireland, and that also it will be a great triumph to the adverse party. I admit that for an interval of time there must be great alarm and danger, which must necessarily attend and accompany such mighty and fundamental changes, and that shocks and convulsions must occur, which may render doubtful the safety not only of the established church, but of the constitution itself." And seeing the soreness which the bill caused with respect to the Protestant Church—seeing that the removal of the civil disabilities, so far from rooting up prejudices, has not increased the security of the church—I greatly doubt the justice or the policy of giving this "heavy blow to Protestantism in Ireland." If that blow be inevitable, this I know, that we shall be much more likely to take some security against its prejudicial effect by resisting the cause of it, and standing erect to meet it, than by giving it vigour with our own arms. If that heavy blow must be given, my hand at least shall not impel it. If the cheer of adverse triumph must be raised, our voices shall not swell the shout. If the pillars of the church and the stability of the constitution itself must be shaken and convulsed, then, seeing no necessity for this injustice, I protest against the policy of it, and refuse to be a party to it. I move, as an amendment, "That the Lords' amendments be now taken into consideration."

After a long discussion, the House divided on the original question, which was agreed to. Consideration of the amendments postponed for three months. On the 20th of August, Parliament was prorogued till Thursday the 20th of October.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE KING'S SPEECH.

JANUARY 31, 1837.

Mr. Ashford Sanford moved the adoption of an Address in reply to his Majesty's speech at the opening of the Session.

SIR ROBERT PEELE spoke as follows :—I think I am justified in inferring, that it was the intention of his Majesty's speech, or rather of the address, to avoid provoking, on the first day of the session, any lengthened—at least any acrimonious—discussion on the matters to which it refers. Various topics are alluded to—topics which must demand our attention; but I observe in the address an avoidance—I think a studious avoidance—of any pledge with respect to that course which we shall take in regard to those topics. I rejoice, therefore, in being able to give my assent to the address—at least to give so far my assent to the address as not to feel myself under the least obligation to move any amendment to it. I think that is the proper course to be pursued on the first day of the session. I think, considering the short opportunity that there is for those who are in opposition to the king's government, or who have not access to the speech before it is delivered, to know what are the topics introduced into it, that it is infinitely fairer to indicate the topics to which our attention will be called during the session, without calling upon us for any premature pledge as to the course we shall pursue, and which we are not prepared to give. If the practice which has been adhered to for the last twenty or thirty years should be departed from, and if on the first day of the session we should be invited to enter into any acrimonious discussion, or be called upon to assent to any premature propositions, then that custom which formerly simultaneously prevailed, of making known the king's speech and the nature of its propositions two or three days before it was delivered, ought certainly to be adhered to also. As it is not necessary for me to move an amendment, and as it appears to me to be the prevailing wish of hon. members—judging from the conversation which has been going on amongst them during the many speeches that have been delivered, and which conversation I am sorry to say, notwithstanding the reform that has been made in our edifice, has been to me as audible as in former days—believing, I say, that it is the wish of the House to avoid a lengthened discussion, I shall, in conformity to that wish, and seeing no advantage in any preliminary or partial discussions upon important matters which are shortly to occupy our attention, imitate the reserve of the speech itself, and follow the example of those who have preceded me—claiming for myself the right of hereafter discussing unfettered, and without any pledge, all the topics alluded to in the speech—and shall avoid saying anything which can provoke discussion on the present occasion. The only amendment which has been offered to our notice, relating to a matter which must have provoked much discussion, has been withdrawn; and the only comments which have been made on the speech are those which fell from the hon. member for Derbyshire (Mr. Gisborne), who was surprised that so much of the speech was occupied with what referred to joint-stock banks. That observation convinced me that the hon. gentleman had never been in a cabinet council, because when a cabinet council was held to draw up a king's speech, which must occupy a certain time in the delivery, but which at the same time must be so framed as to avoid discussion, the question of joint-stock banks was one of the most prominent that could be selected. But if the hon. gentleman will look at the terms in which that subject is treated of, all anxiety on his part, I think, would be removed; for he may safely rest on this announcement, that “the best security against mismanagement of banking affairs must ever be found in the capacity and integrity of those who are intrusted with the administration of them.” I suppose this does not refer to the mental capacity, but to the solvency of the parties; or the term “capacity” may be taken in a double sense, and include the substantial as well as the intellectual vigour of the parties. The pledge, however, which the hon. gentleman shrinks from is this—“But no legislative regulation should be omitted which can increase and ensure the stability of establishments upon which commercial credit so much depends.” If he therefore thinks, that no legislative regulation can increase and ensure the stability of establishments upon which commercial credit depends, he may feel himself safe as far as concerns the pledges contained in that part of the address. The only topic to which I shall refer is that which relates to our foreign policy, and this not with a view of provoking any discussion—not with a view (as I wish to avoid discussion) of condemning it, but only to reserve to myself the same power with respect to our foreign policy as I have already done with reference to our domestic policy, namely, that of being unfettered by any pledge to what may in a future discussion seem to me to be open to objection. The expression I allude to in the speech is this:—"His Majesty laments that the civil contest which has agitated the Spanish monarchy has not yet been brought to a close; but his Majesty has continued to afford to the Queen of Spain that aid which, by the treaty of quadruple alliance of 1834, his Majesty engaged to give if it should become necessary; and his Majesty rejoices that his co-operating force has rendered useful assistance to the troops of her Catholic Majesty." I recognise the fair claim of the Queen of Spain to the sympathies of this country. The Queen of Spain is the ally of this country. She was recognised by the government of this country with which I was connected, as the legitimate Queen of Spain, before the quadruple alliance. I reserve the expression of my opinion with respect to the policy of that quadruple alliance. But there are two questions perfectly distinct; first, whether the engagement which we have entered into ought or ought not to have been entered into; and next, whether that engagement being entered into, and the national faith pledged to it, ought that treaty to be faithfully and honourably fulfilled? I say it ought. I say that the question as to the original policy of this country entering into that treaty, is entirely distinct from the question as to the practical execution of it. It is true, as the noble lord opposite on a former occasion stated, that the Duke of Wellington and myself, during the short period the administration of the country was in our hands, while expressing serious doubts as to the policy of the original engagement entered into by that treaty, yet felt ourselves bound, not merely technically to adhere to the letter of the treaty, but earnestly to see it executed in the spirit in which it was conceived. His Majesty informs us, that he "has continued to afford to the Queen of Spain that aid which, by the treaty of quadruple alliance of 1834, his Majesty engaged to give if it should become necessary." I can say, with perfect truth, that I heard with satisfaction that the king had given that aid to the Queen of Spain, which he had stipulated to give her if it should become necessary. I must also say, if this country, in the execution of a treaty, the original policy of which I may condemn, does afford aid, that when that aid, whether of British seamen or British soldiers, is given, I never can refuse my sympathy to those gallant men, nor fail to rejoice in their success. But the expression of the address is, "we rejoice that his Majesty's co-operating force has rendered useful assistance to the troops of her Catholic Majesty." Now, I take it for granted that the object of the king's speech was to state to us this—"I stipulated to give a certain force; I have given that force, and that force has been successful." The force we stipulated to give was a naval force. The granting the assistance of a naval force, evidently does not admit us to interfere with respect to any civil dissensions, or any internal constitutional questions, which a stipulation to grant a military force would seem to imply. And, therefore, I take it for granted that this part of the speech is literally correct, and that the aid given has been in conformity with the treaty, and nothing more; that it has been that naval force which we stipulated to give. Because, although I agree that that treaty ought to be executed in a generous spirit, yet I still shall on the strongest grounds protest against any construction being given to that treaty which the terms of it do not warrant, and against our being involved, beyond the obligations of that treaty, in the internal dissensions of the Spanish nation. I think that is the prevailing opinion of the majority of this House; and that we ought to watch with the utmost care and circumspection—whatever our opinions may be about monarchical or democratic governments—that a dangerous principle and precedent be not established; but which must be the result, if we once begin to adopt a system of interference with the internal quarrels and dissensions of other countries. Who can undertake to limit the application of that principle to a question of constitutional government, if we establish a precedent of which despotic countries may avail themselves? They may say they have as much right to interfere with the civil dissensions of Spain for the purpose of maintaining arbitrary government, as we have for maintaining constitutional government; and then there would be an end to the peace and repose of Europe. Such may be the consequence of our setting a bad example, by extending the limits of the treaty for the purpose of involving ourselves in these internal dissensions. Therefore I give my assent to that portion of the address, assuming that the statements of it are in strict conformity with the treaty, and that the co-operating force referred to may merely be considered that naval force which we undertook to give. It is impossible to look to the very next paragraph of the speech without deriving a useful lesson as to the danger of our interfering with the civil matters of other countries. The paragraph I allude to refers to Portugal. In 1837 we express our regret that "events have happened in Portugal which for a time threatened to disturb the internal peace of that country." In 1834 (three years previous), after our influence, or, as it was called, moral influence, had been completely successful in effecting a revolution and establishing the present dynasty in Portugal, what were the terms in which his present Majesty addressed this House?—"I have derived the most sincere and lively satisfaction from the termination of the civil war which had so long distracted the kingdom of Portugal; and I rejoice to think that the treaty, which the state of affairs in Spain and in Portugal induced me to conclude with the King of the French, the Queen Regent of Spain, and the Regent of Portugal, and which has already been laid before you, contributed materially to produce this happy result." That happy result! But in 1837 we are aware of the fact that we have, I believe, six sail of the line in the Tagus, after that happy result has been produced, for the purpose of what?—for the purpose of defending the Queen of that country from possible personal attack on the part of her own subjects; and also for the very laudable object of doing what?—of rescuing the English residing there from the dangers with which they are threatened. Now, is that the happy result of our interference? Six sail of the line is a considerable force; either, therefore, that country is unsettled, or English life and property are in danger. Either one or the other, or both, is the case. I take the simple facts, and then I ask, is not that a conclusive proof that, after all our interference, we have not obtained a single object—neither that of establishing the government of the queen, nor of increasing English influence in Portugal? But I will put aside the question of principle altogether, and ask you to look only as a matter of experience to what this ought to teach us as to our future policy. What is the advantage we have gained in Portugal? How ought we to reason, from the result of our policy with respect to that country, as to the probable issue of our conduct with regard to Spain, when we consider that, some three or four years after his Majesty's government had pronounced eulogiums on the happy result of our policy in establishing the government of the Queen of Portugal through the influence of our arms, she is unable to command the affections of her subjects, while England has no alternative but that of again resorting to force, and of, in fact, becoming responsible for the civil government of that country? One main object we had hoped to realise from the quadruple treaty was, to be on terms of good understanding with France. But if what the hon. gentleman (Dr. Bowring) has stated be true, it is evident that the object of that treaty—namely, the formation of an intimate union with France—has not been realised. I will not longer detain the House, but reserving to myself the right of considering hereafter the whole policy, domestic and foreign, alluded to in the speech, I again say that I give my assent to those paragraphs in the address which I have particularly mentioned. I do so because I think the Queen of Spain—I avow it—is fairly and fully entitled to our sympathy, and to an honourable performance of the engagement which we have entered into with her; and as this honourable engagement has called for the active interference of a British force, I cannot withhold my expression of admiration at the gallantry of my countrymen, and that, as they have interfered, I rejoice that their interference has been successful.

Motion for the address agreed to.

JOINT STOCK BANKS.

FEBRUARY 6, 1837.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer having moved for the renewal of the Committee on Joint Stock Banks,—Mr. Hume moved as an amendment, "That there be an inquiry into the state of banking, and the causes for the changes of the circulation since 1833."

SIR ROBERT PEEL felt it his duty to support the motion of the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was certainly of great importance to the commercial and banking interests of the country, that Parliament should at an early period of the session pronounce a decisive opinion as to whether or no it could interfere with them, by proposing any new restrictions on joint-stock banks; and if Parliament decided that it could so interfere, it ought to make known with as little delay as possible what would be the nature of those restrictions, because the very suspense of the question was pregnant with almost as much evil as unwise legislation upon it could be. A committee had been appointed, witnesses had been examined, but the committee had informed the world that it had not time to conclude its inquiries, and therefore it proposed to renew its inquiries; and now the consequence was, that no one could determine that he might safely enter into a connexion with any banking establishment—not because his prospects of the new regulations might materially affect his speculation, but he would be unwilling to engage in it while such an inquiry was pending. It was, therefore, highly necessary that Parliament should, without delay, decide what could be done, and what it intended to do. He was, therefore, unwilling to devolve on the committee more than was necessary for the object of inquiry: if the inquiry were to be carried out into every branch of banking affairs, and into the minutiae of the currency question, they might go on ad infinitum. If they were to appoint a committee to investigate the operations of the whole of the English banks, the Irish banks, the Scotch banks, public banks, private banks, joint-stock banks, and all the various banks in the kingdom, there would be no end to the inquiry, there would be no one subject settled, and no pretext would be wanting for postponing a decision. Therefore, while he was for a full inquiry into the subject, he would have it limited to a special object. There were two propositions before the House besides the original motion. There was the proposition of the hon. member for Middlesex to multiply the objects of inquiry; and there was the proposition of the hon. member for Derbyshire, which went to deny the right of the House to make any inquiry into the subject at all. To neither of those propositions could he give his consent. He had already stated the reasons which induced him to oppose the motion of the hon. member for Middlesex. To the principle involved in the proposition of the hon. member for Derbyshire he could by no means agree. The hon. member for Derbyshire contended, that as it was generally allowed that Parliament ought not to attempt to instruct or control persons, generally, in the management of their own business, so it ought not to interfere with the management of joint-stock banks. But the cases were widely different. Parliament had already interfered with reference to joint-stock banks, and having so interfered, it was entitled to carry that interference further. If the persons who were engaged in joint-stock banks were to be considered the best judges of the manner of carrying on their own business, why had Parliament restricted them in various ways? Why were they prohibited from issuing five-shillings or half-crown notes? The moment that Parliament interfered with them in one respect, it acquired the right or contracted the obligation to interfere with them in any other respect in which such interference might be considered advantageous to the public. No one could deny, not only the right, but the sound policy and justice of acting on this principle. For instance, could any man doubt that the recent transactions of the Northern and Central Banking Company justified an inquiry into the nature of those transactions? Where a company had been invested by the legislature with the power of coinage, or with the power of issuing money—a power affecting the interest not merely of the shareholders, but of those who took their notes—and when that company was found to have made an application to the Bank of England, and to have declared that they should be ruined unless the bank advanced them a hundred thousand pounds, surely that was a very different transaction from a speculation in sugar or tobacco. The moment that the legislature devolved upon any body of men the power of issuing money (a power absolutely regal in its character), that moment it acquired the right of taking care that the interests of those whom such a proceeding affected, should be protected. The hon. gentleman opposite said, that no one could doubt the disinterested and judicious conduct of the directors of the joint-stock banks. He doubted it. He had not so much confidence in their wisdom as the hon. gentleman had. The hon. gentleman opposite had spoken of two banks that had been well conducted. But could the regulations observed by those two banks be enforced on others? Look at the report of last year, and let any man say whether he could place implicit confidence in the sagacity of joint-stock banks. It appeared that the managers of one of them stated, that every year they had large dividends, they had great profits, but though they had bad debts to the amount of £20,000 or £30,000, they never took any account of them, and their shares were at a premium of ten per cent. How did that state of things arise? By the power which Parliament had conferred upon the parties. The difficulty which private banks felt in conducting their business proved that fact. He would not say any thing of the wisdom of that course, but having given such a power virtually or directly, legally or practically, they ought to inquire into the operation of it. Then, another hon. gentleman had gone to the other extreme; he had said that all inquiries were good, and, so far from denying to Parliament the right of inquiry, he was for carrying it to the fullest extent. While one hon. gentleman deprecated all inquiry, the other wished to have an inquiry into everything, not excluding the affairs of the Bank of England itself. Now, with regard to the conduct of the Bank of England, as far as its relations to the government were concerned, that had been recently the subject of two inquiries. He recollected sitting on a committee, three years since, day after day, which was appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the whole of the transactions of the Bank of England as far as they related to the government, and, in consequence of that inquiry, the bank charter was extended, and he apprehended that no man intended to propose to revise the bank charter. But they had a right to ascertain in what manner it would be affected by the subject of inquiry. Even then, there would be no necessity, he would venture to say, to go into that part of the operations of the Bank of England which related to the government, or any of its operations, only so far as joint-stock banks were concerned. If, in course of investigation, it should be stated, that the Bank of England, and not the joint-stock banks, had caused certain evils, then it would be difficult for the Bank of England to resist any further inquiry as to the truth of that statement. The permission to joint-stock banks to pay in Bank of England paper instead of gold, might be very proper and profitable or not, but, as far as the inquiry had gone, that question did not appear to have been put. That might be because the committee had not sufficiently performed its duty, or had not thought it necessary to inquire. [Mr. Hume had himself put the question to a witness, who had objected to it.] If such a question were put and objected to, nobody could deny the power of the committee to enforce an inquiry into the subject. The question was not, whether the power given to joint-stock banks to pay in Bank of England paper diminished or extended credit, but whether it had not a tendency to increase the danger to credit, and whether the evil concomitant with making fluctuations in the value of money, was not a greater evil than the facility of doing it could be beneficial? Although he must contend that every relation of the Bank of England with joint-stock banks must be, as far as necessity required, intruded upon, he should vote for the original motion, dissenting, as he did, from both amendments. The hon. and learned member for Kilkenny reopened the whole question; but the bill of 1819 had been so often discussed, that he should decline entering upon it on this occasion. He should only refer to one position which the hon. and learned gentleman had taken up, namely, that it was very wise in times of prosperity to look forward to times of difficulty and danger. He would just remark that the evils, if evils had arisen, were not to be attributed to the bill of 1819. If they chose to have a large quantity of convertible paper, and then to have a metallic standard, whether gold or silver, or both conjointly, they could not have a large mass of paper converted into a metallic standard without the risk of a reaction. But the reaction that followed the bill of 1819 was not the effect of that bill, but of the foreign exchanges, and, whatever might be the present prosperity, or the future adversity, they were bound to look at the foreign exchanges; and if they did, they could not help looking out for the time of possible danger. If the hon. gentleman meant to have a paper currency to an indefinite extent, and not to have it convertible at all, then, perhaps, there would be no necessity for his looking out for times of danger. But even then his hope of eternal prosperity would be very delusive, for there would be a progressive rise in prices, and a progressive decrease of trade, so that not looking out for danger would not be the way to avoid it. With regard to the evils of the bill of 1819, he never denied the extent of individual distress occasioned by it, and he had never contemplated that distress without regretting the serious injuries that ensued; but he thought the system which rendered that bill necessary, and not the bill itself, ought to be made responsible for those evils. He did not believe any measure was ever proposed which was so conducive to the comfort of the labouring classes, as that

The House divided on the original motion :—Ayes, 121 ; Noes, 42 ; majority, 79.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND).

FEBRUARY 8, 1837.

In the adjourned debate on Lord John Russell's motion, for leave to bring in a bill for the regulation of Municipal Corporations in Ireland,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, I should infer, Sir, that, as it is not intended to take the division in this stage of the proceedings, it might suit the general convenience that the debate should be brought to a close. If I am wrong in that impression, I am perfectly ready to give way to what may be the prevailing opinion respecting the adjournment. But if the general wish is that this debate should be brought to a close, I am ready so far to give effect to that wish, as to make now the few observations which I have to make. I say the few observations, because I am almost ashamed to rise after the speech of my right hon. friend who sits on my left hand, and after that attempt at a reply heard from a minister of the Crown. I know and I respect the ability of that right hon. gentleman—and what inference do I draw from his failure? Not that his powers have deserted him, but that he felt the utter impossibility of contending with the speech which he followed, but which he did not attempt to answer. I have been rather surprised by the course which this debate has taken. His Majesty called our attention, in the Speech from the Throne, to the state of Ireland. He especially commanded the commissioners to bring under our notice the state of Ireland, and the wisdom of adopting all such measures as may improve the condition of that part of the United Kingdom. His Majesty recommended an early consideration, in the same sentence, of three great measures—the constitution of the municipal body in Ireland, the question of the church, and the question of the application of poor-laws to Ireland. And when the noble lord intimated to us that he did not intend, in moving for leave to bring in the Municipal Bill, to confine himself to the discussion of the abstract merits of that question, but would enter into the general question of the state of Ireland, I took it for granted it was his intention to take a comprehensive view of the condition of that country, and to afford us an outline of each of the three great measures alluded to in his Majesty's speech. What, however, was the course which the noble lord the leader of the House of Commons took on opening the subject? He fixed on a resolution which had been passed by a body of gentlemen, in Dublin, who had met to petition parliament. He concealed from us every thing which he intended with respect to the church—he concealed from us every thing which he intended with respect to poor-laws—but he provoked a discussion on the 14th resolution, which had been come to by a number of gentlemen who thought they might with safety exercise the humble privilege of petition. He knew the petition was to be presented to the House—for that appeared on the face of the resolution—but he would hardly wait till it was signed, before he made an attack on it. He knew that the proper time for making any charges with respect to those resolutions was when the petition should be presented; but he took the opportunity of introducing the Municipal Bill, to accuse those who had attended the meeting, but who were not yet prepared with a petition, of making charges against the ministry, which they shrunk from supporting in their places in parliament. The noble lord had received an answer which he little expected. "You deal in general, in vague declamation," said the noble lord; "no facts have you to mention, not one: I challenge you to come forward with the details, and I will brand you with disgrace, unless you produce your facts." Well, four hours did not elapse before the discussion became very inconvenient; and then the House was told, that it would be infinitely better to confine themselves to the great question, which was the proper object of our debate—that the detail of small facts was more inconvenient than a statement of general principles—and we were implored to return to that which was the legitimate subject for our consideration, viz., the Municipal Bill. There were facts in abundance. The resolution complained of was this—that patronage had been so applied, and the prerogative of mercy so exercised, as to shake confidence in the administration of justice. Well, the facts were brought forward, by which that general allegation was supported, and a tender was made by those who did bring them forward, to prove them before any tribunal which the House of Commons should choose to appoint. It was said, "We assert that persons have been placed in a situation, who, however respectable in private life—who, however eminent in certain attainments of a lawyer—have still not that professional standing which entitled them to be placed over the heads of other barristers of superior qualifications; and the consequence of that undue advancement has been, that in a situation of the utmost importance—more important than the ostensibly responsible situation of Attorney or Solicitor general, because the influence is greater, the attendance is more constant, and the duties more unseen,—in that situation of confidential advice, has been placed an individual who has taken an active part in the association now existing in Ireland." That was one fact; and it was offered to establish it before a Select Committee, fairly and impartially constituted. "A Select Committee!" say they; "Oh no—you cannot have a Select Committee; these things are not fit for inquiry before a Select Committee. Move an impeachment; an impeachment is the only course." What! an impeachment to inquire whether, in discharging by wholesale prisoners from gaol, Lord Mulgrave has exercised wisely the prerogative of mercy?—to inquire whether Mr. Pigott was, under all the circumstances, a proper individual to be appointed confidential adviser at the Castle? Let me ask, is there no possibility of questioning any act of a minister of the Crown, or of a member of the government, but by going through the cumbersome process of an impeachment? Must the noble lord, the Lord-lieutenant of Ireland, or the noble lord the Secretary for that country, be put on the footing of a Strafford or a Laud, or will he not condescend to answer the objections that may be made to his conduct? It must surely be by a Select Committee, and not by impeachment, that we can inquire whether Lord Oxm Newtown appointed Mr. Cassidy to the magistracy prior to or subsequently to the occurrences which induced Lord de Vesey not to recommend him to the commission of the peace for the Queen's county. Do you mean to resist the inquiry into these facts? Do you mean, after resting this debate on the 14th or 24th resolution that was come to at the meeting in Dublin—do you mean, after saying, "Those allegations and vituperations are unfair, and let us have facts—facts with which we can deal, and to which we can reply"—do you mean, after this, to turn round and tell us, that "Nothing but impeachment will do: we are so convinced of the high dignity of our situation, that we will yield to nothing but an impeachment; nothing short of an impeachment will satisfy us?" Why did not the noble lord take the most statesman-like course of entering on the state of Ireland?—[Lord John Russell: I did so.]—Yes; but the state of Ireland into which the noble lord entered, was that from which the church question was excluded—was that from which the question of poor-laws was excluded. The noble lord's performance was an improvement on the provincial performance of which we have heard; for it was the play of Hamlet with both the parts of Hamlet and Ophelia omitted. You tell us, because we refuse to apply the same principle to Ireland, in respect of municipal institutions, that we have applied to England, that we are inflicting wrong, and offering insult to the people of Ireland. Now, let me ask you, do you intend to apply that rule to the other measures? Do you, having made certain laws with respect to the Church of England—do you, having passed an Act of Parliament which granted the incorporation of the Church of Ireland with the Church of England—do you mean to apply the identical principle of legislation to the Church of Ireland, which you have applied to the Church of England? If you do not, on what ground do you refuse? Is it not that there is a peculiarity of circumstances—is it not that there is a peculiarity in the state of society in Ireland, which justifies the application to that country of a different principle? If that be true with respect to the church—if it be not an insult to Ireland to apply different principles on account of different circumstances—let me tell you, you are not to take it for granted that a refusal to acknowledge an identity with regard to another measure is an insult to the people. Do you mean to apply the same principles to Ireland as you have acted on in England, with respect to the poor-laws? That is an important subject, affecting the interests, the sympathies, and feelings of as great a number of human beings as the Municipal Corporations Reform, or almost any other political question which can be mooted. The law of England is, that every person born in the kingdom, who is old, blind, maimed, or otherwise impotent, is entitled to relief from his parish. Do you mean to apply that law to Ireland—you who talk so loudly of identity of legislation? I fear you do not. I know many among those who clamour the loudest about justice and equal laws, are the most forward to charge us with insulting the people of Ireland, and the most active in crying out for redress—who shrink within themselves when poor-laws for Ireland are the subject of discussion. Poverty and impotence are not entitled in their eyes to the same identity of legislation as political partisans. On this point they show themselves in their true colours; and the principle of identity, as far as the right of the poor to relief is concerned, is denominated by no more soothing appellation than “a great humbug.” When we ask these clamourers for equal laws and justice, Why do you refuse to support your poor on the same footing as the poor in England are supported? and tell them to do so in perfect accordance with their own principle of identity of legislation, they answer us, and say, “Ireland is differently circumstanced from England; the whole question depends upon circumstances; it should be left open to them.” The noble lord should have told us his intentions with regard to poor-laws for that country as well as tithes; and I maintain that he cannot justly call on the House to pass the bill for which he has moved, respecting the municipal corporations, without letting us know what his measures on those two points will embrace. With respect to poor-laws for Ireland, see for a moment what the operation would be on this measure. In England, the right of voting depends not on the value of the house in which the voter lives, but on the payment of his rates—in which are included, of course, the poor-rate. Now, before you offer us the Municipal Corporation Bill for Ireland, do you refuse to give us any explanation on the subject of the connexion of rating with the right of voting in towns in Ireland? Do you mean to say, that those who are rated to the poor-rate alone shall have the right to vote, or that that right shall be derived solely from the value of the tenement occupied by the inhabitant of the town? In either case, do you mean to submit the municipal bill to the committee before you give any explanation of your views on this most important question? The country longs for an answer. My right hon. friend (Sir J. Graham) on my left, has so fully entered into all the subjects broached in the collateral discussion which was invited, provoked, and compelled, by the noble lord opposite, that he has spared me the trouble, and precluded me from the necessity of proceeding at any length with it. He has, in short, anticipated me, and left me very little to say on them. The two main questions, however, broached in the resolution which the noble lord has made the basis of the discussion are, whether the patronage vested in the Irish government has been properly exercised; and whether the royal prerogative of mercy, placed in the hands of the Lord-lieutenant of Ireland, has been rightly applied. By far the greatest matter connected with the former, was the appointment of Mr. Pigott to the situation of confidential adviser at the castle. Mr. Pigott, from all I have heard, is a respectable man; but I contend that his appointment was improper. Do you think that I object to it because he is a Roman Catholic? No; far be it from me to do so. I object to it because it shows the animus which actuates the government, and because it is a direct encouragement and sanction to the association now sitting in Dublin, that gentleman being an active member of the body. The right hon. gentleman opposite (Sir J. C. Hobhouse) asks me what course I shall pursue when I receive that appointment, of which I had not the slightest expectation until the right hon. gentleman spoke. To this I answer, that as I doubt his authority to confer that appointment on me, I also doubt his right to catechise me on the results of a contingency which, until this night, I thought of all other things was the most remote. And now, what between the funeral speech of the right hon. gentleman—the song of the dying swan—and the declaration volunteered by him, that it would be madness in me to hope to conduct the government at all, I am left in the greatest doubt as to the actual position in which I stand. That speech was half a congratulation on the future prospects of the government, of which the right hon. baronet is a member, and half consisted of legubrious prophecies and lamentations as to their inability to carry it on. But I shall answer his question more fully. I shall contrast with it the course which I pursued in respect to the orange societies last session of parliament, and the course which the government pursues in respect to the National Association in Ireland during this. I am told by the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, that the greater part of my support in the House is derived from the adherence of Orangemen to me, and the influence of Orangemen in my favour. Now, I appeal to my hon. friends behind me, many of whom were then members of Orange societies, whether any man could be more anxious to persuade them than I was, at the time his Majesty's commands for their suppression was issued, to acquiesce in them—or whether any man could have been more studious to change and divest those societies of the spirit that pervaded them, which might have been dangerous to the peace and tranquillity of the country? In those endeavours I was aided by the noble lord, the Secretary for the Home Department, who, on that occasion, spoke the sentiments of the government. Will he now take the same course with regard to the National Association? He cannot depart from his principles of identity in legislation, although the National Association, and not municipal laws, be the subject of discussion. When the suppression of the Orange societies was in question, the noble lord came down to the House, and stated that he had consulted the law-officers of the Crown—the Attorney and Solicitor general, and that there existed doubts in his mind as to the illegality of these societies. He threw himself therefore on their loyalty, and he said he felt himself compelled to rely on their good sense. That was the appeal he made to them—will he try a similar one with the loyalty of the National Association? He said, moreover, that secret signs and symbols were not illegal; but that secret meetings, held in different parts of the country, presided over by regularly appointed presidents, were so. He also urged the right of the Crown to ask any one in its employment, especially if it was one of trust and responsibility, whether he belonged to a secret society of any kind, and if he did, to discharge him, unless he at once dissolved his connection with it. Did the noble lord ask that question of Mr. Pigott? I think the principle laid down by the noble lord was, that when a civil office is to be conferred, the government shall lay down the conditions on which it can be held. Did the noble lord exercise the right he asserted on the former occasion to do that in the instance of Mr. Pigott? If the dissolution of all connection with societies of that nature was required as a sine qua non of all persons appointed to, or serving in situations under the government, why did not the noble lord require it in this case, as well as in the other case where Orangemen were in question? The noble lord on that occasion also said, in allusion to the magistracy, that no man should be appointed who belonged to any political society, because the bench should be free from all suspicion, and the magistrate should have the character of impartiality with all classes of society which he was called on to deal with. I think that is a good rule; but has the noble lord applied it to the recent appointments to the magistracy of Ireland? Have no members of the National Association been made magistrates since their connection with it? The noble lord expressed his confidence in the loyalty of the Orange societies, and stated that he was satisfied they would obey the king's wishes, and dissolve without the necessity of any law against them. Has he made a similar experiment on the loyalty of the National Association? Has he equal confidence in that body? But why do I ask, what is the meaning of the prime minister of England condemning and denouncing this association in the House of Lords, when a vacancy in a public situation of great trust is filled by one of its most active members, and you boast in the House of Commons that you and the law-officers of the Crown are identified with it? I know that a distinction may be drawn by a technical mind between the nature of the two classes of associations. I know that it may be urged that one was secret and exclusive, composed alone of Protestants, and holding its meetings in private, while the other is open to the public, and free to all conditions and creeds to enter into. But let us examine for a moment this distinction. The noble lord declared that secrecy was not illegal; and it appears that the only penalty which it could incur would be the hon. gentlemen's disapprobation on the other side of the House. But, even supposing it were, it is not in secrecy alone that danger consists. The Jacobin Club of Paris was not a secret club; its sittings were open to all comers. Yet what mischief did it not do? That club, which has ramifications all over the country—which has pacificators in every place—which collects money—which interferes with the administration of justice, and the due execution of the law—that is the dangerous club. Such an one is the National Association. It is said that it is a consequence of bad legislation. So much the worse is it likely to be. Why, then, encourage it—why sanction its proceedings? You, who conclude all your speeches respecting Ireland with a cry for impartial justice, as well as equal laws, why, I ask you, do you place in offices of power and responsibility men who belong to an association which could pass this resolution, and be prepared to act on it. Resolved, “That it be recommended to all parishes throughout Ireland, to hold public meetings on the same day in every part of the kingdom.” What is the object of that resolution, let me ask you, except it be to show the physical force which they command, and so to compel acquiescence in their wishes? And for what purposes were these meetings to be held, and was this display of physical force to be organized? The resolution explains the whole matter, for it concludes thus—“To petition in favour of corporate reform, vote by ballot, the total abolition of tithes, and to appoint pacificators.” When the downcast clergy of the Established Church in Ireland are seen daily struggling for the maintenance of their legal rights—and daily driven down also by famine and privations of every description, because they cannot get what is their right by law—when the noble lord opposite tells us that that country is in a state of perfect quietude, and offers these injured men a verse of a modern song as an only consolation, while the more eloquent prose of the insurance offices informs them pithily that their lives cannot be insured—when such men as Mr. Pigott are put into offices of high trust, without relinquishing their connection with an association which cries aloud for the abolition of the “blood-stained impost, tithes,” then is all confidence in the integrity of the government destroyed, and every honest man will begin to think it his duty to take care of himself. Such is the state of Ireland at present. With respect to the exercise of the Royal prerogative of mercy by the Lord-lieutenant of Ireland, the noble lord opposite admits that several prisoners were discharged by that nobleman, on his visitation of the kingdom—some of them according to the regular forms used in such cases, others without attending to those forms. When the subject was first mooted, it was said to us, “Oh, you object to clemency—you lack mercy.” We answer, that we do not object to clemency, and we hope that we do not lack mercy. We do not object to clemency, but we do to its injurious exercise. Clemency, well-timed and applied properly, is a blessing; but, to give it a good effect, it should be extended with due regard to the claim of those praying for it—with a due regard to the public interest, including the respect owing to justice, and with a careful attention to the character of the judges who tried the convict, and who, to administer mercy wisely and rightly, ought, in all cases of the kind, to be consulted by the person having the power of extending it. We do not object to clemency; but we object to that which, under its sacred name, would make the administration of justice odious; and, by giving one party the exclusive privilege of indiscriminate mercy, would render another the object of hatred and fear. Such an use of the royal prerogative is only calculated to make mercy odious, and clemency ridiculous. The Lord-lieutenant has dealt with clemency, in round numbers, merely on the report of an inspector of prisons. Now, I would ask, is there any precedent for such an indiscriminate application of the great attribute of mercy? Certainly not, upon any principle, or on any known authority. I recollect I had the honour of accompanying his late Majesty on his visit to Scotland—a visit of peculiar interest, as it was the first occasion on which that portion of the empire had been visited by a Prince of the House of Hanover as the sovereign of the country. Now I doubt very much that, on that occasion, any person confined on a criminal charge was liberated, to do honour to the visit of the chief governor—and I think I do recollect, that some persons confined for breaches of the excise laws were discharged from prison; but even this was not done until the cases had been referred to the excise-office, and a selection made of the cases that were most deserving of the royal clemency. This is the only instance that I know of, in which mercy was extended to persons confined for offences against the law, on the visit of a chief governor. Oh yes! there is one other instance that occurs to my mind, but it is of a poetical nature. It is recorded in a farce—a farce known, I believe, by the name of “Tom Thumb.” If I recollect right, and I refer to the classical authority of the hon. gentleman opposite, the King and Lord Grizzle appear upon the stage. The King says, “Rebellion is dead—I’ll go to breakfast.” And, to celebrate the auspicious event, he says, “Open the prisons—turn the captives loose—and let our treasurer advance a guinea from our royal treasury to pay their several debts." These are the only two instances of mercy extended to prisoners on the visits of chief governors to particular towns with which I am acquainted—one is from real life, and the other from fiction. On the visit of his Majesty, to which I have alluded, some offenders were certainly pardoned; but on a visit of the Lord-lieutenant to the prisons, the governors are called on to sacrifice a hecatomb of victims to grace the majesty of a chief governor. But now with respect to subordinate points; for, after the overwhelming debate which the noble lord had opened on the 14th resolution passed at the Dublin meeting, one is almost inclined to forget that such matters as a municipal bill, a poor law bill, a church bill, and a tithe bill, remain to be discussed. With regard to the municipal bill, I was glad to hear that the hon. and learned member for Bath had on that point reserved to them the right of free discussion; and I will therefore state my opinions on that subject with as much absence of personality as the hon. member can desire, and with as much mildness as is consistent with the very strong objections I entertain to it. In the address of the noble lord to the House, he said, that because Englishmen inhabited England, and Scotchmen inhabited Scotland, we considered them deserving of municipal government; but because Ireland was inhabited by Irishmen, we considered them not to be entitled to the same advantage, and were determined to withhold them; and we are told, that because we withhold these privileges, we offer an insult to the Irish people. Now, Sir, I utterly disclaim intending to offer any insult to the Irish people. It is not because they are Irishmen that I do not think it politic to extend to them the same corporate rights that England and Scotland enjoy. No, Sir, it is on far different grounds. It is because I entertain great doubts of the goodness of that policy which would destroy one set of corporate bodies, and establish another description of corporate bodies in their stead, which would be liable to the same objection as the old. It is contended that, according to the Act of Union, and after the Catholic relief bill had passed, there ought to be an equality of rights and privileges extended to Ireland, and the other branches of the empire. I fully grant that, under those acts, the people of Ireland have a perfect right to the enjoyment of all civil privileges; but I utterly deny that corporations form any portion of those civil rights. Will any man say that injustice is done to Manchester or Birmingham, because they have not had charters of incorporation granted to them; or, if those towns have been unjustly excluded, I ask, why have not those privileges been extended to them? It is not the principle of self-government that is at all involved in this question, but whether or no corporate institutions shall be continued in Ireland. I am bound to admit, that the presumption is in favour of the continuance of those institutions because of their antiquity, and because similar institutions exist in England; but I do say, notwithstanding, that if the continuing of these institutions in their renewed shape shall appear dangerous to the safety of other institutions, which we are still more strongly bound to preserve—I say, if they endanger the free expression of opinion by the minority, and expose some of the best interests of society to great hazard, then I say there are reasons, and reasons which go far with me in countervailing the other arguments in favour of the continuance of those corporations. I know we are accused of entertaining a prejudiced and bigoted feeling against the Roman Catholics. For myself, I can only meet such an accusation with the most direct and positive denial. No such feeling exists with me. The right hon. gentleman opposite asks me what I mean to do with the municipal question in Ireland when I come into office. Now he is in office, and let me ask him, in return, what he means to do with the Church of Ireland? Does he mean to disturb it or not? He is bound to answer that question. I say, that when I see an association established in Ireland arrayed against the established church, and I am told that that association will be continued while the Church is suffered to exist—when I know the power which the re-establishment of municipal corporations would give to that association—can I doubt that the Church would be endangered by their existence, when the main object and efforts of the association to which I allude, are avowed to be the destruction of the established church in Ireland? When we are told, that we on this side of the House are influenced by hostility to the Roman Catholics in our opposition to this measure, have we not something to complain of? Have we not some right to entertain a feeling of jealousy? In the year 1829 we passed the act for the relief of the Roman Catholics. I never took any praise to myself for the part I had in passing that measure, because I own it was forced upon me. I leave to others the sole credit of having passed it; but to charge me with having joined in passing it for the purpose of retaining office, is altogether unjust and groundless. What would they say if the fact were, although it might not be known, that I was out of office the very night before I proposed the bill to the House! It was said, that if that bill passed it would restore a perfect civil equality in Ireland, and the question was asked in every way, what would be the feelings of the Roman Catholics towards the established church in the event of the bill passing? The answer of Dr. Doyle, and all others of the Catholic clergy and laity to whom the question was put, distinctly was,—“The complete removal of our civil disabilities will prevent any future intermeddling with the church establishment, that all agitation will cease, and that there will be a return, both on the part of the laity and the clergy, to the peaceful occupation of their former lives.” We are now asked for further concession; but are the same promises and declarations made to us? No such thing. After we had been told that the church establishment should not be subverted—after hoping that the granting of equal civil privileges would put an end to all further demands—the representatives sent to this House are told, that it is their duty to obtain entire religious freedom. They were told that while the church establishment remains, we are to have unabated agitation, and that the new normal schools shall be applied to that purpose. When we hear it declared, that while the church establishment exists in Ireland agitation will never cease, do we offer an insult if we refuse to strengthen the means for this agitation? Do we offer an insult if we desire to defend that establishment? What, I ask, was the language of him whom the Roman Catholics themselves selected as their advocate? What was the language of Lord Plunkett, the most powerful and able advocate, in my opinion, that the Roman Catholics ever had? I mean to speak of the ability exhibited upon the Roman Catholic question: he more than any other man contributed to the success of that measure. He must have spoken from his instructions: he was the chosen advocate of the Roman Catholics: he asked the Protestants of England to waive their prejudices; and he told them what were his opinions with respect to the Church. I ask you, are they stronger than mine? Lord Plunkett is still a member of the government: has he changed his opinions? These opinions were delivered by him in bringing forward the Roman Catholic question, and the people of England had confidence when the advocate of the Roman Catholics expressed those sentiments. Lord Plunkett said, “If I could agree in believing, that no step could be taken towards the emancipation of the Roman Catholics without destroying the Protestant Church in Ireland, I, who have supported these claims from my earliest life, would at once abandon them. I would change sides, and become as strenuously their opponent as I have been their conscientious advocate.” Lord Plunkett said this, and he said more. He said, “I look upon the Protestant Church Establishment in Ireland as settled at the Union, and to talk of shaking it without shaking the whole empire is idle. The Protestant Church Establishment is the cement of the Union, and is interwoven with the institutions of both countries, and, if destroyed, all public security must be shaken, the connexion between the two countries destroyed, and the ruin of private property must follow the ruin of the property of the Church.” When was this opinion given by Lord Plunkett? Not in 1825, but in 1828, the very year before the Catholic relief bill passed. If those opinions were sound, I appeal to the people of England, who are so constantly invoked [cheers]—if I understand those cheers the hon. gentlemen opposite mistake me: I do not mean the English people exclusively; but I say I do appeal to the people of this empire, who must ultimately be the judges if the opinions of Lord Plunkett have been verified. I appeal to their deliberate judgment, whether, when they see an association levying large contributions, and declaring that it never will cease agitation while the established church exists, they can hesitate to believe that to grant such corporations as this bill calls for to the towns in Ireland, would not be to endanger the other institutions of the country? The noble lord, and he was glad to hear it, intimated his intention of sustaining the established church; but I ask on what principles he will sustain it? The noble lord quoted an expression of Mr. Fox respecting concession as a means of procuring good and peaceable government in Ireland. If the noble lord agrees in the sentiments of Mr. Fox—if he says, I will concede one thing, and if that is not enough I will concede another, and when he finds that the grant of municipal corporations will not satisfy those who call out for justice, what will he next concede? Why, if he believes that this last concession will satisfy them, he has more grounds for the belief than I have, when I find that, after battling for four or five years, the foundation is no better than it was before, when the principles of concession advocated by Mr. Fox virtually commenced. Now, let me ask, if this system of concession is to go on, how the noble lord is to maintain the church? The noble lord, concurring with Mr. Fox, said he knew no other plan for governing a people but by allowing them to have their own way. But the noble lord must know, for he has had fair notice, that while the Protestant Church remains, the National Association will agitate for concession. The noble lord by adopting the principle concedes every thing—for, if he acts on the doctrine that the people must have every thing they demand, he must not only concede till municipal reform is granted, but also till the Protestant Church is destroyed. I heard that declaration from the noble lord with the utmost regret. There is only one other point to which I wish to refer, and, as the best reward for the patience with which the House has done me the honour to listen to me, I will confine myself to that, and ask how the granting of municipal reform will interfere with the administration of justice? These corporations are to have the appointment of the sheriffs, and consequently the chief influence in the administration of justice; and let me ask, what will be the consequences of such a concession in the present heated and feverish state of Ireland? What will be its effect on the minority, but to deprive them of that free and independent action which is necessary for the administration of justice? And let me appeal again to that same Fox, who warned his audience against mistaking paper regulations for practical institutions—against attempting to establish any identity of institutions in countries of different habits and different manners, and distracted by religious jealousy, thereby interfering with the administration of justice and the protection of equal laws, and not giving that justice which it was the duty of every legislature to give, to the minority as well as the majority.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

POOR-LAWS (IRELAND).

FEBRUARY 13, 1837.

Lord John Russell, in a speech of some length, detailed to the House the plan of his proposed New Poor-Law Bill for Ireland.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said it was exceedingly agreeable to discuss a question connected with the best interests of Ireland in which there was no party feeling present. He thought the House and the country were under great obligations to his Majesty's government for making a definite proposal. So much time, indeed, had been expended in inquiry into the subject, that a proposal for any new inquiry would be tantamount to the admission that that inquiry was of no avail, and that the prosecution of a scheme of poor-laws for Ireland was hopeless. He believed that the extent of public feeling with respect to the justice and expediency of introducing a system of poor-laws into Ireland, without entailing upon them the evils which had pervaded our own system, but introducing a modified code, was so strong, that it was impossible for the legislature to refuse to consider the question. He thought, therefore, that they were bound to labour for this purpose. At the same time, if they did feel an interest, as he believed all did, in the welfare of Ireland, they were equally bound to take every precaution that, in acting on a principle of benevolence, they should not visit Ireland with the grievances which they had originally suffered from the former system of poor-laws in this country. The noble lord had referred to those measures which he considered auxiliary to the introduction of a system of poor-laws in Ireland, and from which he anticipated considerable aid; such, for instance, as the affording facilities to emigration, and the undertaking of public works by means advanced from the public funds, for the purpose of creating employment for the able-bodied poor. He was bound to say, that he thought they ought not to be too sanguine in their expectations of relief to be obtained from these sources. He entirely concurred with the noble lord in the opinion, that every facility ought to be given to voluntary emigration; but, at the same time, he thought it of the utmost importance, that the disposal of lands in the colonies should be put on a totally new footing, and that the government ought not so much to seek a revenue from the disposal of those lands, as to enable parties disposed to purchase, to do so on very reasonable terms. In the next place, he thought that, considering that the lands to be disposed of were situated within some particular colony, the first and chief object the government should have in view, should be the benefit of that colony. When that was secured, they might adopt any measure that seemed most expedient or most practicable to produce improvement at home. But he very much doubted whether any benefit derived from the best conducted system of emigration, would materially aid in the great object of finding employment for the poor of Ireland, or of diminishing, in any sensible degree, the excess of the supply over the demand for labour. The hon. and learned gentleman, the member for Dublin, had asked in the course of his speech, why the government, in the case of Ireland, did not follow the example of the United States? "See," said the hon. and learned gentleman, "how widely extensive and wonderfully beneficial is the system of emigration acted upon in the United States of America." No doubt, many and great benefits resulted from the system in that country; but it must never be forgotten, that the question of emigration was here vastly different to what it was in America. There the emigration consisted only of a removal from one part of a great continent to another; here no emigration could take place except by a long passage over sea, attended with many expenses, much inconvenience, and the depressing notion of a complete separation and alienation from the land of one's fathers. Observe, too, in our colonies the difference of language, manners, climate, and quality of the soil. All these afforded, in England and Ireland, obstructions to extensive emigration—obstructions not known in the United States. At the same time, he thought that every encouragement should be given to voluntary emigration: he did not believe that any forced emigration would be found of service. Forced emigration, to be advantageous, could only be applied on this principle—that no man should obtain relief or assistance unless he consented to leave his country, and to settle in one of the colonies. He did not think that a fit principle to be adopted. At the same time, he entirely concurred with those who were for giving every facility to voluntary emigration. He came next to the subject of public works. It was customary for them all in that House to hail with the utmost satisfaction any proposal for the undertaking of public works in Ireland; and yet the hon. gentleman who spoke so much in favour of public works was one of those who, in the course of the same speech, would protest against providing in any way for the relief of the poor by the introduction of a system of poor-laws. In both cases, what was the main principle involved? The principle of an interference with the natural demand for labour—the principle of taking money out of a man's pocket, for the purpose of employing it in a manner and for objects in which he felt no interest, instead of leaving it in his pocket, to be employed in such a manner as to him should seem to be most advantageous, and for objects in which he felt a direct interest. He, therefore, was not much disposed to vote millions of the public money for the mere purpose of giving employment in public works; because in a tranquil country, and in a well organised state of society, he believed all the employment that could be usefully applied, would be given by means of private enterprise and exertion. At the same time, if it could be shown, that by the employment of public money in public works, the foundation of great public improvements would be laid, which could never be obtained without it, then he admitted that a case would be made out for the interference of the government, and for taxing the people to give employment to the poor. But he was of opinion that public works, undertaken only for the purpose of affording temporary relief to the people suffering from general want of employment, tended only to aggravate the evil they were intended to obviate. It was, besides, unfair to the people employed, because it held out to them a hope that the employment would be permanent, while it was only intended that it should be temporary. Upon the question of public works, there were always two important points to be considered—first, that the work proposed to be undertaken could not be accomplished by individual enterprise—second, that great public benefit would be derived from it. Any aid that the noble lord (Lord John Russell) expected to derive from the undertaking of public works, ought to rest upon those considerations. With respect to the measure at large, as proposed to be introduced by the noble lord, he should be sorry to say a word that could imply an objection to it, because, upon the first stage of a measure as important as any ever submitted to parliament, as regarded its ultimate results on the interest and happiness of Ireland, nothing, he conceived, could be so unwise, perhaps so unpardonable, as for any man to pledge himself precipitately as to the course he would pursue. If, therefore, he said a word upon the subject on that occasion, he trusted the noble lord and the government would believe that it was not with the slightest hostility against them, or remotest disposition to oppose the measure, but merely as a friend having every wish to facilitate the carrying of a measure of the kind, and to make it in every respect as perfect as possible. The hon. and learned member for Kilkenny had stated, that the legislature had now no option upon the subject—that, having once been introduced, the measure must of necessity be carried. He certainly thought that the legislature was bound to consider the question of poor-laws for Ireland; but if he were told because the matter had been broached, that therefore it must at once be proceeded with, and that the exercise of no discretion was to be left to the House, he begged to reply, that he totally dissented from that doctrine. He did not believe that, by the mere proposal of the measure, any such expectation of undoubted relief would be excited in the minds of the people of Ireland as to take from the legislation all discretion upon the subject. A part of the noble lord's proposal was the building of workhouses. If a hundred workhouses were built, he begged to ask what would be the average area of square miles over which each district in which such workhouse was situated would extend? [Viscount Howick: Each district will be twenty miles square]. There is a vast difference between twenty square miles and twenty miles square; let me understand distinctly what is intended? [Lord J. Russell: Twenty miles square]. That would comprise a space of four hundred square miles. Then, again, did the noble lord propose that one portion of a family seeking relief should be admitted into the workhouse, and that other portions should be permitted to work, or beg, or do as they pleased; or, as a condition to relief, must the whole of the family be admitted at once?

Lord John Russell: It is proposed that no relief shall be afforded to one member of a family, unless the whole be at the same time admitted to the workhouse.

Sir Robert Peel thought the noble lord would find that that system would not adapt itself to the other provisions of the bill. This proposition, of course, was founded on the success which was supposed to have attended the workhouse system in England. He felt that in the present condition of Ireland there was no time for delay; but he thought it much to be regretted, that greater experience of the practical working of the system in England had not been obtained. As regarded the introduction of poor-laws into Ireland, too, it must be remembered that the situation of that country, as compared with England, was widely different. England had been under a system of poor-laws for 300 years, in the course of which time many grievous abuses had crept in, and much difficulty had existed in removing them. Ireland was a country in which, as yet, no system of poor-laws had ever existed. It was inferred, from the partial experience of the last two years, that the new workhouse system had worked well in England; but he did not think the last two years a fair test by which to judge of the operation of the system. During the whole of that time there had been a great demand for labour, in consequence of the great works undertaken in this country by the enterprise of private individuals. The system, therefore, had come into operation under very great advantages. The noble lord stated that he would make no distinction in Ireland between claims that arose from impotency and those which arose from destitution, and he added that he thought no valid distinction could be drawn between the two. He was willing to give the point every consideration; but, speaking from the present impression of his mind, he must say that he thought there was a most material distinction to be drawn between claims arising from lameness, blindness, disease, and extreme old age, where it was evident there were few opportunities of fraud, and claims arising from destitution, which in many cases might be real, but in others might be feigned, or the result of indolence or improvidence. If the system of an extensive dispensary were established, at which the blind, the lame, and the extremely old should be the only claimants for relief, there would be no risk of false claims; and any system adopted in Ireland ought, undoubtedly, to afford instant and substantial relief to all that class of persons. But the moment the claims of the able-bodied man were admitted on account of destitution, from inability to find work, from that instant all test was abandoned by which to ascertain whether the claims were valid or not. The noble lord was very confident that the workhouse system would afford an effectual check to false claims; and upon that point he had quoted the testimony and opinion of Mr. Nichols. He was as fully disposed as the noble lord to attach great weight to the opinion of that gentleman; but at the same time he thought his experience of the working of the English bill must be too brief to enable him to speak with any certainty as to what the probable operation of a similar system would be in Ireland. But consider what these workhouses would be in the centre of an area of 400 square miles. The advantage of the workhouse system in England was, that it afforded an immediate test of the validity of the claimants. How, embracing so vast a district, could it afford a similar test in Ireland? He feared, too, if the workhouses should become popular in Ireland, that those who lived in the immediate neighbourhood would have the prior claim, so as to prevent those who lived at the greater distance of ten or twenty miles, from any chance of admission at all. Therefore, if a rigid law were laid down that no relief should be given except an admission to the workhouse, he was afraid the remedy proposed would be found in practice to be a very partial one. The noble lord had stated, that all those who could not obtain relief within the workhouses would be at liberty to wander about and beg. Had the government determined that it was impossible to unite with the workhouse system some system of domiciliary relief? The great disadvantage of the workhouse system was its inflexibility. Might not that disadvantage be obviated in some degree by the establishment of a system of domiciliary relief combined with it? As he had stated before, he wished to give this measure his cordial support, which he should undoubtedly do, if, in the course of the further discussion, he should feel convinced that the workhouse system was inseparable from the introduction of poor-laws into Ireland. All that he was afraid of was, that by the rigid rule of excluding every claim to relief unless administered within the walls of the workhouse, and of allowing vagrancy to be sanctioned by the law, very little practical good would be effected. The noble lord stated, that the workhouses would not be filled, because the natural affection of the Irish people would induce them to support their poor and more destitute relatives. In that case, he (Sir R. Peel) thought they would not relieve the class of persons who stood most in need of it. If that feeling obtained generally in Ireland, and if this system were adopted, he feared that the pressure of charity would fall most heavily on those who were least capable of bearing it. But at that time, and in that early stage of the proceedings, he would not extend his observations. He gave every credit to the government for bringing the matter forward. As far as he was personally concerned, he was disposed in every way to labour towards, he would not say the literal adoption of the measure as it was then proposed to them, but towards the introduction of a sound system of poor-laws into Ireland, by which the suffering poor of that country might be relieved, without entailing upon them and upon the richer classes such heavy evils as had arisen in England from an indiscriminate application of relief. With that feeling he should address himself to this measure with exactly the same zeal as if it had been introduced by his own friends.

Resolution agreed to, and ordered to be reported.

SPIRITUAL PEERS.

FEBRUARY 16, 1837.

Mr. C. Lushington, in a brief introductory speech, moved the following resolution:—"That it is the opinion of this House, that the sitting of the bishops in Parliament is unfavourable in its operation to the general interests of the Christian religion in this country, and tends to alienate the affections of the people from the Established Church."

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that if any unpopularity were attached to the most decided opposition to the motion of the hon. member for Ashburton, to his full share of that unpopularity he begged leave to put in a distinct claim. Feeling as he did upon the subject, he certainly would not be guilty of so base an action, as to leave the whole of the unpopularity with the noble lord. It might not serve the noble lord for him (Sir Robert Peel) to say so; but he must declare, that he never heard a speech delivered in a more manly manner than the speech of the noble lord, or one which reflected greater credit on the noble lord's abilities and judgment. For if it were true, as had been asserted by the hon. member for Liskeard, that the noble lord had lost his election for Devonshire by the votes of 600 clergymen, and it being undoubtedly true, that a large majority of the bishops were opposed to the present government, the noble lord had set a most laudable example of the conduct which, under such circumstances, ought to be pursued by every man, and every minister; and had not allowed any personal feeling to prevent him from frankly avowing his opinion on a great constitutional question like that under the consideration of the House. There was one objection to the motion of the hon. member for Ashburton, which struck him (Sir R. Peel) as being at once fatal to it. The hon. gentleman asked them to proceed, not by a legislative measure, but by a resolution. The hon. gentleman asked the House of Commons to agree to a resolution, depriving a portion of one branch of the legislature of its functions and privileges. Now, what right had they to take any such step? If the hon. gentleman were desirous of involving the House of Commons in a dilemma, he could not succeed more completely, than by persuading them to pass a resolution which, if passed, would have no effect whatever, but would be nearly a piece of waste paper. In former questions of a similar nature, it had always been proposed to proceed by bill. But the hon. member for Ashburton proposed by a resolution, to effect that which he despaired of effecting by bill. Why should the House of Commons risk bringing their own resolution—he would not say into contempt—but why should they pass a resolution which must prove invalid and unavailing? The noble lord had justly observed, that the inferences to be drawn from the reasoning of the hon. member, led to much more serious and extensive consequences than the hon. member himself seemed to be aware of. Not only, however, was that the case with the speech of the hon. mover, every argument which had been used by the hon. gentleman who seconded the motion, went the length of showing the expediency, not merely of removing the bishops from the House of Lords, but of abolishing the establishment. The hon. gentleman said, that when Parliament repealed the Test and Corporation Acts, they established the principle, that no religious creed should have any advantage over any other. He (Sir R. Peel) had never heard such a principle maintained. The hon. gentleman also contended, that the same thing took place on passing the bill for the relief of the Roman Catholics. He (Sir R. Peel) had never heard so before; but he had heard the direct contrary. It would, indeed, be a great discouragement to any attempt to relieve any portion of the people from civil disabilities, if the House were to be told, “You must not stop here; you must carry your measure infinitely further, and stop only with the destruction of the National Church.” Because the Test and Corporation Acts were repealed, because relief was granted to the Roman Catholics, was it thence to be inferred, that no one religious creed should have an advantage in this country over any other? It was evident, that if these hon. gentlemen were to succeed in expelling the bishops from the House of Lords, their next step would be, to propose that the Protestant clergy should no longer hold the exclusive possession of church temporalities. The hon. member for Liverpool had mistaken, not only the argument, but the statements of the noble lord. The noble lord had never talked of any rapid changes on the part of bishops from Whig to Tory, or from Tory to Whig principles. The noble lord had never talked of bishops rewarding their patrons by mean political subserviency. What was the fact? That while human nature remained what human nature now was, and always had been, men possessed of patronage would, ceteris paribus, exercise that patronage in favour of those who agreed with them in opinion. And nothing could be more reasonable. Why, if his Majesty's present government were to depart from that usage, and were, ceteris paribus, to select political opponents for bishops, would not the House hear the loudest reprobation of such a proceeding? Undoubtedly, the noble lord stated, that during the long continuance of a Tory government in power, the bishops generally professed Tory principles. But did the noble lord add, that that was out of servility to their patrons? Not at all. They were originally selected for advancement to the bench of bishops, because they were supposed to hold certain political opinions. They did hold those opinions; and they continued to hold them. But it was said by the hon. member for Middlesex, that after they had become bishops, the hope of translation to more lucrative sees would tempt them to change their political opinions, and to maintain the principles of any new government. Had his Majesty's present government found that to be the case? The political opinions which they held, at the time of their original appointment, they still held and acted upon. The hope of translation had no effect upon them: there was not one of them who had voted that black was white. All, therefore, that their worst enemies could allege against them was, that they were consistent, bigoted politicians, who obstinately adhered to their own opinions. As to the separation of the civil from the religious duties of the clergy, he was convinced that it would be a measure highly injurious to the country. He did not wish to see the church excluded from its fair share of political influence. If such an object were to be accomplished; if the clergy were compelled to confine themselves to the discharge of their ecclesiastical duties; if they were compelled to eschew all reference to, or interest in, temporal matters; if they were forbidden to participate in the feelings and wishes of their lay countrymen, he doubted, whether instead of the active, intelligent, enlightened, patriotic men, of whom the great body of the clergy of this kingdom was at present composed, we should not have a set of lazy, worthless, cloistered hypoerites. Into that question he would, however, not now enter. As to the plausible arguments which had been urged in favour of the destruction of a monarchical, and the establishment of a democratical government, he should be ashamed of himself if he condescended to say a single word in answer to them. He had risen only, because he did not wish it to be believed that he was capable of desiring to leave all the unpopularity of resisting the present motion on the shoulders of the noble lord. Whether the declaration might be popular or unpopular he cared not; but he was prepared to give his most decided opposition to a proposition, the ultimate tendency of which would be to injure, if not to destroy, the civil and religious constitution of England.

The House divided:—Ayes, 92; Noes, 197; majority, 105.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND).

FEBRUARY 22, 1837.

In the third day's debate on Lord Francis Egerton's motion, "That the committee on the Bill for the regulation of Municipal Corporations in Ireland, be empowered to make provision for the abolition of such corporations; and for such arrangements as may be necessary, on their abolition, for securing the efficient and impartial administration of justice, and the peace and good government of cities and towns in Ireland"—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, his wish was, at the close of this debate, to have confined himself exclusively to the consideration of the proper subject in question, to have stated briefly and simply the reasons why he could not concur in the arguments which he had heard from the opposite side of the House, to have refrained from any reference to the conduct of the Irish government, although provoked to do so by the challenge of the noble lord opposite (Lord John Russell), and to have treated this subject on its simple and proper grounds. But the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Sheil), by the personal attack which he had just made, for the purpose, not of convincing the reason, but of exciting the passions—of stimulating—he did not say with the intention, but with the effect of widening the national differences—had compelled him to depart from the course which he had prescribed to himself. He would ask, was it wise, was it prudent, was it just, to ransack every past debate for every angry expression? Was every hasty expression that might have fallen from an individual in this way, to be taken up at once, considered as matter of history, and handed down as evidence of national prejudice? Was the hon. and learned member content to abide by the same rule? Did he ever hear that when the illustrious captain of that mighty field—as he designed the Duke of Wellington—that when he, to whom life was nothing, staked the mighty reputation which he had gained by former victories on the field at Waterloo—when he stood there opposed to the legions of France, leading the united bands of Englishmen, of Irishmen, and of Scotchmen—did he ever hear that after the Duke of Wellington had rescued Europe by that great battle from the dominion of Bonaparte, and established the military fame and the peaceful security of his own country—did he ever hear of an Irishman, who had so little sympathy for his country's glory as to be able, with all the opulence of his own peculiar vocabulary, to find no other appellation for the illustrious hero of Waterloo, than that of "the stunted corporal?" And if it were unfair to fasten upon words like these, uttered in a moment of irritation, of jealousy, or mortification at his country's triumphs, and at the fame of the most illustrious man his country ever produced, was it not equally unfair to select the expressions used by Lord Lyndhurst as irrefragable proofs of his hostile sentiments against the whole of the Irish? The hon. gentleman had called on him (Sir Robert Peel) to defend the conduct of his noble friend, the member for North Lancashire. The hon. and learned gentleman had contended, and justly, that he had a perfect right at any time to make, on public grounds, any reference to the opinions and conduct of his noble friend. But when the hon. gentleman alluded to the meeting at Brookes's, the hon. gentleman must have known that that was a matter which he, for most evident reasons, was precluded from giving the hon. gentleman any answer. It required no ingenuity, no knowledge of petty details, however, to defend the conduct of his noble friend. What was it that had placed him in a position which he now held? What defence was required for his noble friend? Why should he require deliberation to devise an ingenious justification for his noble friend, when, from the facts which the hon. and learned gentleman had himself stated, that justification appeared so palpable, so evident, as to occur at once to the mind of every man, be he friend or opponent of the noble lord? What man was there, he repeated, who ever held in public life a prouder position than his noble friend? What man ever attained, not by the advantages of connexion, or of rank, or of fortune, but by his evident abilities for debate and public business, and through the undivided confidence of a great party to which he belonged, what man had ever attained to greater or more permanent eminence than his noble friend? What man was there more endeared to the persons with whom he had ever been connected? When his name was mentioned, was there any man who had ever been connected in office with him, who did not express the deepest regret at being separated from him, and a deep sense of the public loss which had been sustained by his quitting office? He (Sir Robert Peel) was speaking to those who had been connected with the noble lord in office, not those whose designs he had combated. If love of office or ambition for official distinction had been the object of his noble friend, was there ever any man who had such prospects open to him, such means of gratifying his wishes? What, then, made him relinquish office, but a stern and overpowering sense of duty? What, and what alone, had placed him in a position he now occupied? What, he demanded again, had caused his noble friend to retire from office, to sever himself with feelings of the deepest regret from his ancient party, what object could he have had in view in so doing, but the highest and purest sense of public duty, which being obeyed, had placed him where he was, in opposition to his former connexions? What he (Sir Robert Peel) had thus stated on the instant, without any communication with his noble friend, were facts well known to all mankind, and which he perceived were confirmed by the testimony of the former colleagues of his noble friend? and after stating these facts, it did not require any ingenious dexterity or skilful advocacy on his part, to make out a complete and unanswerable justification of his noble friend's conduct in quitting office, and taking up his present position. The hon. and learned gentleman next applied to him (Sir Robert Peel) to fulfil the compact which he said was entered into with him at the time of passing the Roman Catholic Relief Act. Let them see for one moment the exact nature of that alleged compact. The hon. and learned gentleman contended, that this compact compelled him (Sir R. Peel) to apply to Ireland the same principle of municipal reform as that which had been adopted for England. Now, on referring to the Roman Catholic Relief Act, he found no such compact. He certainly found a compact to this effect—that Roman Catholics and Protestants were to enjoy equal eligibility to corporate offices. The hon. and learned gentleman referred to a speech he made in 1831, when he gave his advice that Roman Catholics and Protestants should be admitted into the corporations according to their fair merits. There was no compact made that he was aware of, that the municipal institutions of Ireland were to be framed upon the model of those of England; nor, if it were shown that it would be better that those institutions should be altogether abolished, would there be any thing inconsistent with the Roman Catholic Relief Act, in abolishing them. This was not his single opinion only; for in a petition which had been presented to this House by the Roman Catholics themselves, anticipating the removal of every civil disability, the same view had been taken. The prayer of the petition to which he referred was, "that they would cause a reform to be made in the temporalities of the established church—that they should declare Orangemen to be ineligible as magistrates—that they should emancipate the Roman Catholics of Ireland—and that they should disfranchise the Irish corporations." So that at the time that the Catholics petitioned for the removal of their civil disabilities, it was not considered an insult to them that the municipal institutions should be retained in England, and should be discontinued in Ireland; but, on the contrary, it was expressly asked as a favour not to reform those institutions, but to abolish them altogether. He admitted, indeed, that at this period the corporations of England had not been reformed, and the Irish Roman Catholics had not these reformed institutions to contemplate; but still those institutions themselves existed in England, and the inference was the same. The hon. and learned gentleman had relied on the Roman Catholic Relief Bill as a contract, the terms of which they were bound to fulfil. But did he not consider the Act of Union a solemn compact? The inference that must be drawn from the general context of that act, supposed, implied, and evidently understood, that the protection of equal laws should be extended to Ireland. This argument in support of the permanence of the municipal institutions of Ireland, was an inference drawn from a supposed article in the Act of Union, that the two countries were to be governed by a parity of legislation. There was no such article, however, in the act; though he would admit that, generally speaking, the principle might be correct; but in the anxious search which the hon. and learned gentleman had made through that act, he wondered that that article had never struck him in which one institution was particularised, not by remote or doubtful inference, but in express and clear terms, and its existence guaranteed as a condition of the Act of the Union. The fifth article of this act was as follows:—"That the churches of that part of Great Britain called England, and Ireland, shall be united into one Protestant Episcopal Church, to be called the United Church of England and Ireland; and that the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of the said United Church shall be preserved as was by law established for the Church of England." Would the hon. and learned gentleman allow him to ask him, whether or not the uniform declaration of every Roman Catholic, whether every petition presented by a Roman Catholic, whether every declaration made by them, either individually or collectively, had not, with a force of a compact, led the Protestant mind of England to this conclusion, that the restoration of political equality to the Roman Catholics of Ireland was perfectly consistent and compatible with the maintenance of the church establishment in that country? Nay, more; was it not the express assurance of every Roman Catholic who had spoken on the subject, that the maintenance of the established church as the religion of the state was perfectly consistent with the political privileges and civil rights claimed by the Roman Catholics of Ireland? Did not the hon. and learned gentleman himself once believe that such was the case, and that political privileges once granted to the Irish Roman Catholics, the causes of jealousy and disunion would cease, and the system of agitation subside? Did not the hon. and learned gentleman himself once say—before a committee of that House—"that he was perfectly convinced that neither on the subject of tithes, nor on the Union, nor on any other political subject, would the people of Ireland be permanently or generally excited if the civil disabilities of the Roman Catholics were removed; that at present they were aggrieved by the state of the law, and that it was not so much on public grounds as by a sense of personal injustice that they were urged to complaints." The individual injustice here complained of was now done away with by the passing of the Roman Catholic Relief Bill; and the hon. and learned gentleman himself boasted of the result of that measure, when he stated that the chief offices on the bench and at the bar in Ireland were now filled by Roman Catholics. From these circumstances it appeared, that not only had a serious complaint of injustice been removed, but a practical equality established. Now he would ask the hon. and learned gentleman, in pursuance of his express or implied compact, in the expressions he had quoted, whether he considered the present state of the Protestant clergy of Ireland to be consistent with the declarations he had made at the above period? They were now told that religious freedom could not exist in Ireland until the voluntary principle was established, or, in point of fact, until the Protestant religion was destroyed. [Mr. Sheil: I have not said that.] "You never said so?" But you asked me, continued the right hon. baronet, to be responsible for expressions which had fallen from others, and to check the indiscretions of those who acted with me. And now, when I repeat a plain statement, the hon. and learned gentleman had no other refuge but to say, "I did not say so, it did not fall from me." Was this, he asked, the promised fulfilment of the compact on passing the Reform Bill—that Ireland was never to be tranquil until the Protestant Church was abolished? The noble Lord (Howick) who spoke last night, had used certain expressions in reference to the part he (Sir R. Peel) had taken in the passing of the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, in the course of which the noble lord had done him the justice to say, that he thought that in the year 1829, in coming forward to remove the civil disabilities of the Roman Catholics of Ireland, he had acted upon disinterested motives, and with great courage in remaining in office as he did. The noble lord had also referred to the taunts which had been cast at him by persons belonging to that party, by whom he had before that period been respected and supported. But the noble lord, from his experience in public life, ought to know what was the value and weight of expressions of this nature, uttered under such circumstances. He regretted at the time the taunts thrown out on the part of friends whom he had every reason to respect, but the impression made by those remarks had long passed away; they had left no rankling wound, because he knew that the imputations were unfounded; and he could say, that there was no one act of his political life which he was more prepared to justify than remaining in office, in spite of such imputations, for the purpose of relieving the disabilities of the Catholics. The part which he took on that occasion was approved of by his colleagues; he had the concurrence of the Duke of Wellington, and also the concurrence of his noble friend, Lord Lyndhurst, on the subject of granting Catholic relief; and, acting in concurrence with them and with the rest of the members of the government, he resolved to lend his assistance in carrying the measure into effect. Much public indignation had been expressed against his conduct, that at the close of the session of 1828 he had not adopted the views which he adopted in the following years; and in answer to that he would say, that after renewed applications—after reflecting on the desire evinced by the public mind in England and Ireland, and on the impossibility of forming a united government without conceding the question—he came at last to the conclusion, that though he did not consider the claims founded on right, it was better that those claims should be granted than resisted. But when he gave his consent to advocate the measure, he gave it under the full conviction of the sacrifices with which it was to be accompanied, and under the full impression of retiring from office, and supporting the claims of the Catholics in private life. And the reason why he remained in office was, because he foresaw to demonstration, that if he did not remain in office and brave the storms of calumny (he did not say that from any arrogance, but because it was consistent with truth), these disabilities would not have been removed. An erroneous construction had been put on something which had fallen from him, and it had been inferred that he had been out of office from an unwillingness to redeem the pledge he had given to his noble friends with respect to the Catholic question; and that a difference of opinion had existed between them. Such was not the case; for, having come to the conclusion of the expediency of conceding the Catholic claims, and having given notice of his intention to bring forward a measure on that subject, he never once thought of shrinking from the performance of that task. But the noble lord opposite, while admitting that his conduct on that occasion was free from the suspicion of interested motives, asked why he did not take the same course with regard to the Catholic question in 1825 and 1827, as he had done in 1829, and how it happened that at that period an entirely new light broke in upon his mind? Now, he declared that he, for one, never professed to entertain in 1829, the sanguine expectations which others entertained with regard to the effect which would be produced by the removal of the Catholic disabilities. He had his misgivings; nay, looking to the state of Ireland, he entertained great doubts whether the removal of those disabilities would restore peace, and afford full security for the Protestant establishment in that country. But in 1829 he made up his mind, upon a consideration of what ought always to have influence over every statesman, upon a comparison of the evils and dangers existing on both sides, and on the whole he came to the conclusion, without the assistance of any new light, and without changing his opinion, that the Catholic claims were not founded on any abstract right; he came, he repeated, to the conclusion, that those claims ought to be conceded, and that, if conceded, the concession ought to be full, frank, and generous. The noble lord opposite asked, why he had not taken the same course at an earlier period? The same question might be put to many other public men. Would the noble lord have the goodness to ask the noble lord, the Secretary of State for the Foreign department, why he was not an earlier convert than he had proved, to reform? He had no doubt the noble lord was an honest convert, and that, acting with regard to the question of reform on the same principles as he had acted with regard to the Catholic claims, he had chosen what he considered to be the lesser of two evils. Would the noble lord opposite inquire of the head of the present administration, why he, too, had not been an earlier convert to reform? If it were blindness in him not to foresee in 1825 the necessity of granting—of conceding the Catholic claims, was not Lord Melbourne blind in 1826, when he made the most vigorous opposition to all reform, even to the transfer of the representatives from Penryn to Manchester? Nay, even the leader of the House of Commons could not escape the searching question of the noble lord, his colleague. Had a prophetic vision of what was now passing appeared to the noble lord some ten years ago, he doubted whether any eulogium on Old Sarum, or any declamation on the necessity of preserving Aladdin's lamp, and cherishing the vestal flame, would ever have proceeded from the pen of the noble leader of that House. He knew not what answer the noble lord might return to the question, why he had changed his course with respect to the question of reform, but he would freely reply to the question which had been addressed to him on the subject of the Catholic claims. He thought that a man might, without any irrational distrust of the Roman Catholics, have entertained conscientious doubts on the question, whether the removal of the political disabilities of the Roman Catholics would restore peace to Ireland, and secure the stability of the established church; and the hon. member for Liskeard was not justified in saying, that he had been, on a former occasion, carried into office by the force of the "No Popery" cry, if the hon. member meant to imply that his opposition to the concession of the Catholic claims proceeded from any bigoted motive. He feared danger to the Protestant establishment. Had he been entirely wrong? He would, however, say, if the question were to be discussed again—if the question carried in 1829 were again to be agitated—looking at the position of parties and the state of public opinion, looking at the hostile elements, the parties in favour and those opposed to emancipation, he should on the balance of opposing evils do as he did before, and resolve that concession would be the wisest course. But had he no reason to relinquish all the fears which he might once have entertained of the danger of conceding the claims of the Roman Catholics? Did he not find that all the public men who appeared as the advocates of the Roman Catholics—all, without exception, made two declarations—first, that they considered the maintenance of the established church essential to the well-being of Ireland, and to the maintenance of the connection between the two countries; and secondly, they gave the most positive assurances that, the disabilities of the Roman Catholics being removed, all fear of danger to the established church would be removed? Did not he find those declarations solemnly recorded in the preamble of Mr. Grattan's act, by which it was proposed to remove the Catholic disabilities? The preamble of that act declared, that "the Episcopal Church of England and Ireland, and its doctrine and government, were permanently established, and that it would promote the interest of the same, and strengthen our free constitution, of which they formed an essential part, if the disqualifications under which the Roman Catholics laboured were removed." Had he not heard Mr. Grattan declare, that he thought the removal of the Catholic disqualifications consistent with the preservation of the Protestant establishment, the maintenance of which he considered essential to the peace of Ireland? Did he not find it written in that paper, which that eloquent individual called a testamentary bequest to his country, that the Protestant establishment should be maintained inviolate? Did not Mr. Canning, Lord Castlereagh, and every advocate of Catholic relief, attempt to banish all fear with regard to the result of the removal of the disabilities? When he (Sir R. Peel) had at an earlier period than 1829 stated his apprehension, that by the passing of a Catholic Bill, animosities would not be subdued, that distractions would still continue, and that the stability of the church would be endangered, how was he then replied to by Lord Plunkett? That noble and learned individual stated, that the Catholics, though they preferred their own religion to any other, looked upon the Protestant Church as an institution established by law, and necessary for the liberty of Catholics along with all the subjects of the realm. And what said the same authority with reference to the Church of Scotland as a precedent for subverting the Protestant Church in Ireland? He said, the assertion that the establishment of the Presbyterian Church in Scotland could form a precedent for the subversion of the Episcopal Church in Ireland, was laughed at by the Catholics, because they knew that the Presbyterian religion was the reformed religion, and it was so ordered by the solemn contract entered into at the Union, that the maintenance of the Protestant religion should form a permanent law of the empire, and added, that the Catholics considered the clergy of the established church were as much entitled to the possession of church property, as private individuals were entitled to property purchased or devised, and that he would abide by the oath he had taken, and, so far from adopting measures for the subversion of that church, he would offer the most strenuous resistance to those that would overthrow it, from whatever quarter it came. That was the language of Lord Plunkett; and was it not rather late now to say, that religious freedom could not exist unless the Protestant Church were destroyed? Was it not rather late to say, that the Protestant Church was the greatest curse, and to rejoice in the prospect of establishing municipal corporations in Ireland, because these would certainly lead to the overthrow of that church? Those who held that language might have been no party to the carrying of the Catholic bill; but he who, was instrumental in carrying it—who believed that there was danger in it to the established church, who believed that the maintenance of that church was essential to civil rights and liberty—was he to be blamed for asserting the principle for which he had always contended; and were they to be surprised if, after the assurances that had been made of the determination of the advocates of emancipation to support that church, that he should now do every thing in his power to protect what some called a curse, but what he called the greatest blessing? And if he were told that the establishment of these municipal institutions were subordinate to the destruction of the Protestant Church in Ireland, and that they were to be used as a means to subvert it, was he to blame for not acceding to the bill till he knew what security they would give against its subversion? He did not oppose the measure on the ground imputed by some. He did not cast any reflection upon Catholics; his only object was to take care, as it was the duty of every government, that institutions should be established which would be conducive to the peace of Ireland, and the impartial administration of justice. The hon. member for Liskeard had argued the propriety of discussing the abstract principle of the measure; and he concurred with him in thinking, that by adopting such a course they would have arrived at safer conclusions, but they had been led away from that by the indiscreet challenge of the noble lord who brought forward the measure. The hon. and learned member had also contended, that these municipal institutions were of great use in former times, and on that point he entirely concurred. He agreed that in the eleventh century the municipal corporations in France, and Italy, and Spain, and almost every country in Europe, were great instruments of improvement. In those times, when the great body of the people were vassals to the Crown, or to great lords, there could be no doubt that municipal institutions were a great blessing; but it did not follow, that because they were good in the reign of Louis le Grand, or when a man could not dispose of his property, or give his children in marriage without the consent of his superior, they were equally good in more civilised times. And besides these, there were other causes of civilisation at the remote periods alluded to. There were the Crusades. The Crusades improved the manners and enlarged the views of the people. They opened the avenues to commerce, and removed many turbulent noblemen from the different kingdoms of Europe. He referred to those, and he might refer to other causes, to show, that it was not necessary to attribute the progress of civilisation to the sole cause to which it had been ascribed by the hon. member for Liskeard. The hon. gentleman then proceeded to talk of the confidence which ought to be reposed in local authorities. He said, that the right of paving, of watching, of lighting, ought to be placed in local authorities; and had referred to the Act of 9 Geo. IV. on the subject. The hon. member for Liskeard was also desirous for the establishment of municipal institutions in Ireland, because he said they would inculcate lessons of mutual forbearance and concession. If it could be proved, that such was likely to be the result of the creation of corporations in Ireland, his (Sir R. Peel's) objections to the ministerial proposition would, in a great measure, be removed. But when he saw the maintenance of political institutions, which all admitted to be perverted, was insisted on, he then suspected that it was the object of the promoters of the present proposition to get hold of political power for their own benefit, and to exercise it through the instrumentality of those corrupt bodies, the existence of which was so strenuously advocated, but to which he was opposed, because he believed they would continue to be perverted to bad purposes.

He feared it was because of the sweetness of the odour that they wanted these corporations. But there was one question from which those who advocated the necessity for these institutions had invariably shrunk from answering—namely, the question, “Why they were not in operation in the great towns in England?” Why had not Manchester, Birmingham, Marylebone, and many others, petitioned the legislature to grant them these so much coveted institutions? The truth was, that Manchester and Birmingham, and the boroughs of Southwark, Westminster, Marylebone, and Finsbury, were satisfied with their present condition, and municipal institutions, such as ministers proposed to give to Ireland, were not considered necessary by the inhabitants of these places. In Ireland, he did not think they would be found, as the amiable simplicity of the hon. member for Liskeard supposed, conducive to mutual good-will, concession, and forbearance. It was much more likely they would be under the control of that species of central government, the general association, and would constantly interfere with the elective franchise; and the result would be, that the ascendancy of one political party would be effected, while all confidence in the administration of justice by the local authorities would be destroyed. In support of his argument, he might quote a passage from the report of the commissioners appointed to inquire into municipal corporations. They stated, that a great number of corporations had been preserved solely as political engines, and that the towns to which they belonged derived no benefit, but often much injury, from their existence: to maintain the political influence of a family, or the political ascendancy of a party, had been the sole end and object for which the powers intrusted to a great number of these bodies had been exercised. It appeared, then, that the most flagrant abuses had arisen from the perversion of the municipal privileges to political purposes, and that the corporations not possessed of the parliamentary franchise had most faithfully performed their duty. But it was contended by the hon. member for Bath, that in the present instance, there was a security against corruption and persecution on the part of the corporations, in the circumstance that they would be the instruments of a majority. Surely it would hardly be contended that it was impossible for a majority to persecute? Mr. Fox said, that the ancient republics, whenever danger was apprehended, did, by incorporating every man with the state, excite great enthusiasm in their defence; and yet, that such instances of iniquity, injustice, and oppression were never presented as were presented by those republics. Did the hon. member for Bath consider the present position of the church in Ireland, as no proof that a minority might be persecuted? Had the hon. gentleman read the history of the French Revolution? Were not the emigrants, were not the Girondists persecuted, and were they not the minority? Did not the hon. member for Bath bear in mind that the government of Spain had confiscated the property of General Alava, and that it had lately sent a general into Andalusia with authority to proclaim, that every man who did not join him should be hanged—and was not that persecution? Would it be right, then, to establish the proposed municipal bodies in Ireland, the election of which would, in his opinion, be influenced by pacificators appointed in every parish, and acted upon by Roman Catholic priests? Pacification was, indeed, a noble object, but he did not think it most likely to follow from a transfer of authority from one section in the state to another, and certainly he had serious doubts whether it were conducive to religious peace, above all, that the transfer should be from a minority to a majority. He had been tauntingly reminded of the minority in which he was in that House, but what was his minority compared to the overwhelming importance of the question before them? He felt that it was more important to him to take the course prescribed by justice, than to enter into speculations concerning his minority—to look to the safety and solidity of the Protestant Church, rather than to the insufficiency of his minority—to provide, in the first place, against his becoming an instrument of doing wrong, and not until he had made that provision to think of his minority. He never felt so satisfied of the justice of any cause as that of that church, nor was he one whit less satisfied that the House was bound by all the obligations of honour, of justice, and of interest too, to provide for the security of that church. The noble lord had asked him, and with considerable anxiety too, which was not to be wondered at, as the noble lord would soon have to ask the question of himself, what his intentions or designs were under the formidable circumstances which Ireland presented. Yes, the noble lord would have to ask himself that puzzling question, when, with these municipal corporations in the foreground, he peered over the battlements of the church, which he and his colleagues were ashamed to abandon, and afraid to defend. They pointed to the Association, and they asked him how he proposed to meet the power which was in open resistance to the church, and which meditated a violence as open? Who had made the Association powerful—not he, but they. The existence of that Association was fraught with importance to the church, for it had determined on the destruction of the church, had resolved that in Ireland peace should not ensue until that destruction was complete. They were persons fond of secret determinations as to the benefits they might obtain; they never could be satisfied with what they got; they were always asking for more, and each new boon was an instalment only, a fraction of some greater claim. This was the way they had received the appropriation clause bestowed on them by that House, and this was the way in which every thing else would be received. Now, he would ask them, did they think it possible, that if they selected their confidential legal advisers from out that Association, from among its most active members, they would disabuse the public mind of the impression that they approved of it, that they were anxious to encourage it, that they were desirous even of rewarding it? An effort at a retort had been made by the allusion to the appointment of Colonel Perceval, but was there no distinction between the cases? Did the House see none? Was there nothing in the existence of funds regularly collected, which, though now said to be kept secret for a legitimate purpose, might be used to effect the perversion of justice? Was the man most active in the creation of such funds, which might be applied to defeat the law, to be appointed a legal adviser of the government? The prime minister had declared, that he disapproved of the association, and thought it ought to be discouraged—that was the declaration of a gentleman; but the mode of discouragement was a singular one. To discourage the Association, they gave office to a gentleman who had tried his 'prentice-hand in that association; because he had graduated in the normal schools of agitation, they thought him fit to become a professor in Dublin castle—they had actually created a vacancy for him. If that were their mode of discouraging, to him it appeared any thing but an efficacious one. They might think to limit the evils by the plan they were pursuing, but their turn would come next, their lukewarmness would fail them. He knew that it was difficult, and ungracious, perhaps, for a government to exert its power to restrain, but it should not lend its power to incite or goad on those who were, or might become, disaffected; if it were so lent, then it was a perversion of power, and became a formidable encouragement. He did complain of such conduct as unjust, ungenerous, and impolitic; it was unjust to discourage one species of association merely, and from another to take an important functionary, whose duties as a lawyer for the Crown ought to be uninfluenced by the spirit of any association; it was ungenerous to avail themselves of the loyalty of Orangemen, to cajole them with praises of their love for their Sovereign and deference to his commands, to confess that the law could not reach them, and to obtain their ends from their good-will, and then to turn round on them and call them a miserable monopolising minority; it was impolitic, for if a government did not interfere to restrain, it at least should not interpose to encourage. When did the principle of successive concessions, of constant compliances, of a nervous horror of refusals, ever succeed? Never—it was revolting to common sense to suppose that it would. Such a system, if pursued in private life, would be most injurious to society; in official life, it was much worse, much more pernicious. Persons in official life, should recollect how great the interests were that were committed to them, and they should never interpose their authority, no matter what the direction of its exercise, to encourage, or to do acts tending to encourage, any party or political sect whatever.

The House divided on Lord Francis Egerton's motion; Ayes, 242; Noes, 322; majority, 80. The House went into committee pro forma, and resumed. Committee to sit again.

POOR-LAW-AMENDMENT ACT.

FEBRUARY 27, 1837.

Mr. Walter moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Poor-Law Amendment Act, and to report their opinion to the House."

Lord John Russell, after analysing the speech of Mr. Walter, contended that the real object of the motion was the repeal of the Poor-Law Amendment Act, and moved as an amendment, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the administration of the relief of the poor, under the orders and regulations issued by the commissioners, appointed under the provisions of the Poor-Law Amendment Act."

SIR ROBERT PEELE thought the question really at issue lay within the narrowest limits; and he could state what his opinions were in five minutes much more satisfactorily to himself than if he spent two hours speaking on the subject. He considered the whole question to turn on this—what will be the impression of the public mind from the course they were about to adopt? The terms of one motion might differ very little from those of the other, the inquiry they might institute might differ very little from another inquiry, but the real question at issue was—what construction the public, those who had to administer the law, those to whom the law was to be administered—what construction they would put on the vote the House was about to come to, and on the intentions that vote would manifest? If they intended to repeal the poor-law amendment bill, if they intended to prejudice the operation of that measure, their course was perfectly clear; if, on the other hand, they intended to maintain it, to see that a great experiment had a fair trial, and give the moral aid of their support to those who had to administer very unpopular functions, then he said they ought to be exceedingly cautious that they did not create in the public mind perhaps an erroneous impression, that they had doubts on the subject, and wished to shrink from the application of the measure on the most plausible grounds imaginable. He apprehended the great object of the change made in the poor-law was to save expense to the rate-payers. He attached very little importance to the results as derived from that measure, affecting merely the question of a diminution of a pecuniary charge. It was stated, that £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 had been saved by the bill; he did not undervalue the amount of the saving, particularly in this respect, that they could make no reduction in unwise expenditure without improving the condition of the lower classes. In that respect he attached much importance to the saving which had been effected; but the principal advantage to be derived from the measure was to elevate the moral condition of the poor, promoting their independence, and raising them in the social scale—holding out to them the hope, that when industry was combined with good moral character there was a certainty of providing for their own subsistence and that of their families. Having given to this measure, when first introduced, his cordial support, he must say he had yet heard no facts which could induce him to regret the course he had then taken, or incline him to prejudice the operation of the bill. He did not believe it was possible to make a great change in the old administration of the poor-law, and contend with a system of abuse so rooted and so extensive, without provoking great opposition. There was a great deal of interested opposition to contend with—there was also a great deal of opposition springing from the most honourable and laudable feelings of real commiseration for the poor—a commiseration directing itself rather to individual and personal suffering, than taking a comprehensive view of the condition of the poor, and laying a foundation in hope of permanently bettering their condition. But far from saying one word reflecting on those who looked merely at individual suffering, and most anxious to apply an immediate and practical remedy, still, knowing that there was great opposition to contend with, and fearing, if those parties intrusted with the application of this law had reason to believe that the support of one branch of the legislature was taken away from them, whatever difficulties now existed in the way of the operation of the system would be aggravated to a tenfold degree, if the slightest suspicion were excited, that they were themselves doubtful of the efficacy of the principle, and meditating its infraction, it was most desirable to avoid any step which might appear to throw doubt on the permanency of the law. He believed that, in the application of this system, it had been almost impossible to avoid many cases of individual hardship, and being desirous of ascertaining those cases, and providing without delay a remedy for them, but being perfectly determined to adhere to and support the principle of the bill, while he ascertained how he might best mitigate the severity of its operation, he would vote against the original motion. He gave the highest credit to his hon. friend, the member for Berkshire, who introduced the subject from a sincere desire to benefit the condition of those who were entitled to the sympathy and most indulgent consideration of that House, yet differing entirely from him as to the impression which would be made on the public mind, he felt bound to say, as some unpopularity might attach to the avowal of a frank opinion—and being quite unconvinced from his original opinion in favour of the principle of the measure—he was most anxious that it should have a fair trial. He believed, that its ultimate result would be to rescue the country from an evil which was progressive, and which, if not impeded in its progress, was fraught with most awful consequences, not only to property, but to the independence and moral condition of the poor. He should not hesitate to give his vote in favour of the amendment of the noble lord, which appeared best calculated to maintain the principle of the bill, and yet at the same time, by admitting extensive inquiry, would enable them to devise the most practicable remedies for mitigating its pressure.

Motion withdrawn, amendment carried, and committee appointed.

CHURCH RATES.

MARCH 3, 1837.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the Order of the Day, for the House to resolve itself into a committee of the whole House, on that part of his Majesty's Speech, which related to Church-rates.

The right hon. gentleman, in a speech of considerable length and ability, propounded the government plan, and concluded by moving the adoption of the following resolution:—"That it is the opinion of this committee, that for the repair and maintenance of parochial churches and chapels in England and Wales, and the due celebration of divine worship therein, a permanent and adequate provision be made out of an increased value given to church lands, by the introduction of a new system of management, and by the application of the proceeds of pew-rents; the collection of church-rates ceasing altogether, from a day to be determined by law: and that, in order to facilitate, and give early effect to this resolution, the Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury be authorised to make advances on the security, and repayable out of the produce, of such church lands."

SIR R. PEEL had not the slightest wish to enter upon a discussion of the details of this measure, thinking, as he did, that it would be much better to reserve the discussion of a matter of such serious importance for that period when such discussion might be expected to end in some practical result; and, above all, in order that they might have an opportunity of investigating the plan proposed by the right hon. gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), as the principles of that measure were not quite so apparent to him as to the right hon. gentleman. At the same time he should be sorry, on this occasion, to omit any reference to the impressions made on his mind by the statements of the right hon. gentleman. He thought that nothing could be more satisfactory to those who concurred with him in opinion, than the declaration made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the necessity of maintaining the Established Church. He had no fault to find with this position; but he doubted whether in practice this measure was in exact conformity with this principle. The right hon. gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) said, that he repudiated altogether the voluntary principle. But did his repudiating the voluntary principle necessarily imply that it was incumbent on the state to support the established religion? If there could be any doubt as to the intention of the right hon. gentleman, his own express words left no doubt as to the principle on which he meant to act. The right hon. gentleman said, that he would not leave it to the voluntary principle to find means of defence; and he added, that it ought not to be entrusted to the voluntary principle to find means of religious instruction. The right hon. gentleman had said, that it was at least as incumbent on them to provide a religious establishment as to provide an army or a navy for the purposes of defence. The moment the right hon. gentleman laid down that position, he excluded altogether the question of religion, or conscientious scruples; because, when the state considers it necessary to maintain an army, it does not inquire whether all persons approve of war, or whether they think it necessary that an army should be maintained; but on an enlarged and comprehensive view, they stated that the army must be maintained by general taxation, and they never inquired of any individuals their opinions as to peace or war. All that was necessary was, to call upon all to contribute equally. If, then, the right hon. gentleman said, that it was equally incumbent on them to maintain a religious establishment as to maintain a fleet, surely it was equally incumbent on them all to contribute towards the support of that establishment, without inquiry into the peculiar opinions of each. The right hon. gentleman had even said, that it was the duty of the state to provide free sittings for the poor of the country. But did the right hon. gentleman propose that the state should provide free sittings? Not at all. The right hon. gentleman abandoned all means whereby the state could provide free sittings; and notwithstanding all his professions, and the resolution that it was necessary to maintain an established religion, the right hon. gentleman meant that this measure should have this effect—that the state should not provide free sittings, but that the church should. He would say nothing as to the lessees at present. There had been no time to consider as to the justice of refusing lessees of church property to contribute towards the maintenance of the church. But he did not object to this measure on the part of the lessees; he objected to it on much higher grounds than the interests of the lessees. The noble lord had said that the church community had abandoned the idea of requiring lessees to contribute towards the endowment of poor livings. Now he thought that the lessees were at least as likely to concur in any measure, the object of which was to provide for the small livings of ministers of religion in populous places—they were as likely to concur as any who at present contributed. But by this proposed measure, not only were the Dissenters relieved from contributing to the maintenance of the fabric of the church, but the landholders were relieved also, and the charge was continued on the lessees of the church. Admitting, for the sake of the argument, the claims of the Dissenters to be relieved on the ground of conscientious scruples, he would ask, why should the landholders of England, who were members of the Established Church, be relieved also? Nothing appeared to him more just than the principle laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the necessity of the state providing for the establishment; but it appeared to him, that it would naturally sever the connection between the church and the state if they were not only to abolish church-rates, but to throw the whole weight of them on the church. He did not understand why the landholders of England, who were members of the Established Church, should be relieved altogether from all charges for the maintenance of the fabric of the church. If they made up the deficiency by direct contribution from the state, of course his objections would not apply; but at present the effect of the measure would be to throw the whole charge upon the lessees of church property, relieving altogether those upon whom there was the strongest obligation to contribute, namely, those members of the church who were possessed of large property which had been acquired or inherited subject to this charge. He admitted, with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that unfortunately differences had arisen on this question. As one of those who were anxious to support the church, he would willingly come to a settlement of this question; but he must at the same time say, that a great difference of opinion prevailed on the subject of church-rates, that the opposition to them was mainly confined to the large towns. But he had also no doubt that in rural parishes—unless dissent prevailed to a considerable extent, and the majority of the inhabitants were Dissenters—he thought that with respect to the great mass of the rural parishes, he might venture to say, that they were almost universally of opinion, that they would be better if left alone. Not only did they not wish to be relieved, but he believed that they felt a pride when they looked on the venerable fabric which was their chief architectural ornament; and, apart from religious associations, he believed that, so far from relieving their tender consciences, they would offend them by relieving them from the obligation of supporting their church. He spoke of the rural parishes. But, waiving the consideration whether or not this charge was fairly laid on the lessees of the church, if he came to the conclusion, that the lessees were so circumstanced that you could extract from them, in some way or other, a revenue of £250,000 a-year—if he came to that conclusion, then he should feel bound to contend, that there was a prior claim upon that annual revenue than any that could rise from the obligation of supporting the fabric of the church. He would ask any hon. gentleman to consider the facts he would briefly state to the House. In the diocese of Chester there were thirty-eight parishes, containing an aggregate population of 860,000 souls, whilst there was only church-room at present provided for 97,000, so that seven-eighths of the population in these thirty-eight districts were without any church accommodation. In the diocese of York there were twenty districts, with an aggregate population of 502,000, and yet church accommodation was provided for only 48,000, or one-eleventh of the whole population. In the diocese of Lichfield and Coventry there were sixteen parishes, having an aggregate population of 235,000; and there was church accommodation for only 29,000. From what fund were they to provide church accommodation? If they could prove that, with perfect justice to the church, without diminishing the independent station of the bishops, and without injury to the interests of the lessees—if, above all, they could raise such a sum as £250,000 more than had hitherto been calculated upon, could they negative the claims of those populous districts, which ought first to be attended to—or could they bestow that revenue better than in providing religious instruction for those who had not now the means of hearing the word of God? He would not then enter into the arguments that had been used, but he hoped that the noble lord had expressed the intention of the government with respect to the new revenues charged upon the pew-rents, as he readily admitted that it would be just to require from those who had the means of payment, and were known to be in affluent circumstances, or rather in comfortable circumstances, that they should pay for the benefit of a pew. But with respect to the rural parishes, not merely as regarded the destitute poor, but the farmers of the country, a different principle should be adopted. If, for the first time for centuries, they were to be driven from those pews which they looked upon as a species of freehold, to which they were entitled without any payment, it would create in their minds a strong feeling of disgust. But he understood the noble lord (Howick) to make a clear distinction with respect to rural parishes, and to give an assurance that they would not be subjected to the operation of this measure, for the purpose of extracting a revenue. He would not then enter further upon this subject. He merely stated the impression made on his mind by the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and he would venture to say, that if there was a sufficient fund disposable, the first claim was, either to raise the stipend of those ministers who had not £200 a-year, or to attend to the still more pressing demand—to raise from the condition of religious destitution between seven-eighths and nine-tenths of the people, who had not the means of hearing what that religion was of which they boasted so much.

The House resumed; the committee to sit again.

SPAIN.

MARCH 10, 1837.

In the debate arising out of some remarks by Viscount Mahon's relative to the foreign policy of government, and more particularly as respected the present position of this country with regard to Spain—

SIR ROBERT PEELE, in reply to Lord Palmerston, said, that the noble lord had, on this occasion, pursued the course which he could say, from experience, the noble lord had uniformly pursued, and with the same result, whenever the foreign policy of this country was brought under consideration. After having spent three-quarters of an hour defending his policy, and having put one-half of his supporters in a comfortable state of repose, and not having gained from the other half a single sympathetic cheer in favour of his acts, he then found it necessary to disturb the soundness of some and to excite the enthusiasm of others, by imputing to his opponents a participation in the love of despotism, as if it were necessary to be partisans of Don Carlos because they disapproved of the policy of the noble lord—as if it were not possible to entertain a doubt about the justice of the noble lord's acts, and the result of his foreign policy, without, at the same time, wishing to check the career of improvement in Spain, and to blast her hopes of acquiring settled and constitutional institutions. He, for one, openly disavowed all participation in the principles, or sympathy with the cause of Don Carlos. He was only repeating language he had emphatically used before. If he acted in the fulfilment of a treaty, by which the Queen of Spain was recognised as the ally of this country, was it necessary to claim credit for not entering into any secret artifice for the purpose of preventing her success? He would not say that the objects of British policy would be advanced by the success of Don Carlos. He begged to state also, distinctly, that he wished to see Spain enjoy settled liberties, and that under such institutions as may be most conducive to her happiness, and best calculated by their slow progress to establish her settled freedom. But, while he entertained these opinions, at the same time, he must tell the House that he believed that our policy was defeating the cause of improvement—defeating it by our meddling and interference, and our deserting the principle of our support, namely, the principle of non-intervention; and by our having taken a course neither calculated to raise the character of England, nor to acquire the affections of Spain. The noble lord had twice intimated that his noble friend had regretted the gloomy prospects of despotism. His noble friend had expressed no such regret. Had not the noble lord himself, at the conclusion of his speech, stated that his noble friend had declared that Spain had been reduced to the state of degradation into which it had fallen by the long continuance of arbitrary government? The noble lord had twice repeated this passage in his noble friend's speech. How then could the noble lord feel regret at the partiality manifested by his noble friend for despotism? The noble Lord had told them what were the objects of the Quadruple Treaty; he would like to hear the noble lord declare whether the objects of that treaty had been fulfilled. At the same time, he must again repeat that that treaty having been ratified, must, in his opinion, be fulfilled; and that not only in the letter but in the spirit. But he must say, that it was competent for him to entertain different opinions from the noble Lord as to the original policy of that treaty. The noble lord had told the House that the objects of that treaty were four or five in number. The first was to protect the interest of our commerce in the Peninsula. He would ask the noble lord how far had he succeeded in that object? The noble Lord had stated, that the British merchants in Spain were all satisfaction. The noble lord would have an opportunity of giving a distinct opinion on that head very shortly, as he believed that an hon. friend of his intended to bring under the notice of the House, in a separate discussion, apart from politics, the present state of our commerce in Spain. Did the noble lord mean to say, apart from the complaints of our merchants, that the general policy of Spain towards this country was favourable? Did the noble lord mean to say, that the feelings of the inhabitants of the Peninsula had been improved very much towards this country? Look to Portugal. Did the noble lord pride himself on our commercial prosperity there? Since the establishment of our noble lord's free institutions in Portugal, since the triumph of the cause of Donna Maria, did the noble lord mean to say, that the trade of this country had been put on a more favourable footing? There had been universal complaints on the part of the merchants of this country of the hostility manifested towards the commerce of England. The original object of the Quadruple Treaty was to furnish naval aid for the purpose of effecting a blockade. It was discovered that they had no right to establish a blockade, that it was against the law of nations. The aid to be afforded to Spain was simply naval aid; but how could the noble lord reconcile with the treaty the suspension of the Foreign Enlistment Act, by which 10,000 of our own forces were sent to the armies of the Queen of Spain? They had afforded, therefore, military aid—but to one of the belligerent parties only. These forces were nominally in the pay of the Queen of Spain if they received any; but did not this country supply them with arms, ammunition, &c.? The noble lord wanted to establish free institutions in Spain. Was the noble lord delighted with the institutions he had established in Portugal? The noble lord had afforded his moral aid as far as he could go. If the noble lord was satisfied, what was the object of having six sail of the line in the Tagus? Was it to protect British merchants? There was an example of the prepossession in favour of the English name in Portugal. This was the affection and love which Portugal bore to the British name! In consequence of our former interference six sail of the line were requisite in order to protect the persons and property of British merchants. Another object of the noble lord was the pacification of the Peninsula. Had the noble lord succeeded in this object? No man of truth could assert at that moment that Spain was in a better state with respect to internal pacification than before we interfered at all. The noble lord spoke of the horrors committed by Don Carlos, and of the application of the Durango decree to British soldiers; and he had introduced it for the purpose of eliciting a cheer from his own side of the House. Why did not the noble lord inquire into the details of the abominations that had been committed on the other side? Why did he not mention the murder of the mother of Cabrera? He asked the noble lord, and the House, whether these scenes were not the result of the noble lord's own policy? He asked the noble lord whether any man could rejoice in such abominable and sanguinary excesses? The noble lord said, the object of our intervention in Spain was for the purpose of giving Spain an established and settled form of government. Had Spain, in consequence of our intervention, a greater prospect of obtaining established, settled, and permanent institutions. The noble lord had talked of the universal respect entertained for the British name. Did the noble lord mean to say, that the people of Spain cordially co-operated with General Evans? Had they not shown a manifest jealousy of the gallant troops of England? Had they not shown a manifest reluctance at their triumphs, and an aversion that her institutions should be established by their means? Their interference had been attended with no good result in Spain up to this moment, and had not in the slightest degree tended to the establishment of a settled form of government in that country. The noble lord said, that our past policy had been most wise; that by confining our exertions to naval assistance, we had rescued ourselves from the risk of mixing this country up in the civil contests of Spain. If this were the opinion of the noble lord, it was not the opinion of the author of this pamphlet on the affairs of Spain, of which the noble lord, though he said he was not the author of it, at the same time avowed that he adopted all its sentiments. According to the policy of this writer, whose fame the noble lord envied so much, as expressed in the concluding paragraph of this pamphlet, which would now derive additional weight and importance from the opinion expressed upon it by the noble lord—according to the concluding paragraph of this pamphlet, the author appeared to be so distrustful of the success of our naval co-operation that he said—"A few troops sent to Spain, to which Spanish divisions would be attached, and a guarantee of a loan for which ample security would be given to us, are all that is wanted to make Spain tranquil, and England even more honoured and respected than she already is." Naval co-operation, it appeared then, was not sufficient; it was not so wise as the noble lord had described it. If the noble lord would but consult this pamphlet, of which he wished he was the author, he would find that a few troops, not acting by virtue of the suspension of the foreign enlistment act, but marching under the flag of England, were required to form the nucleus of the Spanish army, and a loan for which England was to be the guarantee, in order to accomplish the tranquillity of Spain. The writer of this pamphlet then proceeded to observe: "We repeat the hope that such a measure may be proposed by the government to parliament, or by parliament to the government, and that it may be executed with the energy and determination that should always characterize the policy of England." The noble lord was of course waiting till this loan and this military co-operation were forced upon him by parliament. He fancied that the noble lord would have to wait a very long time before such would be the case; and if the noble lord, tired of waiting, were, proprio vigore, to make such a proposition to parliament, which had shown itself unwilling to originate the measure—if the noble lord did so, he thought he could venture to assure him that the same congratulations which he had to-night heard from the hon. member for Shaftesbury, the same curiosa felicitas which had distinguished his labours on the present occasion, would attend him when he made his proposition for a levy of 10,000 men, and a large loan upon our guarantee. The noble lord said, that one object of the Quadripartite Treaty was to consolidate and cement our alliance with France. He should rather gather from the language of the noble lord to-night that this great and paramount object had not been altogether attended by it. The noble lord further asserted, that our alliance with France was founded upon a consideration of mutual interests and an identity of institutions. [Mr C. Wood, "He said nothing about that."] The hon. gentleman declared that the noble lord had said nothing about it. He feared that the secretary for the admiralty had been visited by that fit of somnolency to which he had already alluded during great part of the noble lord's speech, reflecting, probably, that the estimates were the proper subject of debate, and that all the various topics which had sprung up on the occasion had very little to do with the matter. He begged to assure the hon. member, however, that the hon. gentleman was wrong. The noble lord did state that an intimate alliance subsisted between the people of England and of France, founded upon institutions of a similar character and an identity of interests. He agreed in the hope expressed by the noble lord. He sincerely trusted that the good understanding between England and France might be founded upon an intimate and sound feeling of good will and mutual interest. He did hope that the national jealousies which had so long subsisted between the people of these two countries were daily vanishing under the genial influence of a better knowledge of each other's character, and a proper regard for their respective commercial advantages. He believed that a good understanding with France was a matter of very great importance to this country, and he should be glad to see it promoted by every means in our power. But he did not think that with a view to confirm this friendly understanding it was necessary to adopt a treaty, binding this country to interfere in the affairs of Spain. There was some reason to fear that the treaty had not been religiously adhered to. At least there was, he must say, an extraordinary absence of all mention of the co-operation of France in the speech of his Majesty at the opening of parliament, while, on the other hand, there was a paragraph in the speech of the king of the French, at the opening of the Chambers in Paris, which, without being intended to cast the least stigma upon our policy, certainly pointed in unequivocal terms to the inexpediency of any nation permitting its subjects to appear as soldiers in another country under any other colours than its own. That paragraph, to say the least of it, was calculated to awaken some unpleasant reflections in the minds of all Englishmen who read it; and added to the marked silence of all mention of our good understanding with France in the speech of his Britannic Majesty, and the strong terms of reproach on the conduct of the French government in respect to that treaty contained in this pamphlet, of which the noble lord wished so much he had been the author; all these circumstances, taken into consideration, must lead one to the unwelcome suspicion, that, as far as our good understanding with France was concerned, this quadruple treaty had not been quite so successful as had been anticipated. He did not concur with those who complained of the conduct of France in this affair, or think that there were any just grounds of complaint against France for having violated the obligations which she took upon herself by that treaty. When the noble lord proposed to France that she should march into Spain and occupy certain parts of that country, the noble lord might argue that that did not amount to a co-operation with Spain; he might call it translimitation, or any other name he pleased; but he was rejoiced that France had not taken the noble lord's advice, and had refused to march into Spain as the noble lord desired. He rejoiced at it because the experience of all history, and that of Spain in particular, taught them that though France might march into the Spanish territories, and, by so doing, succeed in producing a temporary adjustment of hostilities—that adjustment could only be temporary, and would not end in the permanent establishment of good and independent government. That, however, was the object they ought to have in view—not such a system of government as they might fancy abstractly the best, but such as might best suit the character and manners of the Spanish people. He wished to see as little despotism enter into the scheme of such a government, and as much liberty as the genius of the people would allow of; and, in fact, that the result should be to lay the foundations of liberty, concord, and order. What he (Sir R. Peel) doubted was, whether this desirable consummation was likely to be attained by this treaty, which bound England to a certain line of policy; and least of all had he expected such a course to have been espoused by the noble lord opposite, who had so frequently lauded the principle of non-intervention in that House. He thought it had been clearly laid down by Mr. Fox, and all the other Whig authorities, that whatever might be our advantages in trade, or our own domestic policy, we were not to attempt to impose them upon other countries, but to leave other people to judge what institutions were most congenial to their circumstances. He believed that this principle was a wise one, subject, of course, to certain exceptions. In Portugal, for instance, from our peculiar commercial arrangements with that country, and by our treaty of offensive and defensive alliance with her, we were bound to defend her from foreign attack; but even this arrangement gave us no right to interfere in the internal policy of that country. But with Spain we had no such treaty, and certainly had no right to interfere there in a question of succession to the crown. It might be very true that the inhabitants of the Basque provinces were very unwise in choosing to retain their peculiar privileges to the exclusion of the rest of Spain; it might be desirable that they should entertain the same doctrines on the subject of free trade as the right hon. President of the Board of Trade; but that was no reason why we should make war upon them. It was from no mercenary views that they rallied round the standard of him whom they conceived to be their legitimate sovereign; and every one must regret the obstacles which such conduct threw in the way of the peaceful settlement of Spain; he (Sir Robert Peel) must still regret, that foreigners, and particularly countrymen of his, should be engaged in destroying men who were acting upon conscientious motives, and in the discharge of what they conceived to be their duty. He did not believe that from a force so employed any ultimate good could result. If Spain was divided between two parties, the one perfectly contemptible in numbers, and occupying but a few square leagues, as was alleged, why could not the Queen's government, by her own exertions, establish its power? The noble lord admitted that Gomez marched all through Spain, and that he met with no insurrection; but the noble lord said he found no support. The noble lord said, that when Don Carlos kept to the mountains he was secure, but when he ventured into the plains he was to be crushed at once; but Gomez had marched through the whole of Spain; and this was urged by the noble lord as an argument that Spain was in favour of the Queen. Either he must think that Gomez was gifted with a military genius amounting almost to inspiration, or else, which seemed probable, he must have found efficient aid in some lurking attachment to the cause to which he was engaged. Be this as it might, either one party greatly preponderated over the other, or were pretending, in the language of churchwardens, "to abate a nuisance" in Spain. But we were first to determine what was a nuisance. And when we had done that, would the noble lord state one reason why England should put itself forward to abate a nuisance in Spain? But if it were a mere nuisance—not a civil war, but something in the nature of one—why could not the government of the Queen of Spain, with the good will, according to the noble lord, of all the great towns, and all the landed proprietors of the country, in its favour—why could not the government in possession put it down? Or would the noble lord account for this phenomenon—would he tell the House how it was that 10,000,000 Spaniards did not rally, and, by a single effort, crush the "rebel force" of 30,000 men? His noble friend (Lord Mahon) had very sensibly asked how it happened, that, out of that army of 30,000 men, 313,000 should have been returned, on the authority of the Spanish government, as the number of the Carlists killed? He would tell his noble friend why this was so. It was because this country had already supplied 313,000 muskets; and that was the precise number as he would find by the printed return—and it was probably deemed but a decent compliment to give the credit of one death to each British musket. However, if the fact were, as they on that side of the House concluded, that Spain was at present unequally divided between two principal parties, one of which could not overcome the other, except by assistance from Great Britain, of arms, and men, and military stores; he said, that the history of all European countries—but that of Spain in particular—led him to entertain the apprehension, that, although our arms might establish a temporary peace in Spain—although by the moral aid and joint political exertions of France and England, they might put down Don Carlos, and sweep the provinces of Navarre and Biscay of all the irregular troops which now occupy them, they would never by such means establish permanent tranquillity in that country. He entertained, he repeated, the most serious apprehension, that the government which was to succeed, founded, as it would be, on the intervention of foreign bayonets, would not, in the end, lead to so settled and permanent an establishment—would not give such lasting securities for the preservation of liberty and order, as it would have combined if England had permitted these parties—relying on their own energies, and not taught to repose a false confidence in foreign interference and our assistance to settle their own disputes, and if England had allowed their government a period of twelve months to take root in its own soil, in the affections of its own people, without any attempt at intervention. In that case the stability of such a government being founded upon the efforts, and sanctioned by the attachment of the people, would have supplied far greater security for liberty, and peace, and order, than any foreign intervention could ever afford.

Viscount Mahon declined bringing forward any motion on the subject, and expressed himself contented with the discussion which had taken place.

CHURCH-RATES.

MARCH 13, 1837.

The House in committee on the resolution concerning church-rates, proposed on the 3d of March. The resolution having been read,—

SIR ROBERT PEELE rose thus early, because he desired to have an opportunity of submitting to the House, in a connected form, the view he took of the question which the resolution involved, because he knew by past experience, that when any member of that House postponed to a late period of the night the observations which he might think it necessary to make, he generally found great difficulty in carrying on a connected chain of reasoning; and it became, under such circumstances, not only difficult to preserve continuity and connection, but most difficult to avoid noticing observations made in the course of the discussion; and still further, because in addressing the House at a late hour of the evening, there existed so much temptation to that vehemence and asperity which might add something to the animation of debate, but nothing to its effect in influencing the reason or deciding the judgment. He wished in approaching this question to accept the invitation of the right hon. gentleman opposite (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), and enter upon the discussion in a temper purified from party feeling, forgetful of party predilections, and full of an earnest desire to discuss the question upon its real merits. For these reasons, then, had he resolved to present himself thus early to the House, and enter upon the consideration of the question then before them with an anxious desire to effect its early and satisfactory settlement. He need hardly say, that he rose under a deep sense of the importance of the subject. He was not insensible to its inherent difficulties, and he had not forgotten, that those difficulties had been much increased by the proposal which the King's government made in the year 1834, which proposal was tantamount to a condemnation of the present system. On account of the interval, too, which had elapsed since that measure was proposed, and on account of its subsequent abandonment, the difficulties of the question had been considerably augmented. Of all this he was fully conscious. There was no hon. member who could fail to be aware, that the subject of church-rates had assumed an entirely new position, in consequence of the proposition which three years ago had proceeded from the responsible ministers of the Crown; still he did feel impelled by a paramount sense of duty to state the grounds upon which he had arrived at a different conclusion from the King's government on this most important occasion. Not disguising from himself any one of the difficulties which accompanied an examination of the subject, and not insensible to the difficulties inseparable from its settlement, he yet should say, that there were none of them at all comparable to the difficulties necessarily attendant upon an acquiescence in the measure of the government. In speaking of the plan which in the present session of parliament had been submitted to the House, he could not otherwise describe it than as a plan for the total abolition of church-rates,—that the land and other property in this country, whether held by Dissenters or by persons in communication with the Church of England, should in future be free from all liability to the payment of church-rates, and that in all time coming it should be the church itself, and not the state, that was to provide for the expenses attendant upon the repair of the fabric of the church. That was the proposition laid before parliament, and upon that the House had to decide. The question he should proceed to consider in three separate points of view—first, as a financial measure; secondly, as to its being in conformity to authorities respected in that House; and thirdly, in reference to its conformity to sound policy and justice. He desired, in the first place, to submit the merits of the plan to the test of calculation, next to that of authority and reason, and lastly to that of justice and sound policy. It appeared to him the first of these subjects to which he proposed to call the attention of the House was in the highest degree important, for it was to his financial operations that the Chancellor of the Exchequer referred with the utmost confidence. The right hon. gentleman had acknowledged, that if he were wrong in these, he must fail altogether; by his calculations he was willing to stand or fall. If his estimates were incorrect, or his inferences erroneous, the right hon. gentleman unreservedly admitted, that his whole scheme must fall to the ground, by the application of that test, the right hon. gentleman was willing to be judged. No one could be more sensible than he was of the difficulty of examining in a popular assembly the data and the results of an arithmetical calculation; he therefore earnestly requested that hon. members would lend their attention to his observations, which he hoped to make clear to all who heard the statement, or made themselves acquainted with the plan of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. gentleman assumed, that a certain charge was to be provided for, amounting to £261,000, at which sum he estimated, on an average of three years, the annual payment of fines to bishops, and deans and chapters. Those formed the only data upon which the plan rested; but if the right hon. gentleman had taken more than three years, he would have found the average less than £261,000. There was no doubt, that the more the range was extended, the more would the amount of the average be diminished; but for the purpose of his argument, it was not necessary that he should establish the fallacy of the average; he would assume, that the right hon. gentleman was correct, and it was therefore established, that he had to make provision for an annual payment of £261,000. The Chancellor of the Exchequer then proposed to allot a sum of £250,000 for the repairs of the fabrics of the church. These two sums together gave a total of £511,000; that was the permanent charge for which, in the first instance, the right hon. gentleman had to provide. The charge of managing that fund he wholly omitted. He had proposed, that the management of an immense landed property, with mines, houses, and tithes, should devolve on a commission composed of a certain number of archbishops and bishops, who had no direct pecuniary or personal interest in the advantageous management of that property; with these it was proposed to associate a certain number of official persons, whose time already was exceedingly occupied with other matters; and then there were to be added three paid commissioners, on whom the actual practical duty he presumed would devolve. As the House must well know, the property to which he referred was distributed throughout England and Wales; it was subject to various descriptions of management—to mortgages, to settlements, to varieties of tenure, and to different customs; he therefore apprehended, that the charge of management would bear a very large proportion indeed to its rental, to say nothing of the general objection to the state becoming a great landed proprietor, and the disadvantages inseparable from those who exercised the management being persons having no direct interest in the land. The land revenues of the Crown amounted to £240,000; its management intrusted to a board was much less complicated, the surveys much less expensive than those for the church property, yet the charge for management was £25,000; the estimate given him was £28,000, but he preferred stating it at £25,000, for he wished to keep within the actual amount. The gross rental of this property had been estimated at £1,322,000; the receipts by the deans and chapter, &c., was £541,000. He thought, then, he should not estimate it extravagantly in fixing the charge for management at £30,000. Assuming that the total charge of £511,000, given by the right hon. gentleman, to be correct, the sum of £30,000 added to it for management gave £541,000. It had been stated to them how it was proposed to provide for that charge. The right hon. gentleman had said, that £261,000 was the amount of fines, and he assumed the average period of the duration of leases for lives and years was twenty-four years, with an allowance of seven per cent. to tenants upon renewals: taking all these for granted, he inferred the gross amount of the landed property to be £1,323,000. The right hon. gentleman then said, he had a deferred annuity of £1,323,000 to commence at the end of twenty-four years; and estimated the present value of that at £516,000. In speaking on this subject he did not wish to take any thing for granted; he wished the House to be satisfied that every thing stated had been proved; and if he did not succeed in making himself clearly understood, he begged hon. members might interrupt him, their doing so would save the time of the House. It appeared, then, that £516,000 was the present value, while £541,000 was to be provided for; there was, therefore, a deficiency of £25,000. An annuity of £541,000 for twenty-four years, at four per cent., would be worth £8,248,607, if converted into capital at the present time. There remained a difference of £782,000 between the specified sum of £541,000, and the value of the landed property of the church, which, according to the calculations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, amounted to £1,323,000. Now, an annuity (for ever) of £782,000, deferred for twenty-four years, at four per cent., was worth £7,626,875. Therefore, the loss of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, upon his financial plan, assuming that all the data of the right hon. gentleman were correct, would, if estimated with reference to the present capital, be exactly £621,732. The loss sustained by taking the deferred annuity, in accordance with the Chancellor of the Exchequer's plan, as compensation for granting the proposed arrangement, to commence immediately, would be upwards of £620,000, and equivalent to an annuity of £24,869. He was here assuming that the data and the calculations of the right hon. gentleman were all correct. He, however, doubted their correctness; and he did hope that, whatever might be the opinion of the House with regard to the principle of church-rates, hon. members would all see the necessity of declining to embark upon this financial speculation until they should have acquired more accurate information than they at present possessed, and had better means of judging as to the sufficiency of the ground upon which the proposed change was sought to be established. The Chancellor of the Exchequer calculated the average subsisting term of leases, both for lives and for a term of years together, to be twenty-four years. With reference to this part of the subject he would beg to observe, that it was easy enough to calculate the average subsisting terms, where the terms were for years; but, unless they were made acquainted with the whole of the leases for lives—unless they could know the exact proportion which the leases for three lives bore to those for two lives, and which both these descriptions of leases bore to the leases for a single life, it would be exceedingly difficult to draw a correct inference, or strike anything like a fair average. He had had access to the leases for lives in the case of one bishopric in England,—he alluded to the bishopric of Gloucester. In that bishopric he found that there were 102 leases for lives; seventy-five of these were held on a tenure of three lives—seventy-five (he begged the House to observe) out of 102; and the average subsisting term of these seventy-five leases was not less than nearly thirty-eight years. Suppose that the average subsisting term of ecclesiastical property was twenty-six years instead of twenty-four, this slight change would involve the complete destruction of all the right hon. gentleman's calculations, because he would then have to meet the permanent charge of £541,000 for twenty-six years instead of twenty-four. The fact of his not coming into possession until two years after the stated period, would totally derange the right hon. gentleman's calculations. Suppose it were to turn out that the average subsisting term was thirty years instead of twenty-four, the loss to the public would amount to many millions. He was speaking merely of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's financial plan; he would not mix up with his present observations anything of politics—anything that did not properly belong to the merits of his scheme, considered as a financial proposition. Suppose, for argument's sake, that the average subsisting term was neither more nor less than twenty-four years; suppose that this fact had been positively ascertained, though he must observe that it was utterly impossible to ascertain the average subsisting term—to acquire a knowledge of the real value of the church's rental, without a minute and accurate survey of the value of the leases respectively,—conceding it to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he was right in assuming the average term to be twenty-four years, still he defied the right hon. gentleman to ascertain the real value of the rental of the church lands. Suppose that the larger proprietors held leases of longer terms, that their leases were for three lives, and that the smaller were for two lives or for one, this variation would not affect the average subsisting term, but it would influence, in a material degree, the value of the reversion. He would ask the House, then, whether there did not exist a great probability, that in proportion to the value of a property, care would be taken to renew the lease by virtue of which it was held? In case it should appear that the leases of valuable properties had been, generally speaking, renewed, after payment of the proper fine, upon a life falling in, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would then find himself in this position:—He would have calculated with accuracy (so it was, for argument's sake, conceded) the average subsisting term, but would have afforded no indication whatever of the real value of the rental which, at the expiration of this term, the state would receive in lieu of its permanent charge of the church. Admitting, then, that the average subsisting term was twenty-four years, he repeated, that unless the right hon. gentleman had access to the whole number of lives, and knew the value of the leases in each, it would be impossible for the right hon. gentleman to draw any inference as to the value of the aggregate rental. It was quite evident that the value of these leases in the aggregate depended on the value of the lives in each separate case. The fact whether the lives named in a lease were those of children or of persons more advanced in life—whether they were of the male or of the female sex, particularly in the case of children, would make the greatest possible difference. If the life in one of these leases were that of a young child, the right hon. gentleman must ascertain whether its age was seven or fourteen years before he could determine the value of the life; and he must go through this painful and laborious inquiry, in every case, before he could ascertain the aggregate, or strike with accuracy an average number of years. The next assumption of the right hon. gentleman was, that seven per cent. was the average rate of interest allowed on the renewal of leases. Here, again, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer were in error, and if seven per cent. were not found to be the average rate of interest, his calculations were wholly erroneous, and his entire plan must fall to the ground. The right hon. gentleman, in support of his view, had produced some calculations with reference to the see of Durham. He, however, must protest against any general inference being drawn from the circumstances of that particular see. The property in that see consisted in a great part of mines, and a very large rate of interest was allowed in Durham upon the renewal of these leases—a rate of interest so high as nine per cent. He need not enter into details upon this subject, further than to state, that special reasons existed in that diocese by which the value of land was affected. He alluded chiefly to what was termed a “way-leave,” or permission to pass over the lands, which prevailed throughout that see, and which was a natural reason for the allowance of a larger rate of interest on renewals. Again, then, he affirmed, if the right hon. gentleman were wrong in saying, that seven per cent. was the average rate of interest, that his calculations must altogether fall to the ground. He believed, that the average rate of interest allowed upon those renewals was considerably less than seven per cent.; and in making this statement he was justified by the result of an inquiry which he had instituted with a view to ascertain exactly what was the practice with regard to this matter. His inquiry extended to the dioceses of Canterbury, London, Winchester, Lincoln, Chichester, Oxford, and Salisbury; and to ascertain the practice with regard to renewals he put the questions and received the answers which he would read to the House.

“1. When a lease for lives or years is renewed, what measures do you take in order to ascertain the value of the property?—I employ a respectable surveyor to survey his property, and to make a report of the annual value and outgoings, so as to show me the net annual value clear of all deductions.

“2. The value having been ascertained, how do you calculate the sum which should be paid for the renewal of leases on lives?—I multiply the net annual value so ascertained by such number of years' purchase as (allowing the lessee to make five per cent. of the money to be paid by him) the Northampton mortality tables allow for the benefit to the lessee of adding a life or lives of his own selection, taking into consideration the ages of the existing life or lives, and taking for granted that the lessee will make the best selection.

“3. Do you apprehend that the estates belonging to the prebendaries, who are corporations sole, are managed on the same principles?—For the most part. Prebendaries being corporations sole, who have renewed leases for lives, under my observation, I have adopted the same principles.”

Thus it appeared that the rate of interest in respect of these episcopal lands was five, and not seven per cent. The individual of whom he made the inquiry was Mr. Hodgson, who had an extensive charge of the management of ecclesiastical rents. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer would no doubt say, that, in many instances, seven per cent., eight per cent., and even nine per cent., was allowed; and that, placing the cases in which the rate of interest was eight or nine per cent. against those in which only five was allowed, he was justified in striking the average at seven per cent. It was true, that, in the case of house property, a high rate of interest was allowed upon the renewal of leases; but never, except in extraordinary cases, upon leases of land. In the case of houses, seven, eight, and even nine per cent., might be allowed; for who would take the lease of a house, subject to its various incumbrances, without an allowance of more than five per cent.? A large rate of interest was allowed in the case of house property, because the lessee indemnified the church from three important charges—first, from all insolvencies of the actual tenants, and from recovery of the yearly rent by legal means; secondly, from the whole charge for repairs and new constructions; and, thirdly, from the charge of insuring against fire. It was, therefore, perfectly just that a distinction should be drawn between house and landed property, and that eight or nine per cent. should be allowed on the former, while it was only five per cent. on the latter. What was the result of the rates of interest, in connexion with these two distinct kinds of property, being confounded? Why, that even if he were to concede to the right hon. gentleman the position that the present rental of the church was £1,323,000, still, as the right hon. gentleman had made no allowance for the difference between household property and landed property, the House had no evidence whatever that the sum of £1,323,000, which it was assumed that they should be entitled to receive at the expiration of twenty-four years, would purchase anything like an annuity of £511,000. On this point he had consulted a gentleman eminent for the accuracy of his calculations, and the following were his answers to queries submitted to him:—“Queries:—The average improved rental of church leases is £1,323,000 a-year. It is estimated that, on the average, in twenty-four years, all the church leases will run out; and, therefore, there is a reversionary interest of £1,323,000 as a perpetual annuity, at the end of twenty-four years. Question the first—‘What annuity, to commence from the present time, is equivalent in value to the perpetual annuity of £1,323,000, to commence at the end of twenty-four years?’—Answer—‘The equivalent perpetual annuity, to commence immediately, is £516,190, computing the fee-simple at twenty-five years' purchase.’—Question the second—‘If this sum of £1,323,000 is derivable as to three-fourth parts thereof from the rents of land, and one-fourth part from the rack rents of houses, what annuity, to commence from the present time, is equivalent to the rent of £1,323,000 a-year, having regard to the perishable nature of household property, and the permanent nature of land?’—Answer—‘The equivalent perpetual annuity should, in this case, be £468,730, computing the land, as before, at twenty-five years' purchase, and the household property at sixteen two-fifths years' purchase. 'Taking the household property in fee-simple, however, to be worth fourteen and a-half years' purchase, instead of at sixteen two-fifths, which is a very moderate reduction, as compared with the reduction of land from thirty to twenty-five years' purchase, the perpetual annuity will be £452,300—Arthur Morgan, Equitable Assurance-office, March 10, 1836.' 'But the true proportion for the household property, the fee-simple of the land being reduced from thirty years to twenty-five years, was at thirteen and a fraction years' purchase. N.B. Taking the land at thirty years' purchase, the equivalent perpetual annuity on the whole property is £602,000.'

But the land was estimated at thirty years' purchase, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed a bonus of five years' purchase to encourage the lessees to buy out perpetuities. What did that right hon. gentleman propose to do with respect to household property? The owner of land which was equivalent in value to thirty years' purchase, might be very happy to be allowed to purchase at twenty-five years; but taking the interest in a lease of household property to be worth about sixteen or seventeen years' purchase, in order to induce the tenant in this case to purchase a perpetuity, it would be necessary to give him a corresponding advantage. If this advantage were given, it would be requisite to reduce the number of years' purchase of his house from sixteen and a-half to fourteen and a quarter, a very moderate reduction (as stated by Mr. Morgan), in order to enable the lessees of household property to purchase upon something like the same terms which were allowed to the lessees of land. The equivalent perpetual annuity would, in such case, be £452,300 to meet a demand of £541,000 per annum. Arguing, then, from the very data assumed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the permanent charge to be provided for would far exceed the amount, which, according to the proposed plan, was destined to meet it, and by assuming that the value of ecclesiastical property, of every description, was equivalent to twenty-five years' purchase, the Chancellor of the Exchequer precluded himself from compensating for the loss which he would thus sustain on the one hand, by increasing the charge on the other. Every man, the right hon. gentleman had said, might obtain a perpetuity at twenty-five years' purchase. It would surely, however, be vain (as every hon. member must perceive) to offer to a tenant of household property the option of purchasing at twenty-five years, while the property was confessedly not worth more to him than sixteen years' purchase; and they must, consequently, make a proportional deduction from the annual rental which they would be entitled to receive for the next twenty-four years—a deduction amounting to almost one-fourth of the whole, so that the annual income would be £452,000 instead of £541,000. Convert that sum into capital, and proceed with the proposed plan, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer might depend on it that the final loss on his financial scheme would amount to some millions. Supposing thirty years to be the average subsisting term, instead of twenty-four years, an annuity of £541,000, at four per cent., for thirty years, was worth £9,354,990. An annuity for ever of £782,000, deferred for thirty years, was worth only £6,027,630. The loss here would be most considerable. It would amount to three millions of money. Did not that single statement evince of what importance it was to ascertain with accuracy whether the average subsisting term were twenty-four years, and not to assume that term at random? And if, again, the rate of interest upon renewals was in a great variety of instances, as he had shown, not seven, but five per cent., ought not this fact alone to induce the House to act upon this subject with extreme caution? It was possible that some hon. gentleman, one of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's friends, might presently tell him of all the advantages which it was expected would be derived from an improvement in the value of church lands, an improvement which would take place the moment the tenure was changed. ["Hear."] As he had expected, hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to attach value to this argument; but he would show them that it was a complete fallacy; and that they would not derive 1s. of profit from this improved value. Why? Because they were going to permit the tenant to purchase at twenty-five years. Whenever, therefore, an improved value arose, it would be derived not by the state but by the tenant. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had endeavoured to make this plan exceedingly popular, by saying, that the "reserved fund" which would remain, after allocating the proceeds of church lands to the payment of fines, and to the maintenance of the fabric of the church, would be applied to the increase of the spiritual accommodation of the poor. The right hon. gentleman said, that he was really the friend of the poor, although it had been attempted on this subject to raise a prejudice against him, and that his answer to the charge of indifference to the interests of the poor was allocating this reserved fund, arising from the profits of his financial plan to the increase of the spiritual comforts of the poor. He should like to know what any hon. gentleman would give for the Chancellor of the Exchequer's reserved fund? Had he not shown the House that, according to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's plan, there was only £516,000 to meet £541,000, while, according to his calculation, the sum which was stated at £516,000, would not turn out to be more than £450,000, leaving an actual and present deficiency of £90,000 a-year in the financial plan of the right hon. gentleman. The essence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's plan consisted in selling the reversion to a property. He had very recently heard a high authority advance the following opinion:—"The church was, therefore, exactly in the position of an individual who was continually selling a reversion, which was just the most unprofitable of all means which an improvident person could resort to for the management of his property." This opinion he had heard from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he had profited by the sound doctrine which that right hon. gentleman had advanced upon the improvidence of selling a reversion. Was not the sale of a remote reversion, although condemned in the paragraph which he had quoted, the very essence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's plan? Was that right hon. gentleman justified in stating the term of twenty-five years arbitrarily as the term of years by the purchase of which, in every instance, a perpetuity was to be obtained? He contended that the application of the rule of twenty-five years to household property was utterly irreconcilable with justice. There were four sources of church property derived from land, and of them only one had been adverted to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. What did that right hon. gentleman propose doing with regard to mines, which formed a most important subject of consideration? He had given no explanation whatever of his views with regard to tithes. After next year, owing to the provision of the Tithe Commutation Act, this source of revenue would become fixed, varying only as a corn-rent. The calculation of the period of twenty-five years, upon which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had founded his arguments as perpetuities, had manifestly no relation whatever to houses; and to those tenants of the church whose property consisted of houses, it was manifestly unjust to say, "You shall be entitled to a perpetuity, like persons holding lands at twenty-five years' purchase." He never would consent that ecclesiastical property should be disposed of on terms not only so disadvantageous, but so unjust, to the proprietors in one case, and to the lessees in another. He could easily conceive a very wealthy proprietor to whom the holding of church lands was a great accommodation, from its being mixed with his own property, who had never used it for building purposes, and who had money at his command—he (Sir R. Peel) could readily believe, that to allow such a person to purchase lands in the neighbourhood of large towns, and convert it into building leases at twenty-five years' purchase, would be to put money in his pocket. But persons who had no particular object to attain by such land, no hope of gain, who had lived upon the land, who had not the means of raising money to purchase a perpetuity to convert it into an increased rent—he could believe, that exacting from such persons twenty-five years' purchase, might be the greatest possible injustice. The only plan, the only principle he contended which could be acted upon with justice, was, by making an actual valuation of property in all cases, and dealing with each individual for the purchase or sale of his interest. He should say, no doubt, give every consideration to the tenant's right, treat him with all indulgence; but he should also say, that the application of the invariable rule to purchase at twenty-five years, would be pregnant with the grossest inequality and injustice. The benefit would be to the rich man, who held land in the neighbourhood of towns; for if he could get possession of land so situated at twenty-five years' purchase, he might increase his annual income to a great extent. So much for the financial part of the measure. He did not impugn the calculations in all respects of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but he had stated grounds upon which they were entitled to doubt, whether that right hon. gentleman's assumptions could be safely relied upon. He would next proceed to the discussion of a part of the subject in which the House of course must take, and in which, certainly, he felt a much deeper interest—he meant the character of the proposed plan as it concerned the eternal principles of justice and of sound policy. The proposal was, that the whole of the rateable property of the country, whether held by Dissenters or not, should be discharged from the burden to which it had been subjected from time immemorial, and that an equivalent should be found for that burden by a charge upon the property of the church. The noble lord had stated the other night, that there was a manifest distinction between the charge for tithes and the charge for church-rates. He admitted that there was in some respects a distinction; but this could not be denied, that whatever difficulty there might have been in increasing the payment in particular instances, the principle of the laws of England had been for many ages, that the property of the parish should be responsible for the maintenance of the church. There might be, no doubt, a power on the part of the parishioners to defeat or postpone that payment, but could it be denied that the expectation under which nineteen-twentieths of the inhabitants of this country had inherited and purchased their property was, that this charge, existing from time immemorial, was a charge to which that property was legally subjected? In not one-twentieth of the cases in which property had been purchased, he would venture to say, had the purchasers given the full value for the property, under the supposition that they could defeat that charge; on the contrary, all purchasers had almost invariably assumed that the church-rate was a valid impost upon the property, and had accordingly claimed a corresponding deduction in the price. This plan then, proposing that the whole amount of the charge should be removed from the rateable property of the country, whether held by Dissenters or Churchmen, and that an equivalent should be drawn from the revenues of the church, was a perfect novelty, and was now for the first time broached. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said, that in supporting this plan he would rely upon very great authorities, not for the purpose of taunting any party with any possible inconsistency, but for the purpose of supporting his calculations by the opinion of those authorities, deliberately delivered, and which he had seen no reason to question. He should have thought that so skilful a debater as the right hon. gentleman would have touched with more lightness upon arguments derived from authority—the single authority upon which the right hon. gentleman had relied, having been derived from the precedent established in the case of the Irish Church. He must say, that the appeal to that precedent was rather ungenerous. When the consideration of the Irish Church had been first brought under their notice in the Speech from the Throne, they were distinctly told that the circumstances of Ireland were peculiar, that they were so far distinguished from those of England, as to require a separate consideration. When the measure had been brought forward by which church-rates were to be removed from property in Ireland, they had been distinctly told that the case was a special one, and ought to be considered on its special grounds, and yet now they were told by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the case of Ireland was applicable to England. “Make that,” said the right hon. gentleman, “which I told you was an exception, a general rule—make an example, which I told you was peculiarly and separately applicable to Ireland, a precedent which shall be and must be applied to England.” Let the House look at the preamble of the Church Temporalities Act. Did not that Act raise special differences in the case of the two countries, warranting a perfectly different course from that proposed by the right hon. gentleman opposite? Could he say, that in England it was convenient to dispense with ten bishops? And had not two additional bishops been appointed to districts which required the superintendence and care of episcopal authority? In arguing upon the Church Temporalities Act, you referred (said the right hon. baronet) to the distinction there was, in point of population, to the number of persons in Ireland who were not members of the Established Church, and the charge which was imposed upon the occupying tenant by making him responsible for the payment of church-rates, and the support of a church from which he derived no benefit. With the case of Ireland before you, with that Act before you, and to which you were a party, did you, in 1834, propose to follow the precedent of Ireland? You then knew there was church property in England; you had your attention specially called to it; you had the Irish Act then in existence upon the statute hook; but you did not invoke the Irish precedent as an example to be applied to England. No, you brought forward an act proceeding upon a totally different principle, an act certainly recognising the exemption of property from the charge of church-rates, but which, at the same time, distinctly maintained this great principle, that the charge of supporting the fabric ought to be borne by the state. And when you speak to me of authority, I will attempt to show you, so far as arguments are to be derived from authorities in matters of this kind, that you have no authority to appeal to in the Irish Act, but that from your own course, from your own acts, and from your own declarations, I am furnished with most powerful aid in support of my arguments, as far as that aid extends. He would take first (the right hon. baronet continued) the declaration of the noble lord who had proposed the Act for the regulation of the Church Temporalities in Ireland, and who, upon the following year, had proposed a plan for the substitution of another fund in lieu of church-rates. Lord Althorp, on April 21, 1834, the Irish Act having passed in the preceding year, and relieved the owners of property in Ireland from the charge of church-rates—that noble lord who had brought forward that Act, which, as he had said before, was one proceeding upon a totally different principle at the period alluded to, proposed that £250,000 should be paid out of the consolidated fund, and applied to the repairs of the church. After the discussion that arose upon the proposition, Lord Althorp stated in reply, “The principal argument used this evening has been, that no contribution ought to be made by the state out of the public funds, for the purpose of maintaining the places of worship belonging to the Established Church. Now, I entirely agree with my right hon. friend (Mr. Wynn), that it is the absolute duty of the state to provide places of worship for the poorer classes of this community.” There was a distinct recognition of the principle that it was the absolute duty of the state to provide places of worship for the poor. [Hear.] From the cheers of the right hon. gentleman opposite, he (Sir Robert Peel) supposed he was to infer that the present plan was not at variance with the declaration of Lord Althorp. But that declaration had been made after an amendment had been proposed by the hon. member for Middlesex, to the effect that no sum should be issued out of the consolidated fund for the repairs of the fabric, until it had been clearly ascertained that the church property was not able to bear the expense of those repairs; and, therefore, it was stated, not merely in forgetfulness of, but in direct collision with, the antagonist principle, as contended for by that hon. member, that Lord Althorp had expressed so decided an opinion on the subject. Upon the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Middlesex, a division took place. He (Sir Robert Peel) and all his friends supported government on the occasion, and, with their assistance, the numbers were, in support of Lord Althorp and his principle, 256, negating the amendment contending for the opposite principle by a majority of 116. Now, as the doctrine was aloft, that the “majority ought to govern the minority,” and as there was recorded a majority of 116 in favour of a principle which had never since been submitted to the House of Commons, or, at least, upon which the sense of the House of Commons had never since been taken, might not he, as far as authority was concerned, appeal to that decisive majority as a proof that the opinion of the House of Commons was in accordance with that of Lord Althorp, and that it was the absolute duty of the state to provide for the repairs of the fabric out of the public funds, as distinguished from those of the church? But it might be said, that that was in an unreformed parliament. No, it was the first parliament that had been elected after the passing of the Reform Bill, and could not be said to have been a parliament returned under Conservative auspices. That parliament was returned under the government of Lord Grey, at a time, too, when the noble lord (Lord John Russell) formed a part of the government; and the decision then come to by the House had never publicly been called in question by any proposal upon which the sense of the House had been taken. Still, continuing his arguments as derived from “authority,” he would refer to the declaration made in the report of a commission bearing date the 4th of March, 1836,—a commission not composed exclusively of churchmen, but one which included in it five members of his Majesty’s government. The report from which he was about to read, bore the signatures of the whole; and, amongst the rest, those of Lord Cottenham, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Lansdowne, Lord Melbourne, Lord John Russell, and Mr.

Spring Rice. They had to consider this very question—whether it was fitting that, for ecclesiastical purposes, a profit should be extracted from a different appropriation of church lands, and they had come to this conclusion:—“One mode of rendering those incomes less uncertain would be, to allow the existing leases, both for lives and for terms of years, to expire. But any plan for accomplishing this object must involve the necessity of borrowing money upon the security of the episcopal estates, in order to compensate the bishops for the loss of the fines which accrue to them under the present system, and which form an important part of their incomes. The practical result of such an operation would be, to transfer to the parties lending their money that interest in the episcopal estates which is now possessed by the lessees. We are not, therefore, prepared to recommend the adoption of any general measure for allowing the leases for lives and terms of years to expire; although, for the purpose of correcting, in some degree, the inconvenience now arising from the great variations in the annual amount of the episcopal incomes, we recommend that facilities should be afforded for the conversion of leases for lives into leases for terms of years.”

He apprehended that the noble lord (Lord John Russell,) when the report containing that recommendation had been laid upon the table, still adhered to the opinion that Lord Althorp was correct in the principle he had laid down, that in relieving the land from the charge to which it was subjected, the state, and not the church, ought to provide for the alteration; for, as a party to that report, the noble lord, in a few weeks after it was presented, had given expression to a similar opinion, in answer to a question put by his noble friend, Lord Stanley. His noble friend, on the occasion, said—“I avail myself of this opportunity to ask my noble friend whether it is his intention to bring in any measure this session on the subject of church-rates?” In reply to which, the noble lord (John Russell,) after stating that he would not be able to introduce a bill that session, observed, that by means of church-rates, or in some other way, it was expedient that the state should provide for the maintenance and repair of churches. He would say, it was rather strange, that the noble lord having had the whole subject of bishops' lands under his consideration, and having signed the report containing the recommendation quoted in March, 1836, and moreover, having so expressed himself in answer to Lord Stanley in June, 1836, should now be of opinion that ecclesiastical property should be differently settled and appropriated from the manner recommended by the church commissioners, and should be made available for the maintenance of the fabric of the church. The hon. member for Middlesex having on that occasion expressed his dissatisfaction at the answer of the noble lord, the noble lord in reply to the hon. member made a fuller and more complete declaration, and one which established the most conclusive proof that the plan now proposed was then repudiated by the high authority of the noble lord. He argued thus, in the same sense as that in which the right hon. gentleman had argued, not for the purpose of invidious taunts, by pointing at any change of opinion, but for the bonâ fide purpose of showing that the opposition, and his Majesty's government had, up to a very recent period, remained precisely of the same opinion—namely, that those church expenses ought to be borne by the state; and that by the profits which were derived from ecclesiastical revenues, there were other objects to be attained. The noble lord, on the occasion to which he had just alluded, said, “Whatever might be the anxiety of the Dissenters, they could not have been in doubt as to the opinions of the government.” Could the Dissenters have inferred from this that there was at the time a secret reservation on the part of the government that it was possible to derive the necessary amount of expenses to which the church-rates were applicable from other than the resources then proposed? The noble lord continued—“Two years ago Lord Althorp brought in a bill on the subject, in which the principle was declared, that church-rates should not be abolished, unless the state provided a substitute.” He had never said any thing inconsistent with that principle, or, at least, any thing to lead the Dissenters to suppose that ministers meant to abolish church-rates without an equivalent, or that equivalent was to be found in the revenues of the church. To that principle he had adhered, and to it he intended to adhere. Let the House observe, that this declaration had been made two months after the report had been made in which they declined to recommend that by which they would transfer the interest in the land from the trustees to those who lent money. That, together with the noble lord's declaration, he (Sir R. Peel) thought fully entitled them to infer that the noble lord adhered to the opinions of Lord Althorp. The noble lord added—"On various occasions he had explained his views to the Dissenters, and they were satisfied that he did not mean to bring forward any bill that would accomplish their wishes. He did not believe, therefore, that they were at all anxious that any measure should be introduced." Mr. Hume then said—"As far as he was acquainted with the wishes of the Dissenters, they never would consent that church-rates should be paid out of the general revenues of the country. Means to pay them ought to be found in the sinecure revenues of some of the deans and chapters." Upon which the noble lord observed, "That is a question upon which the House has not yet come to any decision." He would, however, say, that the House had come to a decision last session, and had, he would not say appropriated church-rates, but by the increase of small livings given increased accommodation out of the revenues of which the hon. gentleman had spoken. Now, so far as arguments deduced from authority went, had he not shown in support of his arguments, that they had the authority of the commissioners' report, bearing the signatures of five of his Majesty's present ministers, that they had the opinion of the majority of the House of Commons—a majority of 116, and that they had the opinion of his Majesty's government unequivocally and expressly declared at so recent a period as June, 1836? What then were the new circumstances which had arisen to induce this change, evinced in the proposal that church-rates should be abolished, and that an equivalent should be derived from the revenues of the church? He had voted, that the conscientious scruples of the Dissenters should be respected, and believing that the issue from the consolidated fund, by relieving him from all personal and immediate charge, would give satisfaction, had voted in favour of the proposition suggested by Lord Althorp. He referred to that as a conclusive proof that he was not insensible to the inconvenience of the present system, and that he was ready to make a sacrifice for the purpose of respecting a conscientious scruple where it existed, but without injury to the religious interests of the rest of the community. If they consented to the proposed measure, were they sure that it would effect that degree of harmony and peace which was promised by those who originated it? He feared not. If he ever entertained that hope, he must say, that he should still view with the utmost regret the exemption from this pecuniary charge of all those who held and had purchased their property upon the understanding of supporting the church, and who were themselves members of that church. He would not discuss what other measures might be devised for the purpose of effecting the object which was aimed at by Lord Althorp. If his Majesty's government had adhered to their original proposal—if they had taken any other course than they had done, he might have supported them. They had condemned the existing system, and yet had permitted three years to elapse without providing another. Why should he entertain a different opinion in 1837 to that which, with the knowledge of the whole facts, the noble lord had entertained in 1836? Did the conscientious scruples of the Dissenters arise from his being called upon to support the fabric or the establishment with which he was not in communion, and was it limited to that, or did it arise from his objection to the principle of an establishment? If it arose simply from the pecuniary charge, and was limited to that, and if exemption from that charge would indeed assuage all the animosities and differences that existed between Dissenters and members of the Establishment, and would lay the basis of a permanent acquiescence in the principle of an establishment—then, no doubt, it would be wise to incur almost any sacrifice for the purpose of ensuring that desirable end, so far as Dissenters were concerned. It would not necessarily provide that, therefore, members of the establishment ought to be relieved from the charge to which they were subject. It would not necessarily imply that therefore it was wise to dis sever the landed property of this country from all immediate connection and interest with the fabric, where the landed property was held by men who had no conscientious scruples. He admitted it was difficult, in point of detail, to draw a distinction; but still, whatever that difficulty might be, there was an evil, in his mind, in separating altogether the connection between the landed property in this country and the immediate parochial charges for church purposes, particularly when that property was held by members of the establishment. With this view he had voted as he did in 1834, because if an equivalent were taken from the public revenue, the holders of landed property would in that case contribute, in some degree, to the charge from which they had been exempted; and if he had an assurance that peace and harmony would be the result, then should he again think it perfectly fair to take the course he had pursued in 1834, and assent to the principle of providing a sufficient sum for the permanent repair of the fabric out of the public purse. But if the objection of the Dissenter were not to the pecuniary charge, but amounted to, or was connected with, an objection in principle to an establishment, then he (Sir Robert Peel) must abandon the idea that tranquillity would be the result of such a measure, because the objection in principle to an establishment would still remain unmitigated by that concession. The hon. member for Middlesex, in discussing this question the other night, had stated that the Dissenters at present put forward no other claim than that of exemption. He (Sir Robert Peel) wished to speak of them with that respect he had uniformly maintained towards them, as well by his acts as his expressions; but still he conceived it quite consistent with that feeling of respect fairly to inquire what was the nature of the objection which they urged against the pecuniary grievance of church-rates. If it was important for him to inquire whether the removal of that charge would in point of fact restore harmony between Dissenters and Churchmen, it was equally important to ask whether objection would not still be found to exist. The hon. member for Middlesex had said, that the Dissenters would abandon any further claims for the present. Why, what satisfaction did the House and the country derive from their abandonment for the present of any further claim? Did that not rather add to the reasons for supposing that their objection was not confined to the pecuniary charge, but extended to the establishment itself? In a work recently published, he found explicitly discussed the question—what would be the degree of satisfaction we might expect to arise from the abolition of church-rates? It was there distinctly asked in the following words—"But let us suppose the church-rates abolished, and the Dissenters entirely relieved from any share in the cost of maintaining churches which their ministers are not allowed to occupy, and religious services of which they decline to avail themselves—will they be satisfied with the redress of this grievance? Our reply to this question shall be explicit. They will be satisfied with nothing short of the recognition of those principles upon which, in resisting this ecclesiastical impost, they take their stand." That principle, he apprehended, went to this extent, that the continuance of an establishment constituted a civil inequality between Churchmen and Dissenters, and that the latter never would be satisfied while the principle of an establishment existed; and although the tenure of tithe might be different from the tenure of church-rates, and though one had its origin at an earlier time than the other, yet that the objection in principle would be equally applied. But he did not now address himself to Dissenters.

Mr. Hume begged to know the name of the work from which the right hon. baronet had quoted.

Sir Robert Peel, The Eclectic Review. It did not, he admitted, profess to speak the opinions of all the Dissenters, but of a considerable majority of them. He now addressed himself, not to Dissenters, but to those members of the establishment who were holders of property subject to this charge, and those he would ask, what proportion of that charge was borne by Dissenters? Of the landed property of this country he apprehended a very small proportion was possessed by Dissenters. He had seen estimates of different populous towns, one of which was that of Stroud, stating that the amount of church-rates collected from Dissenters, contrasted with the amount paid by members of the Established Church, was about 1-12th. If that were the case in these towns, he apprehended that throughout the rural parishes of the country the proportion would be still smaller; and it should be always borne in mind, that there was one object to which church-rates were applied, in respect of which Dissenters could claim no exemption—namely, the expenses connected with church-yards. But supposing the charge borne by Dissenters should not exceed in respect of the whole of the property, one-twelfth or even one-tenth, or any other reasonable proportion, what, after all, was the result of the proposition now made, as it bore upon the interests of the landed proprietors and owners of property who were in communion with the Established Church? The proposal was, that from the charge of church-rates they should be wholly exempt, that they should not contribute to any fund for the repairs of the churches, as they would under Lord Althorp's plan, but that the charge which they now bore, against which they had no conscientious scruples, should be entirely transferred to the revenues of the church. Now, doubtful as he was regarding the financial scheme of this measure, and doubtful as he was as to its effect in giving satisfaction and restoring peace to the Dissenter, he felt, in addition, that the proposition it made to members of the establishment, that they and their descendants should be altogether exempt from the charge, and that the revenues should be taken from the church to supply the deficiency, raised at once an insuperable objection to it. If it were proposed by them to the House of Lords, putting aside for a moment the case of the Dissenters, that from this charge, the permanence of which had been so long and confidently calculated upon, they should altogether relieve themselves, and throw it upon the church, what would be said by their Lordships of the enormity of such a proposition? For the sake of argument, let him admit the claim of the Dissenters. For the purpose of satisfying that claim, it was proposed that the whole property of the Church should be taken from its present possessors, and placed under the control of a board, in which the government of the day must have a paramount interest—a proposal by which the deans, chapters, and bishops, would be made mere annuitants, in order that a certain fixed sum might be made available out of their property for the support of the fabric. They could not make that alteration without producing important political consequences. Was it possible exactly to calculate what might be its effect upon the stability and dependence of the Church of England, by thus severing it altogether from the landed property of the establishment?—by completely altering the tenure by which bishops held their property, and by converting them into State annuitants, who were to receive from the government board fixed quarter salaries? The noble lord had contended the other night honestly and vigorously for the maintenance of the right of the bishops to sit in the House of Lords; but when he should have created this great change in the tenure of their property—when he should have converted them into mere State annuitants, did he think it would then be so easy for him to maintain that right? And did he not think that by depriving the establishment of all connexion with the landed property of the country, and of all opportunity of establishing relations of equity with the proprietors of other property—did he not think that by so doing he would be striking a blow at the independent character and stability of the Church of England? To apply this to the case of any great landed proprietor who let his property on a lease for lives—suppose a noble lord had £20,000 a-year derived from land, let for a term of years on renewable leases; and suppose the State stepped in, and said, that the noble lord's was an improvident method of settling his property; that the State accordingly interfered, let the leases run out, gave the property a new value, and assigned the noble lord, by quarterly payments, the £20,000 he had hitherto received,—supposing that case, the amount of the noble lord's pecuniary revenue must be the same; but did not every man feel that the State would thereby be making a complete alteration in the position and independence of that individual, and depend upon it they could not apply the same rule to the bishops of this country without in a corresponding degree affecting also the independence of their order, and the stability of the church. He objected to this resolution as interfering with the property of the church. But the main ground upon which he objected to it, and to which he felt confident no sufficient answer could be given, was this—that if by any plan of this kind it were possible, consistently with strict justice to the lessees to raise a profit out of the Church revenues, there existed a prior claim, a prior recognised claim, which they were bound to support; and he appealed to that House, he appealed to the gentlemen and noblemen of England, and particularly to those who were in communion with the establishment, and entertained no conscientious scruples—he appealed to all to attend to the case which he should make out. It was first important that they should consider what were the necessities of the church establishment. He asked them not to derive that information from any statement of his own, but to give their utmost attention to one which he had extracted from the report before referred to. That report stated, that there were no less than 3,528 benefices under £150 per annum; that there were 130 of these benefices that had a population of more than 10,000; that fifty-one had a population of from 5,000 to 10,000; that 251 had a population of between 2,000 and 5,000, and that there were 1,125 having a population of between 500 and 2,000. It further stated, that even if there were no addition to be made to those having a population below 500, it would take no less a sum than £235,000 per annum to raise all the benefices having a population of between 500 and 2,000 to the annual value of £200. There were 2,878 benefices on which there was no house of residence, and there were 1,728 benefices in which the houses were either unfit for residence, or in which houses fit for the incumbents did not exist at all. And what was the probable extent of the fund out of which the right hon. gentleman, the chancellor of the exchequer, proposed to supply these deficiencies? Why, £235,000 would be necessary for the purpose of increasing the present provision for the parochial clergy. The report went on to say—"We entertain a confident expectation that the amount of the fund will not be less than £130,000 per annum, while to raise small livings containing populations of from 500 to 2,000 to the amount of £200, the sum of £235,000 per annum would be necessary."

The House would not fail to observe, that he (Sir R. Peel) was not speaking as one who had resisted the reform of the church; but he was now merely showing, that in consequence of the commission appointed on his advice to the crown, it appeared there was a hope of deriving from chapter property funds to the amount of £130,000 per annum, to be applied to the increase of small livings, but still there would be a deficiency of £105,000 a-year for that purpose alone. But the church commissioners in their report, state, that this is by no means the most urgent demand on the part of the Church: they state—"The most prominent, however, of those defects, which cripple the energies of the established church and circumscribe its usefulness, is the want of churches and ministers in the large towns and populous districts of the kingdom. The growth of the population has been so rapid, as to outrun the means possessed by the establishment of meeting its spiritual wants; and the result has been, that a vast proportion of the people are left destitute of the opportunities of public worship and Christian instruction, even when every allowance is made for the exertions of those religious bodies which are not in connexion with the Established Church. It is not necessary in this report to enter into all the details by which the truth of this assertion might be proved. It will be sufficient to state the following facts as examples. Looking to those parishes only which contain each a population exceeding 10,000, we find that in London and its suburbs, including the parishes on either bank of the Thames, there are four parishes or districts, each having a population exceeding 20,000, and containing an aggregate of 166,000 persons, with Church-room for 8,200 (not quite 1-20th of the whole), and only eleven clergymen. There are twenty-one others, the aggregate population of which is 739,000, while the church-room is for 66,155 (not one-tenth of the whole), and only forty-five clergymen."

This demand was as yet unanswered. He would not fatigue the House by stating all the details of the instances in which this pressing want appeared. The Commissioners, however, observed, "The evils which flow from this deficiency in the means of religious instruction and pastoral superintendence, greatly outweigh all other inconveniences resulting from any defects or anomalies in our ecclesiastical institutions; and it unfortunately happens, that while these evils are the most urgent of all, and most require the application of an effectual remedy, they are precisely those for which a remedy can be least easily found. The resources which the Established Church possesses, and which can be properly made available to that purpose, in whatever way they may be husbanded or distributed, are evidently quite inadequate to the exigency of the case; and all that we can hope to do is, gradually to diminish the intensity of the evil."

The report then adverted to the efforts of the incorporated society for building and repairing churches, and the Christian exertions of private individuals, and it then proceeded:—"In addition to these efforts, many churches have been built and endowed by pious and liberal individuals. Upon the whole we may state that within the last twenty years additional church room has been secured for at least 600,000 persons, and some hundreds of additional clergymen have been stationed in populous districts which were before destitute of the advantages of pastoral care and instruction. But all that has been hitherto done in this way falls very short of the necessity of the case."

He took his position on that report. He would say, that all other considerations were subordinate—that the financial plans of the right hon. gentleman opposite, in this respect, were mere speculations; there might be doubts as to whether the authority of this or the other side of the House might be most relied on; but, he repeated, that the report of these commissioners, presented in March, 1836, supplied a case of crying necessity, for which it was the duty of a christian legislature to make provision. The report showed, that the annual sum of £235,000 would be required to raise the stipends of existing clergymen to moderate and decent competencies, and that if pluralities were abolished, and residence insisted upon, more would of necessity be required. He had shown that there were 4,800 curacies in which no fitting income was provided for a resident clergyman; he had shown to the House that there were within its reach four parishes, containing a population of 166,000 persons, but having church accommodation provided only for 8,000, thus leaving 158,000 persons without the means of religious consolation and instruction. If these, then, were facts, and he should be enabled from the revenues of the church to realize any disposable sum, he would ask could any claim be put in competition with the necessities which arose from the case he had stated? Depend upon it, the members of the Established Church could not escape the odium which agreeing to this resolution would throw on them, if they left this evil unremedied. They had been told that it was difficult in detail, to separate the case of the dissenter from that of the establishment; but the dissenters contributed to the church-rates one-tenth, while the members of the establishment contribute nine-tenths. Disguise it as they might, the proposition amounted to this, that the members of the Established Church, the noblemen and gentlemen who held lands and property on which there was this legal, and in point of equity, this indefeasible claim, were to be altogether relieved of the great part of the impost, while the Dissenter was only relieved to so trifling an extent. Let him ask what was intended to be done in the case of Scotland? If there existed on the part of the English Dissenters, who contribute now to the repair of the fabric of the church, a claim to be relieved on the grounds of conscientious scruples—if the English Dissenter felt no common interest with the churchman in the maintenance of that establishment which was to provide for the spiritual instruction of the rich and of the poor—what answer was to be given to the landed proprietor of Scotland, who dissented from the Established Church of that country, but whose property was subject to contributions for its support? Were the great landed proprietors of Scotland, who dissented from the establishment there, to continue subject to the charge of supporting that establishment? Were its members to relieve themselves and leave the charge on the Dissenters? Above all, in what position would his claim be, if, after the House had consented to exempt the lands of the churchman in England, it left upon the Dissenter of Scotland the charge of supporting a church to the tenets of which he was opposed? Let also this be considered, that a large and most respectable portion of the dissenting body in England had not urged upon the legislature any objection to the continuance of this charge. The whole, or at all events a great part, of the Wesleyan body—a body influential from its high character, although dissenting from the church, and not joining in communion with it—felt a common interest in the maintenance of the establishment as a national church—rejoiced as much as did the churchmen in witnessing the improvement made of late years in the characters of the ministers of the church and the zeal with which they performed their duties, and felt so innately that the cause of christianity was maintained by the recognised principle of a christian establishment, that they had come forward with no petitions urging to be exempt from the charge upon them to support the church. Could the members of the Church of England—the landed proprietors of this country—the possessors of real and rateable property in it, easily consent, on account of the supposed difficulty of drawing a distinction between the Dissenters and themselves, to accept this relief at the expense of the church, when the necessity of spiritual consolation, instruction, and accommodation had been proved to the extent and amount stated in the report of the ecclesiastical commissioners to which he had referred? It was incumbent on the House well to consider this subject. The time would shortly arrive when the acts of the present legislature would be subject to the scrutiny of a posterity judging the matter with far different views from those which some who heard him cherished. It had been proved that thousands and tens of thousands of the population of this country were now without the means of religious instruction, that they wanted and desired such instruction; it had been proved that churches were falling into decay, that glebe-houses were unrepaired, that some parishes were without a minister, and if it should appear to posterity that with these necessities before them the present legislature consented to sell the property of the church, to alienate it to other purposes, to cut off all hope now and for ever of deriving increased resources from church property—above all, if it should be found by those who were to follow that in committing these irreparable evils the churchmen of the present day had relieved themselves from an impost to which they were most justly subject, the House might depend upon it that a severe, and he must say, not an unrighteous judgment, would be exercised upon their acts if not upon their heads. If to meet these necessities a sum was to be taken from the Consolidated Fund, it would relieve the landowners of the country from the duty of supporting the church. Whether there should be a new apportionment of this charge on the land, making the owner and not the occupier contribute (a plan which he owned would, in his judgment, be justice) thus continuing the connexion between the landowner and the church—whether it would be possible to reconcile such a plan with some means of giving relief to the Dissenters, without any indivious test being imposed,—whether it would be possible to draw a distinction between the cases of town parishes and rural parishes, in the latter of which the House might be assured the people did not wish to see the church degraded—whether it would be possible to do these things, he was not prepared to say, but at least they were deserving the best consideration. His present object was to implore those in communion with the church not to cut off altogether, by consenting to these resolutions, all hope of supplying from the revenues of the church (if consistent with equity they might be found applicable) means of relieving the great wants and of curing the defects which the report of the ecclesiastical commissioners pointed out; and, above all, he would entreat the House to avert from itself that judgment which posterity would pronounce upon it, if those in communion with the church were parties to a transaction from which they themselves, at the expense of that church, were to derive pecuniary benefits.

The debate extended over three nights, when the committee divided:—Ayes, 273; Noes, 250; majority, 23.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND).

APRIL 11, 1837.

The Order of the Day for resuming the adjourned debate on the third reading of the Municipal Corporation (Ireland) Bill having been read—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the surprise which he last night felt that the House was not permitted, considering the exhausted state of the debate, to go to a division, had not been in the least degree removed by the tenor of the discussion of that night; and he sincerely hoped that those two or three gentlemen whose absence the House last night deplored, and in compliment to whom (the debate being entirely finished) the division was postponed, were now present in the House, and would enable them finally to dispose of the question. He felt, however, that it was not entirely owing to the absence of two or three gentlemen that the reluctance to divide was last night manifested. He had entertained his suspicions upon the subject before he heard the speech of the noble lord who had just sat down; and these suspicions were fully confirmed when, in the course of his observations, he found the noble lord so pointedly referring to the approaching disunion between himself and the hon. member for Middlesex upon the subject of household suffrage. When he found on referring to the votes that the first notice of motion for the 11th of April was given by the hon. member for Middlesex, for leave to bring in a bill to extend the present suffrage to household suffrage, he knew perfectly well that one of the motives for adjourning the debate was to prevent that motion from being brought forward. The only novelty he had heard in the course of the debate of that evening was from the hon. member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Villiers). The hon. member, thinking that the party on that (the opposition) side of the House availed themselves unfairly of the cry of the "Church in danger," determined, it would seem, to meet that cry by a counter-cry, namely, the "Reform bill in danger." The hon. gentleman said he had never heard a discussion conducted on the opposition side of the House in which there did not fall from some one gentleman or other an intimation that one at least of three great popular questions ought either to be altered or repealed. The first of these was the Roman Catholic relief bill. Now he had never heard any gentleman intimate an intention of bringing in a bill to repeal that measure. He certainly did hear in the speech of the hon. member for Meath (Mr. H. Grattan) last night, an extract from some Dublin newspaper, which the hon. member said placed the hon. member in possession of his opinions upon the subject, and accordingly, upon the authority of this Dublin newspaper, the hon. member declared to the House, that it was his intention to propose the repeal of the Catholic Relief Act. Now, as the hon. member for Meath was a member of the House of Commons, and consequently had opportunities of hearing the debates within its walls, he trusted the hon. member would take the indication of his intentions from his own declarations, and not from any anonymous paragraphs which might happen to appear, even in a Dublin newspaper. The hon. member for Meath, in the course of his speech last night, after attacking him with a great deal of vituperative eloquence, produced extracts from speeches he had formerly delivered as arguments against him. It was rather an unfair instrument to use; but he would not retaliate. The hon. member for Meath might rest assured that whilst he lived he would never quote an extract from any speech of the hon. member. But, said the hon. member for Wolverhampton, "there is not only a disposition on the part of the opposition to repeal the Roman Catholic Relief Bill; there is also an indication of a wish and an intention to repeal the English Municipal Bill and the Parliamentary Reform Bill. At all events, he had no intention to propose the repeal of the Municipal Bill, because, if the municipal corporations continued in the same change of opinions that had distinguished them for the last year or two, they would shortly become good conservative bodies. Then, with respect to the Parliamentary Reform Bill, who on that side of the House had proposed its repeal? Who had proposed even to modify it? He had not heard one single attack made either upon the principle or the details of the Parliamentary Reform Act, except from the hon. gentlemen who sat on the ministerial side of the House. So far from being satisfied with the great charter of their liberties—so far from being pleased even with the short experience they had just had of it—the book upon the table was pregnant with notices on the part of the usual supporters of the government to repeal essential and fundamental parts of the Reform Act. He spoke not of speculative questions, such as household suffrage, vote by ballot, annual parliaments, and the like, but of motions directly and vitally affecting the special principles of the Reform Act. Not one of those notices of motion had been given from that side of the House. They had all been given by those who professed themselves most friendly to the principle of the Reform Act. So much for the argument of the hon. member for Wolverhampton. It only served to convince him that the constituency of that good town were somewhat uneasy and restless, and that it therefore became necessary for the hon. gentleman who represented them to raise these bugbears, in order, if possible, to frighten them into a continued support of him. He would now address himself to the speech of the noble lord (Lord J. Russell). In doing so, he would avoid all reference to the vestal criticism in which the noble lord had indulged. He would not dwell upon the phrase "the downward path," upon which the noble lord had laid so much emphasis. Yet what was to be implied from the phrase, as originally employed by his right hon. friend (Sir J. Graham)? He (Sir R. Peel) would venture to say that if, instead of the "facilis descensus," his right hon. friend had spoken of the laborious and difficult upward path, he would have been attacked by the noble lord, the great critic of the administration, for not speaking of the road of concession as an easy and pleasing descent, instead of a stubborn and displeasing upward journey. Then came the disclosure about the cabinet dinner. What a disclosure for the noble lord to make! Why, with his attachment to the popular principle—with his love for Municipal Corporations in Scotland as well as in England and Ireland—why was not the noble lord, in the case of the Scotch Municipal Bill, found watching over the cradle of freedom, instead of acting the part of Amphitryon, and leaving his charge to take care of itself? So indifferent was the noble lord to that unfortunate measure, that he positively left it to its fate, and went to dinner. But, in his absence and in his indifference, the noble lord unjustly and ungenerously sought to involve his right hon. friend (Sir J. Graham). It was the noble lord himself, and not the right hon. baronet, who was absent from the discussion and division of the Scotch Municipal Bill. The noble lord could not resist the temptation of the cabinet dinner, at which he was to preside, and in the noble lord's absence from his post in that House, it was his right hon. friend who performed his duty—who resisted the temptation even of the noble lord's cook—who left the noble lord, now a cabinet minister and leader of the House of Commons, to enjoy his repose at home, whilst he attended in the House, and resisted the proposal for the insertion of the £5 clause in the Scotch Municipal Bill. It was true, indeed, that his right hon. friend, an English member, showing this laudable desire for the protection of the interests of Scotland, was confirmed in his own opinions by very high authority; for amongst the Scotch members who, on that occasion, joined with his friend the right hon. baronet, in doing justice to Scotland, he found the names of Admiral Adam, Sir Henry Parnell, now a member for a Scotch borough, and at the head of the list the name of the right hon. gentleman whom he had now the honour of addressing in the chair. These were the gentlemen who resisted the temptation to which the noble lord unhappily gave way, and who set the example of resisting the £5 clause, which, upon the authority, as it would seem, of the hon. gentleman opposite, it was proposed to insert in the present bill. He had a great respect for that hon. gentleman; he had a great respect for his professional opinion; but to quote him as a high authority on parliamentary law, and upon the expediency of adopting a £5 clause, appeared to him to be most extraordinary. When the £5 clause was assented to in the Irish Bill, the noble lord said, "Oh, there is a £5 clause in the Scotch Bill, and, therefore, of course, there must be a £5 clause in the Irish Bill." Now he (Sir Robert Peel) had certainly heard of a postliminious precedent; and it appeared to him that the precedent referred to by the noble lord on this occasion, must embrace something of the character implied under that term. Finding that a £5 clause in the Scotch Bill would be a sufficient authority for the insertion of a similar clause in the Irish Municipal Bill, the noble lord immediately set to work to create a precedent, and subsequently to the introduction of the Irish Bill, moved for leave to bring in a bill to establish a £5 constituency in Scotland. That bill had not yet passed through one single stage; but the noble lord was glad to look at it in his moment of difficulty, and already it was quoted as a precedent, and used as an argument by those who contended for an identity of the law in both kingdoms. He felt that the argument upon the subject of the bill then under their consideration, was entirely exhausted. He must, however, be allowed very shortly to state the grounds upon which he rested his opposition to it. He viewed the bill upon its abstract merits as a scheme of local government for Ireland. Upon its abstract merits, viewing it as it then stood, he objected to it. He still retained the opinion he had formerly expressed, that to establish at once forty-seven corporations in Ireland, without any previous experience of the working of the reformed municipal system, and in forty out of the forty-seven, to establish a £5 franchise, was (even if the policy of the Municipal Corporations were coded on all hands) carrying the principle to an extravagant and unwise extent. The £5 franchise, unaccompanied by the payment of assessed taxes, or any payment corresponding to assessed taxes, such as existed in Scotland, or to the poor-rate as it existed in England, would be a very indifferent, and, in his opinion, insufficient, test of the competency of the constituency. He had stated this objection before. He said, on a former occasion, that he thought it would be better to have some substantial definite test which should prevent all temptation to perjury on the part of any individual as to the value of his house. Was there not at that moment a committee of the House sitting on the report of fictitious votes in Scotland? Had not the evils which were said to have arisen in that country upon the subject of the franchise, been entirely the result of the variety of principles laid down as to the value of property? The result of it was, that the temptation to perjury had been so strong, as to lead to the necessity of appointing a committee of that House to inquire into the extent to which fictitious votes had been carried. The Attorney-general had stated, that there were no less than five different constructions put upon the word "value." With the experience they had already received of the working of the system in Scotland, he did not know how it could be thought that the civil or moral improvement of the people of Ireland would be promoted by extending to them, for all municipal purposes, a £5 franchise. It must be borne in mind, too, that the bill not only established forty-seven corporations in Ireland, but gave, at the same time, an indefinite power to establish other corporations in any towns or villages of Ireland where, not the majority of the inhabitants, but any two of them, should make a demand for municipal rights. Wherever any two inhabitants of any town in Ireland, however insignificant their interests in that town, chose to demand a charter of incorporation, there would be a power wholly uncontrolled by parliament to confer it upon them; and each of these corporations would have the power of appointing the armed police force, not only to protect the town itself, but to guard the property for seven miles round. They would also have the power of appointing special constables. Was that an application to Ireland of the principle on which English corporations were framed? It was said, give to Ireland corporations on the same principle as those of England. The English police were appointed by the Lord-lieutenant in each county; but in Ireland it was proposed to place the whole of that power in the hands of these local and irresponsible bodies. Upon that ground, as well as upon others on which he would not then dwell, he objected to the bill as a scheme of local government. The noble lord might tell him that these were details, and that they ought to have been discussed in committee. He knew that they were details, and he would state why it was, that they were not discussed in committee. It was perfectly notorious, that whatever objections the opposition might have brought forward would at once have been overruled. In the next place, they felt that, with the certainty of being overruled, their objections, if brought forward, would only have the effect of obstructing the prospect of a satisfactory adjustment hereafter. In the course of the speech made last night by an hon. member on the diplomatic service of his Majesty—he meant the hon. member for Marylebone—the hon. gentleman made an appeal to him; and if he passed by that appeal, the hon. gentleman might suppose that he did not attempt to reply to it, because he could not make any comment on it. The observations of the hon. member ran to this effect:—"There is one way in which, according to his friends, the right hon. baronet might escape from this dilemma. They said, 'You don't know Sir Robert Peel; he sees that the Irish corporation bill must pass, and when he comes into office, then he will pass something in the shape of a better bill if he can, and after that he will say, 'Now the church is, you see, in a better condition; now I'll consent to passing the corporation bill.'" He should like to ask the hon. gentleman, who were those friends of his whom the hon. gentleman heard make these assertions? He should like to know what there possibly was in his past conduct, that could entitle friends of his to give him credit for such a course of proceeding? The hon. gentleman supposed, or at least his friends who communicated with the hon. gentleman, that he meditated in effect to pass this bill. He did not hesitate to say, that if he contemplated this bill as he had stated, and if persevering in his hostility to the passing of it on that occasion, and yet as the confidential adviser of the Crown, he intended to sanction it—he did not hesitate to say, that it would be a much more creditable part, seeing such a probability of expressing his conviction of the necessity of the measure, to give his Majesty's government his support instead of opposing the further progress of the bill. He trusted, after this remark, he should convince the hon. gentleman that he did not intend to pass this bill, should he, by possibility, be placed in office. The hon. gentleman might say, "no, you do not contemplate passing this bill in its present shape, but you may sanction a bill analogous to this with some slight alterations." If the hon. gentleman asked him whether he thought that, in the present position of public affairs and of parties, one party in that House was not necessarily pledged on the one hand to the unqualified support, and on the other to oppose, the resolution which turned him out of office, he (Sir R. Peel) would ask the hon. gentleman in reply, when that resolution had passed whether he showed any wish to make concession with respect to the principle of the resolution—whether he showed any hesitation to resign the office he held? No: he left office because he could not sanction that resolution which involved the security of the Church of Ireland. If hon. gentlemen asked him under what possible circumstances he would consent to any relaxation of his opposition to the establishment of Irish municipal corporations, as proposed in this bill, he would reply, that he thought that hon. gentlemen had no right to ask him hypothetical questions, or expect an answer to them. But, even if he thought any possible settlement of the question practicable, he did not then think that it would be advantageous to state what he might conceive it to be. He would say, however, that it was the duty of the king's government, before they asked that House to come to a final decision on this question, to tell them what they intended to do with respect to the Irish Church. To say that that question was unconnected with the one before the House was perfectly insulting; and this was certainly not the feeling of his Majesty's government at the commencement of the session. The attention of the parliament was called to the state of Ireland, and there was an address, to which the House assented at the special invitation of the minister of the Crown, in which there was the following passage:—"We humbly assure your Majesty that we will direct our attention to the state of Ireland, which your Majesty has been graciously pleased to bring especially under our notice; and that, convinced of the wisdom of adopting all such measures as may improve the condition of that part of the United Kingdom, we will take into our early consideration the present constitution of the municipal corporations of that country, the laws which regulate the collection of tithes, and the difficult but pressing question of establishing such legal provision for the poor, guarded by prudent regulations, and by such precautions against abuse, as our experience and knowledge of the subject may enable us to suggest." Would any man tell him that it was not the duty of the government to indicate what they intended to do with regard to these two important subjects before this House; and, above all, before they were called upon to give a final decision on this measure. He had made this observation on the first night of discussing this bill, and he had repeated it. When the noble lord then said, that he would enter into an examination of the state of Ireland, he (Sir R. Peel) thought that he would have gone into an explanation of the principles on which the government intended to act with respect to all their great measures regarding Ireland. But the noble lord merely indirectly alluded to the tithe-question, and stated that the nature of the payment to be made under the poor-law bill should be explained on a future occasion. Now, he would ask the noble lord, who had taunted him with dealing in vague generalities, what he meant? Did not the noble lord, in effect, promise the early production of these measures? The noble lord must surely be supposed to have had these measures prepared and in his possession. If the noble lord had not these measures prepared, what did he mean by inducing the King of England, as his adviser, to recommend to parliament to take, not into their late consideration, not to postpone the subjects to some distant period, but to take into their early consideration the present state of the corporations, as well as the tithe question, and the difficult question of a provision for the destitute Irish poor? Would any hon. gentleman suppose for one moment, after such declarations, that the noble lord and his colleagues had not got measures prepared on these subjects, that they had not made up their minds on these questions when they alluded to them in this way? The noble lord now said that he was ready to pass a measure for the settlement of the tithe question, if he could be satisfied that it would meet with the ready assent of the House of Commons, the House of Lords, and the people of Ireland; but he went on to say, that there were great impediments in the way of framing such a measure. He would promise the noble lord, that if he brought forward these two measures for the settlement of the Irish Church question, and for the establishment of poor-laws in Ireland—if he knew what were the intentions of the government on those questions—if he knew what was the particular course which the House of Commons would pursue with respect to those two measures—he would not have pursued such a line as to have rendered himself liable to the taunt of the noble lord, and those with whom he acted, that he dealt in vague generalities with respect to the Municipal Bill; for he would have distinctly told the noble lord whether he was prepared to make any concessions on this question, and what would be the nature of such concessions. It would have been open to him to have pursued this course if he had been made acquainted with those measures; but now, being in ignorance of the nature of those measures, he felt it to be his duty to persist in offering his opposition to the bill before the House. Knowing nothing, therefore, of the intentions of the government with respect to the tithe question and the poor-laws, he felt it to be his duty to oppose this measure; and the noble lord might be assured that if in the present condition of parties, acting on the principles he had always avowed, and ignorant of the manner in which other contemplated measures might modify the bill, he felt it incumbent on him to oppose it, he should act on the same principles if he should be called upon to accept office. If he should be inclined, on seeing these two measures with respect to the Irish Church and the establishment of poor-laws in Ireland, to modify in any degree his opposition to the Municipal Corporation Bill—with respect to which the noble lord appeared to entertain his chief anxiety—he should take an opportunity to declare distinctly what those modifications were; and to those modifications he should adhere, if they were accepted by the government; or, if they were not accepted by the government, to those modifications he would adhere, if by accident he should be placed in their situation. This he thought would be the course which alone it would be creditable to a public man to pursue. If he felt it to be his duty to meet this measure with unqualified opposition, such should be his rule of conduct if he were connected with the government; if he thought that concessions should be made, in case he took office they should be distinctly stated, and the government should also state whether they would accept them or not. These two questions were most nearly united with that before the House. Would any one deny, after the declarations that had been made, that the chances of a settlement of the church question, with security to the establishment, would not be greatly diminished by passing this bill for establishing Irish Municipal Corporations? He might be told that when they passed the Catholic Relief Bill there was the same assertion of danger to the establishment. He denied it; for when they passed the bill to remove the disqualifications and restrictions from the Catholics, they had not only the most distinct and often-repeated declarations that the removal of those restrictions would restore tranquillity to Ireland, but that it would also ensure the stability of the Established Church. With a solemn engagement that the maintenance of the Church was compatible with the removal of the disqualifications on the Catholics, the act was passed. Those disqualifications were removed; and would any one tell him that since that time the Church was not in danger? In many parts of Ireland it was notorious that combinations had been entered into for the purpose of defrauding of their legal property those who had an interest in church estates. At the present moment, also, they had a resolution of that House before them that no settlement of the tithe question could take place satisfactorily unless it was accompanied with an alienation of Church property. The noble lord said that he, and those who acted with him, had promised, on some possible occasion, that the subject of Municipal Corporations in Ireland should be taken up with a view to a settlement. They promised that they would take the subject into consideration when they saw the Church placed in a situation of security. The noble lord, when he alluded to this, seemed to imply that if any man expressed any feelings of anxiety with respect to the Church in Ireland, he was exciting an alarm that it was in danger. This was an inference that was not warranted. Let the noble lord state the nature of the bill he was prepared to propose with respect to the Irish Church; and until he did so it was impossible to give any pledge as to the conduct he should pursue with regard to it; but he would maintain the position in which he now stood in opposition to the institution of corporations in Ireland until he knew what that measure was, and he would give no pledge until he saw that it would ensure a prospect of security for the Church. But was there any prospect that by giving such institutions as were proposed in this bill that object would be attained. He believed not but that corporations instead of being framed for the purposes of local government, would be made the means of increasing the power of the political agitators. As he had said before, the state of the question with respect to this bill was essentially different from the Catholic Relief Bill. What were the objects of the supporting of this bill? It had been asserted, in a popular assembly, that the maintenance of these institutions should be insisted on in the first place, because by means of these institutions a control could be exercised over the people, and, secondly, that their influence would be exercised in a way to weaken the power of the Church. If they asked him what was his principle for the government of Ireland, he would reply, it was the maintenance of the principle of the Relief Bill, the freedom of religion to all classes of his Majesty's subjects. But with this condition there was co-existing another, namely, that with the establishment of perfect civil equality there should also be a legal and binding security for the maintenance of the Establishment of the Protestant Church in Ireland as the established religion of the country. If ever there was a combination of justice and wisdom in adhering to a solemn compact—both expressed and implied,—if ever considerations of equity and sound policy demanded an adherence to an engagement, it was in the case of the Protestant Church in Ireland. The legislature consented to the reduction of ten of the bishops of that establishment, and the hon. member for Meath said that a most important concession was gained by it, a larger one than he was prepared to hope for,—and what had the Church gained by it? They had also offered the settlement of the tithe question, in order to remove the burthen from the Catholic tenant, and place it on the Protestant landlord; they offered also, great reduction in the revenues of the Church for the attainment of that object, and the only principle to which they adhered, and to which they were determined to adhere, was, that they would not have the voluntary system; they would not sanction the principle that they were indifferent to the existence of any religious establishment, and they would not consent to subtract from the property of the Protestant Church in Ireland for the establishment of the Catholic or any other form of worship in its place. Relying, then, on the principle of the Catholic Relief Bill—relying on the declarations made on its passing, as well as on those directed to be taken under its enactments—relying on the principles of justice and sound policy, involved, in that case, the opposition required, and they would continue to require, legislative protection for the Church of Ireland, before they consented to give privileges which were not required by the Catholic Relief Bill, and which would only be employed for the subversion of the Established Church. He said, that arrangement was not unfair: he believed, that to these terms the country would subscribe, and the country would adhere. These were terms with which, he also believed, the noble lord himself, in the present state of political parties and discussions, would be satisfied, and on which he would be prepared to rest. The noble lord knew, also, that by the resolution which he had proposed, and which had been opposed by him as involving an abstract principle, without a practical result, the House had been fettered—he meant the resolution respecting the appropriation of Church property in Ireland. The noble lord said the other night, “taking into consideration the nature of the Act of Union, and the legal rights of the Irish Established Church to its property, it was my duty to support the establishment.” He was glad to hear that declaration; and he inferred that the noble lord agreed with him, that, on considerations both of duty and of policy, it was entitled to support. The noble lord also said, that he did not wish to bring forward bills and place them on the table, which there was not a reasonable hope and prospect of passing through parliament and giving satisfaction to the people of Ireland. He thought that the noble lord was right in this; because, bringing forward bills which it was not possible to carry to a successful termination, was a practice which, to say the least of it, was not prudent. The noble lord had further declared, in manly language, that whenever such measures were brought forward, coming from what quarter they might, and believing that they would have such a result, no feeling of false pride should prevent his giving his cordial support to them. The noble lord, he was sure, when he made use of that language, heard no taunt from him at a declaration so becoming in the noble lord's situation. He thought that the noble lord meant that he was ready, at the expense of every sacrifice—that he was ready to propose to parliament the settlement of the tithe question, independently of the resolution by which he said the question was embarrassed. If such was the intention of the noble lord, although that resolution had proved fatal to his government—if such was the intention of the noble lord, not one word of taunt should fall from him on the subject; but he would at once proceed to the consideration of the tithe question with a view to the settlement of it. He saw no other way by which this question could be satisfactorily settled. It was the evil of that resolution, neither acted on nor abandoned, that it engendered bitterness in Ireland. The noble lord and his colleagues knew that it was impossible to leave the question in its present state. The government and the legislature must do something. He thought, that it was imperative on him to make this declaration with respect to the Irish tithe question, and to show that it was necessary that they should have an explanation of the views of the government on this question before being called upon to give an opinion on the measure before them. Again, a further explanation as to the poor-law bill was also necessary. If they adopted that bill for Ireland, it would be absolutely necessary to have some other test than residence of a fitness to exercise the right of voting for municipal officers; but until the House knew what were the intentions of the government, it would be in vain to attempt to give any explanation as to the probable bearings of that measure. If, as he had said before, after hearing an explanation of the two measures to which he had adverted, he retained his opposition to this measure, he would frankly declare it to the House and the government; and if it were possible to make any qualification of his opposition on this subject, he would as explicitly state the extent of it, and give the government the opportunity of deciding whether or not it would be sufficient for their object. He knew not what was the nature of the vague intimation on the part of his Majesty's government of their intention of relinquishing office, he knew nothing about it; he viewed it with great indifference, and he was not at all surprised at their desire to relinquish office. I do not taunt them (continued the right hon. baronet) with the desire to retain office. I believe, in the present position of public affairs, few men would take office, unless impelled by a sense of public duty. Oh! look at the position of public affairs. Look at the position of your foreign affairs. I am glad to see a smile on the noble lord's (Lord Palmerston's) face. Oh, the noble lord has a right to smile with respect to the position in which this country stands to Russia and the great powers of the north, to Spain, to France, and, indeed, with respect to all other powers. [Question.] This is the question—this is the real and pinching part of the question. Look at the state of commercial embarrassment in which the country is placed. Look at the want of employment in which many of your manufactures now are. Look at the state of the governments of the three great powers of the west of Europe at the present moment. In France there is no government—in Spain no government—and in England, the question arises from day to day, whether there is a government or not. Look, also, at the state of the public business before this House. Hundreds of questions, of great public importance, are glanced at, but not proceeded with. From day to day a great variety of observations are made, but nothing is done towards advancing them to maturity. What has hitherto been done in the course of the present session? Have any measures of importance been sent up to the House of Lords? Certainly many measures of great importance have been brought forward by the government, but no question, except the measure now under consideration, has been advanced to any thing like a result. The Irish Poor-law Bill and the Church-rate measure, have been introduced, but if you go through the whole of the parliamentary history, I do not believe that you will find a period when the public business was ever in such a state. Again, look at the state of your colonial policy. I say this in reference to those who believe that there are parties who seek, by low intrigue, to endeavour to overturn the government, and then intend to bring to maturity the measures they have introduced. If you look steadily at the state of public affairs, I think that hon. gentlemen will agree, that no man, but from a sense of public duty, would take office upon himself. If his Majesty's government wish to seek a pretext for abandoning office, and to escape from the difficulties with which they are surrounded, I do not hesitate to say that I believe there is energy enough in the country to find compensation for their loss. If the crew choose to abandon the noble vessel amidst the breakers, I do not believe she is yet so unmanageable that she cannot be saved, or that the country will not lend its cheerful support to those who would make an effort to save her, and conduct her, and all the precious interests with which she is freighted, into a tranquil and secure haven.

The House divided:—Ayes, 302; Noes, 247; majority, 55.

PENNY STAMP ON NEWSPAPERS.

APRIL 13, 1837.

Mr. Roebuck moved for the appointment of a Select Committee, to take into consideration the expediency of abolishing the penny stamp on newspapers.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the language of the hon. gentleman who had spoken last (Mr. Hume,) was so seducing, his countenance so very friendly, and his demeanour so alluring, that he was almost afraid, if he did remain entirely silent, that part of the House might infer that he was going to vote with the hon. gentleman, and the country in general might suppose, in the present state of political parties, that there was some secret communication between them—that the alliance which the hon. gentleman spoke of between those whom he called the reformers and the government was about to be dissolved, and an alliance about to be cemented between the former party and the conservatives. He therefore thought it absolutely necessary for him to inform the hon. gentleman that he agreed with his Majesty's government on the question before the House. He could assure the hon. gentleman that there was no breach of good faith in the case; and he hoped that he should not be the means of interrupting the communication of the allied parties. He understood that the right hon. gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) proposed to lay before the House documents which would exhibit to them the result of the experiment which had been made by the late reduction of the stamp-duty. The hon. gentleman said, that because he did not use vituperative language in that House, therefore he must support the removal of the penny stamp upon newspapers. The hon. gentleman had been at the pains of arranging his argument into a syllogism; but it appeared to him that there were a great many steps to be filled up in the chain of reasoning before the hon. gentleman could arrive at such a conclusion from the premises, which he hoped were themselves just, that he (Sir R. Peel) wished to discharge his duty in that House without indulging in personalities. That was the course he wished to pursue, and he presumed to think, that if every one were to follow in this respect the example which he endeavoured to set, the course of sound argument would not be obstructed, nor the character of the House of Commons lowered by it. He did not see why, because he deserved that character of abstaining from personalities, he should vote for the removal of this duty. The hon. gentleman ought to be more impartial in his censures of the public press. The hon. gentleman took one class of newspapers; he (Sir R. Peel) read others; for he thought a public man would very inadequately perform his duty if he abstained from consulting the public journals. He (Sir R. Peel) did consult the journals; and he was happy to say, after long experience he had now got so callous that he could read them without the slightest disturbance. He could assure the hon. gentleman that although he had got a very extensive selection of journals, which he actually took in, and many more were forwarded to him by some good-natured friend or other, he could not say he found the penny newspapers much more complimentary than the others. (There's the Penny Magazine.) He sometimes read the Penny Magazine; he found no vituperation in that; and great instruction and amusement were to be derived from perusing even this. But there were newspapers sold for much less than 5d. under the new stamp laws; and he did not find that they improved in mildness in proportion as they descended in price. He also received publications which were subject to no stamp, and he did not find them more complimentary than those which were. From all this combination of circumstances, he inferred that they would not, by entirely removing the duty on newspapers, have a very effectual security against vituperation. When party spirit became very high, he believed they must expect that offences against good manners would occur. They could hardly hope for perfect freedom from vituperation; and it would be a dangerous argument to employ against the utility of the press that they occasionally found some severe personal abuse. The hon. gentleman surely would not contend that the state should be called on to give any premium on newspapers; but would they not be giving a premium on newspapers if they provided coaches and horses at the public expense to convey them? A very important and extensive experiment had been made last year by the reduction of duty: and one very beneficial effect of the change was, that it had put an end to what might be called smuggling in this branch of the revenue. The Chancellor of the Exchequer intended to lay before the House documents which would furnish them with authentic information on the whole subject, but his own present information, was in accordance with the views of the government. If the experiment should not prove to be successful, then the question of the removal of the penny stamp might be considered; but he did not see that its maintenance could be considered in the slightest degree unjust, if the proprietors of the newspapers were relieved from all the charges of conveyance. It might be said, that those which were sold in the metropolis did not derive the same advantage with those which were sent to the country; but it was impossible, in any general arrangement of this kind, to mete out exactly the same amount of favour to every public journal. He thought the principle of the duty just, and the state had a fair right to levy an equivalent for the charge to which it was put. The hon. member would admit the fairness of a stamp duty. [Mr. Hume: of a postage.] He did not see that newspapers would gain any thing by the substitution of a postage. He very much doubted whether the existence of a stamp duty, and the free transmission of newspapers by post, would not be more advantageous to the proprietors than a postage, varying according to the distance which the newspaper was conveyed. Hon. gentlemen on the other side wished that the postage should be proportioned to the expense of conveyance. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wakley) maintained, that the country was not enlightened; but he ought to remember that the charge of enlightening the persons who had figured in the anecdotes with which he had favoured the House, would be very heavy, compared with the charge of enlightening those who dwelt in the vicinity of the metropolis. Civilization and knowledge generally decreased in proportion to the distance of a locality from the metropolis, and yet, the hon. gentleman would exactly invert the rule, because in the neighbourhood of the metropolis the postage duty would be very light, while in those villages of Devonshire which the hon. gentleman wanted to make accessible to the light of knowledge, and which were some 200 or 250 miles distant from London, a heavy postage must be paid. He thought that the views of the hon. gentleman would be best followed up, that knowledge would be most widely extended, and civilization most effectually promoted, by charging one stamp duty upon all newspapers, and giving to the population which was nearest to the great centre of civilization no unfair advantage over that which was most distant from it. Upon these grounds, he must express his opinion as decidedly as he could against the motion. He could assure the hon. member for Finsbury, that he was not meditating the repeal of this tax, for his opinion in favour of maintaining it could not be stronger. If the progress of the experiment which was now going on, and the documents promised by the right hon. gentleman, should lead to the conclusion that the tone of the press might be improved by the proposed measure, that would be a subject for subsequent consideration; on that he would give no opinion; but he had heard nothing in the speech of the right hon. gentleman from which he dissented. He had not intended to say any thing on this question; but the tone of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wakley's) observations had made it necessary for him to offer to the House the few observations which he had made.

The motion was negatived.

CANADA.

APRIL 14, 1837.

In a committee of the whole House, to take into consideration certain resolutions proposed by Lord John Russell relative to the legislative council of Lower Canada.

SIR R. PEEL wished to avail himself of the present opportunity to explain to the House the reasons for the vote which he was now about to give upon this question, and the view which he took of the resolutions which had been proposed by the noble lord. He assured the hon. and learned member for Bath, that he was never more mistaken in his life than in the impression which he seemed to entertain that he would abstain from delivering his opinions on this question, in order to increase the embarrassment of his Majesty's government in dealing with this subject; and it was not because he concurred with the propositions of the hon. and learned member for Bath, or blamed the noble lord for the course which he had marked out for the government in his resolutions, but because he agreed with his noble friend near him, (Lord Stanley,) and participated in the objections which he had made to those resolutions, that he now expressed his fears that these resolutions would irritate the Canadians, and yet not be efficient for the purposes for which they were intended.

He should vote in favour of the noble lord's resolutions, because he felt that, if they were to be efficient at all, their efficiency must depend on the unanimity, or if not on the unanimity, on the very large majority, by which they were carried. Yet, though he disagreed with those resolutions in some essential points, still, balancing the reasons of his dissent against the evils which were likely to arise from abandoning his opinion on mere matters of detail, he thought that the advantage arising from the Canadians knowing the unanimity, or nearly the unanimity, of the House in passing those resolutions, would more than compensate the mischief which was likely to arise from his not pressing the points on which he differed from the noble lord at the head of his Majesty's government in that House. The hon. and learned member for Bath had that evening proposed to the House a new scheme of government for the Canadas, and had asked hon. members to explain why they hesitated to adopt it. He, for one, would give the hon. and learned member for Bath that explanation. First of all, he hesitated to adopt it because it was at variance with the recorded resolutions of the Canadians themselves; and secondly, because he considered it the most absurd scheme of government that he had ever heard of in the whole course of his life. He would endeavour by a few observations to make the House sensible of the two grounds on which he had determined to reject the proposition of the hon. and learned member for Bath. The hon. and learned member said, "I will have no elective council, but my new constitution shall be this—there shall be a governor, and elective House of Assembly. The governor shall also have the power of naming ten councillors, who shall hold their appointments during pleasure. They shall have no power but that of suggesting amendments to the measures passed by the House of Assembly. When they have suggested their amendments, the governor shall return the measures to the House of Assembly, and then, if the House of Assembly shall not agree to their suggestions, the governor shall be empowered, if he thinks fit, to propose a veto." This was the proposition of the hon. and learned member for Bath, from which he inferred, that the hon. and learned member wished to establish in Lower Canada, a complete democracy, or at any rate a republic with monarchial institutions. Now, this was directly contrary to the wishes of the inhabitants of that colony, as embodied in the resolutions of their House of Assembly; for, in their last resolutions, they expressed "their constant and unalterable conviction, guided by the principles of the constitution itself, and a long and sorrowful experience, that this state of violent opposition cannot be changed until the principle of popular election shall be introduced into the constitution of the legislative council." Hence he inferred, that the inhabitants of Upper Canada never would be satisfied until the principle of popular election was grafted upon the constitution of the Elective Council. And yet, notwithstanding this declaration on the part of the House of Assembly, the hon. and learned member for Bath came forward to propose a scheme which got rid of a legislative council, elected by a popular assembly; and when that scheme was already rejected by the House of Assembly of Upper Canada, appealed to the House of Commons, and said—"Here is a ground of accommodation—why do you hesitate to accept it?" He would tell the hon. and learned member, that he hesitated to accept it, because the hon. member had not proved that he had authority to offer it, and because it was already clear beforehand, that it would be rejected by the Canadian House of Assembly, on the principles of their own declaration. Moreover, the hon. member's plan involved a scheme of government which, of all the schemes that he had ever heard of, was the most absurd and impracticable. To expect that a governor sent out from this country, and without any connexions in Lower Canada, could interpose his veto upon the acts of the House of Assembly, and yet conciliate to his government affection and respect, was in theory absurd, and in practice would be impossible. How could the veto of a governor, who had no power to break the opposition of a popular assembly, give satisfaction to the people whom he was sent to govern? With respect to these resolutions, he must say, that he doubted from the first the policy of sending out the commission to Canada, and he must now add, that his doubts had been confirmed by its results. He had always considered it probable that the commission would be received, as it had been, by the Canadians, with jealousy, and he had therefore been, and still was, of opinion, that if a governor had been sent out to that colony, armed with full authority, and entering Canada as the immediate representative of his Majesty, and empowered to act in all things in his Majesty's name, he would have been more likely than any commissioners to have brought the existing differences between the mother country and the colony, to a satisfactory settlement. When he looked at the reports of those commissioners, and found that they did not give any new information on the state of popular feeling in Lower Canada, nor any new ideas as to the mode of governing that colony, and when he likewise found that the commissioners had given in a series of reports from which one of them regularly dissented, and that there was as great unwillingness on the part of the third commissioner to decide between the two others, he saw that he had not in their reports any safe guide upon which to form his own opinions. He believed, that it was generally admitted that the two main resolutions in this paper were the fourth and the eighth. It was hardly necessary to discuss the other resolutions, for the importance of the two resolutions to which he had just adverted was so great, that all the rest (as, for instance, those regarding the tenure of land and the local duties) he dismissed as of a perfectly subordinate nature. The condition of Canada, so far as its government was concerned, was this:—It was now five years, or at least four years and a-half, since the judges of that colony, and various individuals in official employment, had not received any remuneration for their services, and the House of Assembly had declared that it would not provide any remuneration for their services, or for the conduct of the local government, unless England consented to a change in the constitution of the colony. Till that were accomplished, the colonists threatened to put a stop to all communication. What course, then, shall we pursue? That, and that only, was the question then before the House. He would not suffer himself to be betrayed by the taunts and reproaches of the hon. and learned member for Bath into expressing himself with any thing like exasperation against the French Canadians. He sincerely wished them well. He had read the account given by that excellent officer, Sir James Kempt, of their national feeling and character. He believed that they were, in the words of Sir J. Kempt, a loyal and excellent people, liable to be deceived, and prone to view with distrust the acts of government; and his wish that they might long exist under the protection of the British government, remained unchanged by any violence into which they had recently been betrayed. If the Canadian people were a separate people, living on the confines of the United States, and if no other interests but those of the French Canadians were involved in this question, and if the question itself were not embarrassed by the state of Upper Canada and the bearing upon it of British interests in other American provinces, then, in case the British connexion was unpalatable to the French Canadians, and they supposed that by serving it they could promote their own interests, he should not hesitate to say, "God forbid that we should force British connexion upon them." He would go further, and he would not hesitate to say at once to the French Canadians, "It is more for the benefit of England, even than it is for your benefit, that the connexion between us should be dissolved." For when he recollected the state of certain duties which were imposed upon us in connexion with Lower Canada,—when he recollected the evil of collision with its powerful neighbour, to which we were exposed on its account—when he recollected that we might at any moment be called upon to defend that colony from all comers, not from any local interests of our own, but from a point of honour involving our character as its protector, he must say, that if it were a mere Canadian question, he should have no objection to see the connexion dissolved, and Lower Canada establishing its own government as an independent state, or if it thought itself incapable of supporting its own independence, seeking an amicable alliance with another power. But that was not the question at present before the House. He doubted whether, if he were to tell the French Canadians, supposing it to be a simple Canadian question, "We are ready to dissolve the union between us—seek an union, if you like, with the United States, or if you are determined on your own independence, form yourselves into an independent nation, and be prepared to defend your independence for yourselves,"—he doubted, he said, in such a case whether, notwithstanding the threats in which the honourable and learned member for Bath had indulged his genius, and the menaces which he had held out of 10,000 riflemen ready to start up against us,—he doubted whether, when we came to the point of separation, it would not turn out, that partly from good feelings arising from the connexion which had now subsisted between us for seventy or eighty years, and partly from the good sense of the people, calmly reviewing their own interests, and reflecting upon the powerful protection of the British people in the hour of necessity, they would not restrain their exasperation and reconcile themselves again to their duty and allegiance. But this question, as he had said before, could not be viewed with reference to the French Canadians alone. There was a British population in their province which had a right to look up to this country, not for predominance, not for exclusive privileges, but for British connexion, on the faith of the constitution which this country had framed for them. Look at the position of Lower Canada, commanding the entrance into the river St. Lawrence, and then ask whether a population of half a million had a right to say, "We insist upon a measure which, in the heart of the British colonies in North America, will constitute a French republic?" What right, he would ask, had one portion of our dominions on that great continent to make this demand? If the formation of an elective council were a good measure for Lower Canada, why was it not a good measure for Upper Canada, for New Brunswick, and for all our other American possessions? And if we were prepared to accede to such a fundamental change in the constitution of Lower Canada, how could we refuse to accede to it, if demanded elsewhere? But if we apprehended that the formation of such an elective council would endanger British interests, first of all in Lower Canada, and ultimately in all the other British provinces, then we must regard it as a question not affecting the French Canadians merely, but as affecting the security and tranquillity of our other neighbouring possessions. The question then again came to this:—"Shall we consent to let the judges and the other servants of government remain without salaries unless we allow the Canadian to attach to the payment of their salaries a fundamental change in the constitution of Lower Canada?" It was a disgrace—he would speak out plainly—it was a disgrace to the people of this country that its public servants in Lower Canada should remain year after year without remuneration. If they were to ask him what proceeding was most likely to diminish the respect due to British authority in the colonies, he should reply, that it was the continued poverty of those servants who were necessarily employed in conducting the public service. Were we to abandon the colonies to themselves upon points of such paramount importance? Were we prepared to assert, that there should be no care taken for the due administration of justice—no functions performed by the civil servants of the government? Although the hon. and learned member for Bath might call the persons in the employment of the British government "its howling officials," the House must consider them as honourable men, engaged at a distance from their homes in official duties, and must see them provided for accordingly. Their salaries were the means of their subsistence. Was it fitting that the King of England should have in his employment persons necessary for the performance of his service, and that they should remain for four years and a half in the discharge of their duties, without receiving a single farthing in way of remuneration? At that very moment the judges in Lower Canada were in a state of destitution, not only exciting the sympathy of individuals, but also diminishing the respect due to the judicial character. They were compelled, he had understood, to pawn their books and plate,—but it was too disgusting to enter into such details, and he therefore would not allude further to their distress. If remuneration were to be made to them, by whom should it be made? That was the next question which the House was to consider. It was not denied in any quarter that some remuneration ought to be made to them. The only alternative then left was, that either this country or the colony must provide them with remuneration. Now, as the service was local, and for the promotion of colonial interests, he did not think that the people of England would consent to make a permanent provision for these colonial functionaries. The means of providing for them should come out of the colonial treasury. The objection made by the Canadians to that course was, that they would only consent to pay the arrears on condition that England should make a fundamental change in the constitution of Lower Canada. No alternative, therefore, remained but that of interposing the authority of the Imperial Parliament, and of saying—"The remuneration of these functionaries must come from the colonies themselves." The act of the Canadian assembly refusing the usual appropriations, was an act passed but recently. The House would not, therefore, be called on to disturb any ancient system. What he doubted was, whether, if we were to violate a constitutional principle in this respect, it would not be better to adopt the advice of the commissioners on the single point on which they had the good fortune to be unanimous. The single point on which they agreed was—and they differed on every other point of colonial government—to advise the suspension of the Act of 1 and 2 William IV., c. 23. They stated their agreement upon that point distinctly. They suggested a doubt whether the constitution should not be departed from for a given number of years. He thought with the noble lord (Lord John Russell), that whenever the legislature should take a step which had the character of violence, it should be cautious not to proceed further than was absolutely necessary. In our contest with our colonies we ought not to be betrayed into any act which could place us, the superior power, in the wrong. He did not, however, see what advance we should make towards a settlement of this question by interfering with the Act 1 and 2 William IV., and in taking from the colonial treasury the arrears of salaries now due to the colonial servants. Suppose another year to pass away, and the salaries to be then again in arrear, we should still be in our present position—the scandal and disgrace of our situation would be the same; the exasperation in the minds of the members of the assembly would be increased by our interference; and, whatever might be the majority by which our interference was approved in that House, he could not see what inducement it would afford to the House of Assembly to grant the salaries then due. When men made their minds up to the contravention of a great constitutional principle, it did not make much difference in point of moral estimation as to the extent to which they carried their contravention. The contravention was the same; but the degree of irritation which it might excite was different. What he anticipated as the result of these resolutions was, irritation in the House of Assembly at the course which we were pursuing, arising from the conviction that, if it were available for the arrears due at present, it might be made equally available for the arrears which might become due after these resolutions were passed. He meant to say, that he would as soon consent to the abrogation of the Act 1 and 2 William IV., as to its suspension for the purpose of paying these salaries. [Mr. Roebuck: Hear.] He argued from the cheers of the hon. and learned member that he concurred with him. The hon. and learned member feared with him the repetition of this precedent. Then he would suggest as an amicable compromise, that the King's government should recede so far from their present proposition as to recommend the suspension of the Act 1 and 2 William IV., rather than the temporary repeal of it. He repeated, that the temporary repeal of it would only produce irritation, without attaining the object of the government. One of the resolutions to which the House had assented on the last night when this subject was before it, and which had again been brought under its consideration by the amendment of the hon. and learned member for Bath, related to the legislative council. He regretted the terms in which that resolution was worded. It said, "That in the existing state of Lower Canada, it is unadvisable to make the legislative council of that province an elective body." It was his opinion, that an elective council with an elective House of Assembly was but a bad system of government; and when he assented to the proposition, that in the existing state of the colony it was unadvisable to make the legislative council elective, he wished to guard himself against the inference, that if the state of the colony were altered, such a measure would be advisable. If he could agree to the principle, which he did not, of an elective council being an advisable measure in itself, he would say, "Let us establish it at once." It might be, that the absence of this elective council was at the bottom of all those dissensions with the colony of Lower Canada—and if it were, then we ought to lay the foundation at once of an elective instead of a legislative council. If delay in appointing an elective council were only justified by the existing state of the colony, on what ground could he refuse it to our other colonies, where the existing circumstances were not like those of Lower Canada? If the House of Commons was of opinion, that the existing state of Lower Canada was the only objection to the rendering the legislative council of that province elective, why did they withhold elective councils from our other colonies, where the existing state of things was different from that of Lower Canada? For these reasons, he objected to the terms in which this resolution was couched. He would not enter into any discussion on the other resolutions. In point of fact, he concurred in their propriety. He thought, that the bargain made with the North American Land Company should be maintained inviolable, as the national faith was pledged to it. He trusted, that in these observations he had not said one word betokening either hostility to the French Canadians, or indifference to their prosperity and welfare. He saw no hope of the connection between us being advantageous to England, if there were a permanent feeling among the French Canadian population that it would be disadvantageous to them. Most earnestly, therefore, did he hope that some terms might be devised, or that some event might turn up, which would restore peace and harmony between the colony and England. If he thought that the resolutions proposed by his Majesty's government were unjust, he would not consent to pass them; but he felt that they were just, and therefore he gave them his cordial support. If the House of Assembly in Lower Canada persisted in refusing to make provision for Canadian services, or attached as a condition to their making such provision, that their constitution should be altered, we were called upon to assert our supremacy, and to say, "We will not alter your constitution on such a condition—if you refuse to make provision for the services of your own government, we will not throw that burthen on the people of England—we will throw it on the shoulders of those on whom it ought to rest. We will interpose the authority of the Imperial Parliament, and will provide for the remuneration of the servants of the Canadian local government, from Canadian sources." He hoped that he had satisfied the hon. and learned member for Bath, that the silence on which he had commented had not arisen from a desire to shrink from any unpopularity which might betide those who voted in favour of these resolutions. At the same time, in justice to himself, he must say, that he should have voted more cheerfully for other resolutions, which, involving the same principles, had carried them further in practical extent, and which, by relieving us from the necessity of recurring to the same precedent at no distant day, would have facilitated the settlement of this question, and brought nearer the termination of these unfortunate dissensions.

Fifth resolution confirmed; House resumed; committee to sit again.

On the order of the day being read for the House to resolve itself into a Committee on the Canada Resolutions, Mr. Leader moved, "That their further consideration be deferred for six months."

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, the hon. and learned gentleman, the member for Bath (Mr. Roebuck), had proposed a scheme of government for the Canadas, which, of course, that gentleman deemed the fittest and most proper, as well as the wisest that could be adopted. But the hon. and learned gentleman must allow him to say, that he appeared to him to be a little too irritable for the framer of a constitution. On the present occasion, however, it appeared that all the irritability exhibited by the hon. and learned gentleman, arose from his having expressed an opinion that the hon. and learned gentleman's scheme was absurd. He should have escaped all the phials of wrath that the hon. and learned gentleman had poured out upon him, if he had not used the word "absurd," in reference to the famous scheme of government he had propounded. He (Sir R. Peel) was sorry, however, notwithstanding all the hon. and learned gentleman's indignation, that subsequent reflection only confirmed his first impression with respect to that scheme. His original impression was, as he had stated it to be, that the scheme was absurd—intervening reflection induced him to retain the same opinion. He still thought it absurd. When he said this, he intended to speak with no disrespect of the hon. and learned gentleman himself—he applied the term not to the hon. and learned gentleman, but to his plan. But when the hon. and learned gentleman spoke of his (Sir R. Peel's) ignorance upon colonial matters, the hon. and learned gentleman must allow him to say, that he thought the hon. and learned gentleman had only proved his own. He did not profess to be very abundantly versed in colonial affairs. But what was the course that the hon. and learned gentleman had pursued? Suddenly, and without any previous notice, he came forward with a plan of his own, and, in asking the House to adopt it, proposed at once to change the whole course of policy suggested by the government, and to postpone the resolutions that had been brought forward, in order that his scheme might go forth to the Canadian people. "And," said the hon. and learned gentleman, addressing himself particularly to him (Sir R. Peel), "You are entirely wrong in supposing that my plan would not be acceptable to the Canadian people: you said, that the Roman Catholic Relief bill was not necessary—you were wrong; you said, that Parliamentary Reform was not required—you were wrong; you say now, that the people of Canada will not like my plan—there, again, I tell you, you are wrong.” This was the line of argument adopted by the hon. and learned gentleman. Now, was it borne out by the fact? Had not the people of Canada passed a resolution, declaring that they preferred a different plan? He presumed that the hon. and learned gentleman would allow that the people of Canada knew at least what their own views were, even if they did not understand their own interests. He had read an extract from a Canadian resolution, by which it appeared, that so far from preferring a legislative council, holding office at the pleasure and mere will of the Crown, the people of the Canadas expressed and placed upon record an opinion, that the form of council which they preferred was a council elected by the people. What right, then, had he to infer that the plan of the hon. and learned gentleman would be acceptable to the Canadian people, when he had before him the strongest evidence to the contrary? His impression upon the point was not founded upon surmise; he had before him the declaration of the Canadians, that the form of council that they preferred was a council deriving its existence and its authority from them by election. Such were their views; yet the hon. and learned gentleman told him, that by not agreeing to his plan, he (Sir Robert Peel) proved himself utterly and entirely ignorant of all colonial affairs, because, in point of fact, a similar plan already prevailed in some of the colonial possessions of Great Britain. As he had before stated, he did not profess any intimate knowledge of colonial affairs, nor had he of late inquired much into the colonial system of government; but he was greatly mistaken if he was not right, and the hon. and learned gentleman wrong, when he stated that the form of government which he proposed, already prevailed in some of the colonies. He was very much mistaken if in any one of our colonial possessions such a form of government prevailed. This was the point upon which the hon. and learned gentleman founded his charge of ignorance. “You contend against my plan,” said he, “and call it absurd, because it has never been tried or exhibited in any one of our colonies; I tell you, on the other hand, that you are totally ignorant upon the matter, because the plan has been tried, and does certainly now prevail in some of the colonies.” He had yet to learn in what colony it prevailed. Now, as to the plan itself, what was it that the hon. and learned gentleman proposed? “I object,” said he, “to a council appointed for life, and at the will of the Crown, and, therefore, I propose to establish a council of a different description.” When the hon. and learned gentleman made that proposition, did he in fact propose to establish a legislative council? Just observe the gross fallacy of the proposition—“I object to a council appointed for life, and at the will of the Crown, therefore I will have a council established on a different principle.” He said, that such a council as that which the hon. and learned gentleman proposed would not be a legislative council. The hon. and learned gentleman’s proposition amounted to this,—that the present legislative council should be abolished, and that some other assembly should be substituted in its room. There were legislative councils in the other colonies holding office during pleasure, and appointed by the Crown; and indeed, as far as appointment was concerned, he knew perfectly well that the legislative councils of the Canadas were appointed by the Crown; but there was this difference between the Canadas and our other colonial possessions—in the former the legislative councils held office for life, in the latter they held office only during pleasure. But the question at issue between him and the hon. gentleman was this, “Is there any colony appertaining to the Crown of Great Britain, in which there is a House of Assembly deriving its authority from election of the people, in which there is not also a council, however that council may be appointed, which has co-ordinate functions with the House of Assembly?” That was the question; and if the hon. and learned gentleman did not know that there was no such colony—as the last thing that he (Sir R. Peel) wished was to bandy terms with him—he would not say that he showed his ignorance, but that he had at all events vindicated himself from the charge of ignorance, which the hon. and learned gentleman had levelled against him. The hon. and learned gentleman produced a scheme of government, which he (Sir R. Peel) understood to be this,—that in Lower Canada there should be a body, which the hon. and learned gentleman called a council, which should have no legislative power whatever, but which should have the agreeable task of washing up the dirty linen of the provincial legislature; of correcting, in other words, the blunders of the House of Assembly; but to whose labours, in their choice and enviable avocations, the House of Assembly should not be bound to pay the least attention. If that were a correct statement of the hon. and learned gentleman's plan, he (Sir R. Peel) repeated, that the council he would establish would not be a legislative council, but a mere body appointed by the Crown, with the power of humbly suggesting certain amendments that it might happen to think proper, in bills that had passed through the House of Assembly. Now, to the opinions or suggestions of such a body, appointed only during pleasure, it appeared to him (Sir R. Peel) exceedingly improbable that the House of Assembly would attach any great weight. He thought it most likely that the same difficulties, arising from offended pride, as regarded the adoption of amendments, would exist between the new council and the House of Assembly, as had already existed between the legislative council and that body; and then the governor, as the arbiter between the contending parties, would have to interpose his simple veto. Now, it appeared to him to be a course much more abrupt, and more likely to give offence to an assembly elected by the people, than if there were an intermediate body, composed of persons of as high authority as could be procured in the colony, and to whose decision all the weight should be given that could be derived from their occupying an independent station—it appeared to him that, à priori, the colony would be less likely to reject measures accepted by such a body, than if they came recommended only to them by the assent of a governor sent out to them by the mother country. That was the ground upon which, in the former debate, he had expressed his dissent from the hon. and learned gentleman; admitting that he had not had time to give to his plan a very mature consideration.

The House divided on the original question. Ayes, 182; Noes, 29; Majority 153. The House then went into committee, and clause 6 was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF FREEMEN.

APRIL 26, 1837.

Mr. Williams moved the second reading of this Bill.

SIR ROBERT PEEL (in reply to a remark by Mr. Mark Phillips) said, that it appeared to him that these two measures stood on distinct grounds. There was no connection between them. If the hon. member for Manchester was disgusted with the conduct of the freemen, and thought that, by relieving them of this tax, he was giving them an undue advantage, he ought to vote against the Bill. The hon. member said, that he had viewed the conduct of the freemen with disgust and indignation, but he was willing to grant them this boon if he could obtain any facilities for the £10 householders with respect to the rate-paying clauses. He thought the noble lord (J. Russell) took a very unjust advantage of this proposition. The noble lord said to hon. members on the opposition side of the House, "You are bidding for the favour of the freemen, and I will bid for the good-will of the £10 householders." There was no connection between the two questions. If it was right that the £10 householders should be relieved from the payment of rates before acquiring a right to the franchise, let them be relieved on the grounds of policy or justice; but they ought not to consider the freemen and the £10 householders as two adverse and antagonist bodies, and determine, that because one body was exempted from a certain charge, the other had a right to demand a corresponding relief. Let them ask themselves in either case, whether the proposed exemption was just or not, and relieve either the freemen or the £10 householders as they found them entitled, according to the merits of each case. He (Sir R. Peel) should certainly, if there was a necessary connection between the repeal of the tax on the admission of freemen, and the noble lord's proposition respecting the rate-paying clauses, reserve to himself the right of questioning, at a future stage of the bill, the propriety of relieving the freemen from that charge, at the expense of breaking down the qualification required by the Reform Act. He had always defended the rights of the freemen as they were established under the Reform Bill. He had never contemplated any extension of them, and he did not think that they had any right to call for such an extension. If it were contended that this bill would diminish corruption, that might be a good and valid reason for relieving the freemen of the charge imposed upon them; but if it were urged that a relaxation of the rate-paying clauses ought to accompany this exemption, that argument would certainly not have the effect of recommending the measure. The sole ground on which this bill might be supported, was not from any inherent right that the Reform Bill conferred on the freemen, because their franchise existed before the Reform Act passed: but if it would diminish corruption, that might be a very sufficient reason for agreeing to it. He was glad to hear the course which he had himself pursued, when the rights of the freemen were called in question, so amply vindicated by the testimony which hon. members opposite had borne to the virtuous and honourable conduct of the freemen. He felt assured that private electioneering motives had nothing to do with that testimony. It was given upon a comprehensive philosophical view of the abstract merits of the question. It was a source of the greatest satisfaction to him to find, on the most unimpeachable evidence, that those whose privileges he had always defended, were the purest and the most incorruptible body of men in the country. What an injury then, what injustice, would the House have committed, if the representatives of the people had had their own way! What a great example of purity would they have lost! And yet they were now told, that the Reform Bill was actually carried owing to the virtuous exertions of the freemen! The hon. member for Coventry had told them so in express terms. He did not tell the House, as the hon. member for Manchester did, that he had viewed the conduct of the freemen with disgust; but he declared that the freemen themselves were so anxious for the extension of the franchise, that with a virtuous disinterestedness, "above all Greek, above all Roman fame," they had forced their representatives to vote for the Reform Bill. Why, what ingratitude would it have been if the House had turned round on this virtuous body, and deprived them of any portion of the rights secured to them by the very bill which they had been so instrumental in carrying. The hon. member for Ipswich, and the hon. member for Chester, and the hon. member for Coventry, ought to congratulate him on his judgment. They really ought to originate a subscription for him for a piece of plate, for having exerted himself to protect the freemen from the consequences of their own virtue, and thus hold him up as a testimony to all future times, that merit would sooner or later have its reward. The hon. member for Ipswich declared on his honour, that there were 1,500 freemen who voted for him, and that his election only cost him £25. He had defended the right of freemen to vote, on the ground that it was an hereditary franchise, that it was limited in extent, and one which established a connection between degrees in society, which the uniform character of the £10 qualification did not admit of. He was glad to find an admission—he would not say a reluctant admission, as he was quite sure their votes would not be given with a reference to private electioneering interests—on the part of hon. members opposite, of the justice of these views, an admission which entirely reconciled him to the vituperations which he had received from the Attorney-general and several hon. members on the ministerial benches, for having defended the rights of this virtuous body, when the House of Commons was prepared to deprive them of those rights. When, however, he was asked to carry those rights further, and to relieve the freemen from a pecuniary charge which lay upon them before the passing of the Reform Bill, he must say, that if one of the necessary consequences of yielding to this request was to be the breaking down of the qualification established under the Reform Act, he should hesitate before he gave his final assent to this measure.

The bill was read a second time.

POOR LAWS (IRELAND.)

MAY 1, 1837.

In the adjourned debate on the question, that this Bill be read a second time,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he begged to differ from the hon. gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Pryme), as to the reason he had given for objecting to the principle of this measure. It appeared to him, that if the objection the hon. gentleman had urged were valid with regard to an Irish poor-law, it would be equally so against any poor-law whatever, because it was utterly impossible to raise money for such a purpose, without, in some degree, diminishing the fund to be expended in the employment of productive labour. The same objection was applicable to every case in which money was raised by way of a rate. It was urged that a poor-law in Ireland would put an end to all private charity—to all voluntary acts of relief—because it took away from the fund which would otherwise be devoted to the employment of labour; but he apprehended that the just object of a poor-law was not the employment of productive labour, but the establishment of a provision for the poor in cases of extraordinary destitution. It could not, however, reasonably be expected, that, even were employment so general that the most active stimulus to industry existed, there would not always be some cases where destitution, want, and misery, would have a strong claim upon the benevolence of charitably disposed individuals. If, then, such was the case, it was not fair to say, that one class of persons should, from their charitable motives, be driven to the necessity of maintaining the destitute. The real object of a poor-law was to provide for the destitute, and the moment they carried the principle of a poor-law beyond that, then it would be that they would be rendering it open to the objection of the hon. member for Cambridge. Let them go back to earlier times than the date of the 43rd of Queen Elizabeth; let them go to the reigns of Henry VIII. and of Edward VI., and they would find that the necessity of compulsory relief of the poor and destitute was even then felt. Parties, in the first instance, were asked before the clergy for voluntary contributions, afterwards sent before the bishop, and then before the justices of the peace, by whom, if they still refused to give them, they were liable to be committed. So that even, at that early period, they did, in fact, avoid the imposition of an unjust and unequal burthen—of a burthen that bore heavily on any one particular class. They did, at that early period, show by their ultimate application of a compulsory principle, what were the effects of a mere reliance upon voluntary contributions. At last, they were obliged to have recourse to the 43rd of Elizabeth, to the principle, in fact, of this Irish poor-law bill, for the purpose, first, of insuring some regular and systematic mode of relief in cases of destitution and want; and, secondly, of equalizing the distribution of the burthen with reference to those who were to bear it. It was his intention to vote for the second reading of the bill, and he did not agree with the hon. and learned member for the University of Dublin in urging the expediency of delay. But though he intended to apply himself to the consideration of the details of the measure in committee, yet it would be uncandid on his part if he did not state, that he had considerable doubts as to its results being by any means so favourable as was anticipated. So universal, however, was the feeling that a poor-law should be tried in Ireland—so general was the demand for some measure upon the subject—that it would be inconsistent with justice not to listen to the appeal; and, as it had become absolutely necessary that the experiment should be made, the sooner that experiment was made the better. He did not think that any doubt as to the consequences of the bill, afforded a sufficient reason for delay, and those doubts would not be removed by their remaining longer than was necessary on the threshold, as it were, of the measure. It was better first, to make the experiment, and then to found upon experience of its consequences, the basis of any alterations that might seem to be required. The best way, he believed, was to make the experiment at once, and though he was ready to admit that he had doubts as to the result, yet he would not let them operate with him so far as to lead him to think them a cause for delaying the trial of the measure. They had committees and commissions who had reported upon the subject, and if they were not now ready to decide upon the principle to be adopted, he feared that the intervening agitation might excite the public mind in a manner which would be highly prejudicial to the fair trial of the experiment; and he much doubted whether delay would tend to throw any greater light upon the question. Under these circumstances, he repeated he would vote for the second reading of the bill, and he hoped it would be allowed to take precedence of many other measures; and that, under the auspices of the noble lord, it would be allowed to proceed as quickly as possible, and be discussed in a calm and dispassionate temper, and with the absence of all party spirit. Some hon. gentleman said, and with some reason, that the favourable results of the English bill were presumptive evidence of the satisfactory issue of the present. Now, they had tried the workhouse system in England, and some of the results of the English measure were already under the consideration of the House. He had voted in favour of that bill, and he always would support it, whether such course were a popular one or not; but he was bound to say, that the experiment of the English bill was made under circumstances far more favourable than those attending the introduction of a similar system into Ireland. Up to this year employment had, in England, been general, and the demand for active industry great. But, in connection with the application of a similar measure to Ireland, there were important considerations to be attended to. He saw all the evils and all the disadvantages of applying a settlement to Ireland in such a manner as to confine the ideas of a people fond of emigration within certain limits. Labour, in fact, was nothing without capital, and to discourage the removal of it to wherever there was the greatest demand for it, would be an effectual obstacle to active industry. On the other hand, it was impossible to tell what the effect of this workhouse system might be, provided out-door relief were had recourse to. There might be certain parts of Ireland where they might give the people a right of settlement with advantage: and if, in the large towns and seaports, where the idle and vagrants were chiefly to be found, a natural connection with the soil were given to them, the whole burthen of their support might then fall upon the places to which they preferred to belong. But the bill refused relief except within the workhouse; and the poor of Ireland were about to be deprived of the same relief as that to which the poor of England were entitled; and this was attempted to be justified by the argument, that the English poor were entitled to relief by prescription. That was, however, a nice distinction, inasmuch as it was clear, according to the construction of all law, that the English poor were entitled to relief by law, as well as by prescription. But what was to be done when the workhouse was full, if no relief were to be afforded beyond it? That alone was sufficient to show, that they could not act rigidly upon that principle. He was afraid they would find their unions too large. He doubted whether, the principle of relief within the workhouse being once admitted, the system of excluding parties, living at a distance of perhaps fourteen miles from the workhouse, would not prove that the unions would be cumbrous. There was another principle of the measure to which he wished to advert. It was very discouraging that no one member of a family who was destitute, should be admitted within the workhouse without the whole of his family going with him; so that, where one member of a family of even ten children chanced to be disabled, that one could not obtain relief without that relief amounting to a provision of board and lodging for the other nine. The necessary consequence of this would be, the workhouse would soon be full, and three-fifths of the inmates would be active and able-bodied persons. Mr. Nicholls had drawn up his report with great ability and intelligence. He was a man of great personal integrity, and the whole tenor of his life disproved the assertion that he had any interest in party politics. He must say, that, to have heard such a man accused of party feeling when repairing to Ireland on so difficult a subject, was to him a matter of surprise and astonishment. Mr. Nicholls said, in his report, that as they would, according to the system he recommended, be able to compel all to attend to their natural duties, they would then be enabled to take sufficient measures for the suppression of mendicancy. He thought that the principle on which they went was not sufficiently wide to establish these two propositions. It would be difficult to perceive the consequences which this would produce at first, for some few years, in the position of the poor. By establishing a system of poor-laws, they would do away with those charitable contributions by which the poor at present existed; and he must say, that the social system in Ireland should be much purified before that was done. If they were once to create an impression that, because a man paid poor-rates, he was no longer bound to exercise the principles of charity, much evil might ensue; and he also could not help feeling that such a course would be calculated to call into greater activity than it now was, the process of summary ejection on the part of landlords against their tenants. This measure went to state that the whole of the destitute poor would be provided with board and lodging in the workhouse; and would not that operate to increase, on the part of hard-hearted and oppressive landlords, the disposition to get rid of such of their tenants as might be in poverty, and unable to pay their rents? This was a point well deserving of attention. It would be improper in him to give his assent to the present bill, without stating what he thought its practical operation would be; but if they asked him what other measure he would propose, to remedy the evils and check the abuses complained of, he should find it exceedingly difficult to answer such a question. He was well aware that it was more easy to relax than to bind; and, therefore, he was willing to admit, that if any attempt were to be made, the experiment should be, in the first instance, as rigid as possible. If it were wise to apply a system of poor-laws to Ireland, where poverty was so widely spread, and so large a portion of the inhabitants were in a state of destitution, he fully concurred that such a step should be taken with extreme caution, and this consideration it was that would induce him to support the present measure. He was of opinion that the proposed means would be too large; but still, as it would be easier to decrease than to extend them, he was disposed to agree, that the more rigidly they proceeded at first the better. He entertained some difficulty with respect to giving out-door relief; but, balancing his doubts on this head, he would yield to the present proposition, because he was aware that no system could be suggested which would be entirely free from objection. Thinking, that if the experiment of giving poor-laws to Ireland were to be made at all, it should be tried at once, he should forego his doubts, and support the motion for the second reading of this bill; and all he would add in conclusion, was, that he should gladly co-operate in remedying whatever defects might exist in the measure, and rendering it as perfect and as capable of working well as, under the circumstances, they could possibly hope to render it.

Bill read a second time.

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

MAY 5, 1837.

On the first order of the day being moved,—Sir William Rae moved a series of Resolutions, relating to the endowment of Churches in Scotland.

SIR ROBERT PEEL would be sorry to allow this subject to come to a conclusion without some member, unconnected with Scotland, taking part in the discussion. He should be particularly sorry if it should be inferred from such a circumstance that there was not as warm an interest felt for the welfare of Scotland, and for the spiritual concerns of its people, as for any part of the United Kingdom, among the members of that House who were not connected by birth with that country. In the few observations which he meant to make on this subject, he would confine himself to considerations of a public nature, and would not attempt to follow the example of the noble lord opposite. Supposing that in former administrations large sums of money had been voted for the purpose of carrying on a war which the noble lord might think unnecessary, but which the people of this country thought essential for the maintenance of the honour of the country, and for the protection of their vital interests—supposing the fact to be true, he would not say that they were therefore discharged from the necessity of attending to the spiritual wants of the country. The noble lord told the House that £140,000,000 had been expended in one year, he believed it was in 1815; and he believed also that it was necessary, to support the mighty contest that was brought to its final termination by the glorious battle of Waterloo. It seemed to him that the House of Commons had expressed its decided concurrence in the policy of maintaining that war; and, unless he was much mistaken, when the matter was brought to a vote the noble lord did not dissent from the address then agreed to. He thought that the noble lord might find, also, amongst his bosom colleagues, many of the most distinguished and cordial supporters of that policy. It now seemed that the noble lord was inclined to blame that war, which terminated, as he had already said, with the ever glorious battle of Waterloo. But the matter for present consideration was, whether there was conclusive proof in the evidence on the table, that the state of religious instruction in Scotland called for the interference of that House? The noble lord objected, he said, to a partial consideration of this question. He apprehended that, when the commission was appointed, the noble lord himself recommended that they should make periodical reports for the purpose of taking them into separate consideration. They had now before them the report on the state of Edinburgh, and there was no reason why they should not apply themselves to the consideration, not of the general principle on which hereafter they might extend aid for religious purposes, but that they might take into consideration the state of the metropolis, and that they should, if they approved of the principle of such a grant, make one which would be sufficient for remedying the crying evils that existed there. The reason so large a portion of the population as 50,000 were in the habit of neglecting divine worship, was given in the report. The reason, or rather the principal reason, was stated to be this, and all parties concurred in thinking so, namely, the disposition of the people themselves. This partly arose from their extreme poverty, and partly from the circumstance that their attention had never been called to the subject of religion, and they were totally ignorant of the duties it imposed. Many of them, according to Dr. Lee, did not know the first truths of religion, a large portion of them was sunk in habitual debauchery and vice, and were insensible to all the feelings of religion and morality. This being the state of forty or fifty thousand persons, he asked the House whether or not they thought that the advantage of applying, to a limited extent, some legislative remedy to these evils did not far counterbalance any speculative objections that could be made to it. There were some documents published at Glasgow, which he considered to be of the utmost importance. They stated this very striking fact, with respect to the proportion that existed between the commission of crime and the habit of attending divine worship. He begged the attention of the House to the simple statement of this most material fact. The right hon. baronet referred to the document to show, that in several parishes in Glasgow the number of the people who possessed church accommodation was in the proportion of two, four, five, and eight in the hundred, and upon further inquiry it was stated, upon the authority of police magistrates, and of the governor and chaplain of the bridewell, that nearly all the criminals who were tried or imprisoned within the gaol came from these places. Where, on the contrary, the number which possessed church accommodation was in the proportion of fifty, sixty, seventy, or eighty to the whole population, the police had no duties to perform, and the bridewell received no inmates. If, therefore, he considered this question in a purely economical point of view, he thought that, by giving the means of religious instruction and attendance at divine worship, a saving might be effected in the expense of maintaining the peace, which would far outweigh any advance that they might be called upon to make. The hon. member for Falkirk asked what limits there were to be to this interference. Now, he thought they might establish very wise limits; he thought that his hon. friend proposed wise limits. The principle might be applied in the first instance to Edinburgh, and afterwards they might carry the principle to its full extent throughout the whole of Scotland. The principle he would propose was this, that if the people themselves provided edifices, if by their own voluntary subscription they provided churches, then the State was to be at the expense of the endowment. They would thus establish limits, and narrow limits, to the extent to which they could be called upon for parliamentary aid, and they would have this conclusive evidence of its necessity, that before they granted parliamentary aid there must be a voluntary subscription on the part of those who had the best means of acquiring local information, and who were most chiefly interested in the local welfare of the place. He would not say, that it should be necessarily limited to this extent, because he could conceive cases of moral destitution in places where there were no rich proprietors who could afford to subscribe a sufficient sum for the erection of a church, and in these some further assistance would be required. But if they established the principle, that parliamentary aid should only be granted as a permanent endowment where the chapels were raised by voluntary subscription, he did not believe that the sum they would be called upon to advance would be more than £20,000 a-year. When he compared the inestimable advantages that would arise from the greater spread of religious instruction in a moral point of view, and even in a pecuniary point of view, from the advance of this sum, he could not hesitate as to the course that he felt called upon to adopt. Some thirty or forty years ago Scotland exhibited a most beautiful example. The people were better educated, they had a juster sense of religion, there was less actual crime and more of religion, speaking generally, than was to be found in any other part of the United Kingdom. He was afraid it could not be denied, that the character of Scotland had not maintained itself in this respect. It had increased in wealth, and in many of the elements of prosperity, but its people had not preserved that character of which they formerly exhibited so distinguished an example. He apprehended that the simple truth was, that the population had outgrown the means of instruction. Whilst the country was increasing in prosperity, and obtaining all the luxuries of life, the legislature had neglected to provide increased moral and religious instruction. A great influx of population had taken place into the towns, and in the towns they found at present the greatest instances of religious destitution, and the fewest means in proportion to the population of attending religious worship. He apprehended that the cause was easily to be ascertained. In towns, the shame of neglecting divine worship did not operate to the same extent as in the country. The landed proprietor, occupying a permanent position in his parish, had the chief interest in maintaining the moral character of the population; but these motives did not operate on the vast manufacturer, who resided in a large town, and who had not the same motive for attending to the religious education of the working classes, such as existed in the country parishes. He thought that the legislature ought to provide some means by which religious instruction should be provided for these persons. An objection had been made to legislative interference, which appeared to him to have no force. It was stated, that there must be always in the great towns a large population, who, in spite of every care, could not be brought to attend divine worship. Now this he conceived was the strongest argument that could be used in favour of legislative interference, inasmuch as it was their duty, where there were such persons, to attempt to reclaim them. It was these very classes, so deprived of moral and religious instruction, that brought discredit on the country, and endangered the peace of society. He admitted, that the mere building of churches would be of no avail. He admitted, that the providing free seats, and those too, of a respectable character, would do but little to remedy that irreligion which habitually existed; but Dr. Chalmers had not limited his plan to the mere extension of churches, he said, that at the time they extended church accommodation they must remove the barriers which prevented the people from availing themselves of the ministration of the gospel—they must add an impelling motive to induce these persons to attend divine worship. He therefore did not propose merely church extension, not merely endowments for those churches that had been already built, but they must circumscribe the exertions of the parochial ministers, they must give them a responsibility for the moral condition of the people under their charge, they must not compel them to confine their attention to their congregational flock, but they must give them a direct interest in the improvement of those who were attached to the church, and not only remove all barriers, but supply an impelling motive to their exertions. It appeared upon all sides that no such existed in Edinburgh. They need not commit themselves to the principle with respect to Glasgow, or any other place respecting which they had no evidence; but if they had a population of 50,000 persons in the metropolis who habitually neglected divine worship, and who had no means of religious instruction, was there any reason why they should not at once proceed to the consideration of that question, and supply those wants? If the principle were established, he should be glad of it. He would establish it to this extent, that where he found among the landed proprietors of Scotland so deep a conviction that evil had arisen from the want of church accommodation, that they were ready from their own means to raise a large sum of money for the construction of edifices, then he would say, let the State step in and provide endowments for these churches. The effect of this principle, carried to its full extent, would not cost the country much, but it would give a stimulus to subscriptions amongst all the inhabitants of Scotland. When the people were unable to raise a sufficient subscription, he contended that it was not only incumbent on the State, but its bounden duty, to provide endowments, and also to construct edifices for public worship. On these grounds he believed that the principle limited to that extent was advantageous. He believed that its benefits would far outweigh the speculative objections that might be made to it—that it was the interest of the dissenters as well as of members of the establishment—indeed, of all—that a moral and religious population should exist in Scotland—that it was their interest to see the ancient name of Scotland again conspicuous—and that that country should take the lead she was used to take among the nations of Europe. He should not only most cordially bear his share of the contributions which he should be called upon to make, not only should he not feel it a violation of conscience, but he should think it consistent with the soundest policy, consistent with the truest economy, and consistent with every thing calculated to promote the honour, the peace, and the welfare of the country.

The House divided on the original motion, to read the first order of the day : Ayes, 217 ; Noes, 176 ; Majority 41.

POOR-LAW (IRELAND).

MAY 8, 1837.

On the question that the House do resolve itself into a Committee on the Poor-Laws,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, I am extremely sorry that a discussion, so mixed up with party feeling and party interest, should have taken place on the question of a poor-law. I greatly wish the hon. gentleman (Mr. O'Connell), however legitimate his question may be, had taken some other occasion for putting it ; for I feel that, if we once permit party feeling to mingle in the discussion of a poor-law for Ireland, it will greatly prejudice that discussion, and materially tend to discourage the hope of a satisfactory completion of a measure which, as it is, is looked upon with very considerable doubt and anxiety. As the noble lord has made distinct reference to me, I find it necessary, not adopting a different temper from that in which the noble lord spoke, to say something on this subject. I understand from the noble lord, that it is his intention to proceed with those measures which were indicated in his Majesty's speech from the throne, as affecting the internal peace and tranquillity of Ireland ; with the consideration, namely, of the Poor-law bill and the question of Irish tithes. I rejoice to hear that such is the noble lord's determination, and I regard it as a much more prudent decision than the one I understood him to indicate on Friday last, of a contrary description. The noble lord complains of the course taken by the House of Lords on the subject of the Irish Municipal Corporation bill. I am bound to say, that I think that the course of the House of Lords is perfectly consistent with justice and good sense. I can say this with perfect truth, because the noble lord will do me the justice to remember, that when this matter was first brought under the consideration of this House, I expressed an anxious wish that, before we came to a final decision on the corporation question, we ought first to consider the other two matters. I said this with an abstract view of the question, and without any reference whatever to the course the House of Lords might think proper to adopt. I thought it of the utmost importance, that before we pronounced our final opinion on the Irish corporation question, we should be in full possession of the intentions of government, and the probable course the House of Commons would be called upon to pursue in reference to Irish tithes, and Irish poor-laws. I think the hon. and learned member for Tipperary must admit, that it is perfectly consistent in the peers to find an intimate connection between questions of this kind ; for in the very speech which he has just delivered, he himself said, that he thought the questions of Irish poor-laws, and Irish tithe, so intimately connected together, that he protested against the consideration of the poor-laws, until the House was put in full possession of the ministerial measure respecting Irish tithes. " For," said the hon. and learned gentleman, " tithe, in many parts of Ireland, is in arrear for three years, and, at Christmas next, will be four years in arrear ; before you impose a new rate of any kind in Ireland for the relief of the poor, let me know what is the final settlement you propose to make, as to the tithes in that country." Now, if it be the view of the hon. and learned gentleman, that two out of these three questions are so intimately connected together, that he declines pronouncing an opinion on an Irish poor-rate until he has ascertained the feelings of government and of the House as to Irish tithe, how can he deny to other parties the exercise of that judgment which he not only claims for himself, but pronounces ? or how could he refuse them the right of thinking, that the three questions have that intimate connection with each other, which he himself admits to exist between two of the three? If, therefore, I wanted any vindication of the reasonableness and justice of the course which has been pursued by the House of Lords, I find it in the distinct admission of the hon. and learned member. The hon. member for Middlesex seems to think that there is something in the course taken by the House of Lords which is disrespectful to the House of Commons. I beg to say, I myself have that feeling for the honour of a House, of which I have been so long a member, and by which I have been received with only too much of favour, I have that deep interest in its honour and character, that nothing could induce me to acquiesce in any course which I thought disrespectful to this House: but I beg the hon. member to call to mind, that it was distinctly intimated to the House of Lords, in the speech from the throne, that in the course of the present session, their attention would be drawn to "three measures intimately connected with the tranquillity and welfare of Ireland;" and that, on the invitation of the ministry, their lordships presented an address to the King, in which they expressed a hope that they might be able to make some arrangements conducive to the welfare and peace of Ireland, and pledging themselves to an early consideration of the three measures which were specified by ministers in the speech from the throne. If, therefore, the Lords concur with the Commons in the principle, that there is an intimate union between these questions, without any reference to the proceedings of the House of Commons, have not their lordships had authoritative and indisputable declarations made to them, that these three measures would be presented for their consideration, and if they think them so intimately connected, can anything be more natural or reasonable than that they should desire to postpone the consideration of one bill, until they know on what principle the others are founded? I before stated to the noble lord, and with perfect truth, that if the order of these measures had been reversed—if he had perfected the Poor-law bill, and settled the tithe question, I should then, on the discussion on the Corporation bill, have frankly stated the connected view which I took of all the measures; but as things have been arranged, the Municipal bill came in this House to its third reading, before any thing was known as to either of the other measures. The noble lord seemed to apprehend the possibility, that in the course now taken, some advantage is intended to be laid hold of this kind, that one bill will be passed into a law, and the other indefinitely postponed; for instance, that a Tithe bill, rendered satisfactory to the House of Lords, will be passed, and that then the Municipal bill will be thrown overboard. Now, this result would be altogether a matter of impossibility, unless this House were a consenting party; for, whatever the scheme of adjustment adopted by the House of Lord as satisfactory to them, this House is, of course, in no way called upon to accept it; and, therefore, the danger which the noble lord apprehends as possible, is altogether out of the question. I will not enter further into the consideration of these questions, being most unwilling that any thing of party asperity should connect itself with the discussion of a poor-law. I will merely repeat, that as reference was made to me by the noble lord, concerning the course of the House of Lords, I felt bound to express my entire acquiescence in that course; my conviction that it was perfectly consistent with justice and equity, to ask to see all these measures before it considered the details of one of them; my conviction, further, that had any other course been followed by the House of Lords, if they had at once proceeded to consider the details of the Corporation bill, such a course would not have facilitated an amicable settlement of the questions, but would, on the contrary, more probably have led to their indefinite postponement; and lastly, my conviction that, in the course so adopted, there could have been no intention to offer disrespect to the House of Commons. I believe that no such disrespect was intended; the proceedings of the House of Lords had no necessary reference to any inconsistent proceedings of the House of Commons; their lordships' themselves declared, in their answer to the speech from the throne, that they would give full consideration to each of the three measures that speech pointed out, in reference to Ireland; and feeling as they did, the intimate connection between the three subjects, it was impossible for them fully to consider the one, without being in possession of the principles on which the other two were founded.

The House then went into Committee.

VOTE BY PROXY.

MAY 9, 1837.

On the order of the day being read for going into Committee on the Irish Poor-law Bill, Mr. T. Duncombe moved a Resolution, for the discontinuance of the system of Voting by Proxy.

SIR ROBERT PEEL stated, that when his noble friend rose to address the House, a similar train of thought had passed through his mind as had been so ably just urged by his noble friend. He trusted the House would not come to a vote on the present motion, until they were aware of the principle involved in the motion, and also considered how they would hereafter deal with this principle. In the bill which they would have to consider, he trusted immediately after the present motion was disposed of, he found the following expression:—"And he it enacted, that it shall be lawful for any rate-payer, from time to time, by writing under his hand, to appoint any person to vote as his proxy in respect of any property not in the actual occupation of such rate-payer, and any such appointment shall remain in force until revoked." The hon. gentleman had made an inquiry of one of the members of the Tower Hamlets. He doubted not that hon. gentleman would have agreed with him had he been present; but, as both the members for that borough were absent, he had no doubt but that they had paired off. He agreed in what had been said by his noble friend as to the custom of members pairing, and he thought while his noble friend was speaking, that he would endeavour to draw up some resolutions as to their own practices, which should be passed before they tried their apprentice hands on another assembly. His resolutions were to this effect: - First, "Resolved, that the practice of letting members of any deliberative legislative assembly vote, without having heard all the arguments on both sides of the question, was incompatible with every principle of justice." His second resolution was this,—"Resolved, that the absence of members by pairing for several hours for the purpose of refreshment, and for several weeks at a time from the question under discussion, without hearing the arguments which arose on such questions, was becoming a source of well-founded complaint among all classes of the community." He would ask the hon. member opposite, whether it was not clear that they should attack the evil in their own House before what might be good elsewhere? He agreed with one suggestion that had been thrown out on the opposite side, namely, that they should begin at home. They could not speak to the House of Lords on this subject before they reformed themselves on a practice which, they had the high authority of the hon. gentleman for saying it, was bringing them into contempt. But supposing that the amendment of the hon. member for Finsbury was carried, and was ordered to be sent up to another place—supposing, also, that an amicable conference took place, what should prevent the other House presenting them in return with a counter resolution? The hon. gentleman proposed that this resolution should be presented to the Lords. He (Sir R. Peel) would propose that after passing the resolution he had read, as to not hearing arguments, and to the practice of pairing, the following resolution should be adopted:—"Resolved, thirdly, that the hon. member for Mary-le-bone be requested to bring in a bill founded on the previous resolutions." He would do this, because the hon. gentleman stated last night, that he was a metropolitan member, and that he was convinced that the question before the House was regarded by the country as one of vital importance, and in comparison with which the Reform Bill was nothing. He said, that he was only prepared with a crude speech, but feeling the vital interest of this question he felt bound to speak; but he concluded with stating, that he had paired-off till ten o'clock. He stated, with a degree of kindness and candour that could not be surpassed, that he thought it was too much for the House to come to a decision on this important question during the hour devoted to taking refreshment. He observed that he had paired-off from seven to ten, and he earnestly entreated the House not to conclude the debate till ten o'clock. Seeing, however, the indisposition of the House to pause till ten o'clock, that his constituents might not think that he was absent, he had thought it is duty to make this crude and undigested speech to show the reason why he was elsewhere. Before they proceeded to discuss the clauses of the bill which took away the right of proxy from the other branch of the legislature, ought they not to consider what took place last night when one of the metropolitan colleagues of the hon. gentlemen said, that he had paired-off till ten o'clock, but had spoken to shew that he was present? What figure would they make before the House of Lords in presenting the resolution of the hon. gentleman if this matter should become known? Therefore he would give this advice—namely, that they should not proceed with the resolution, but get rid of it by allowing the House to go into committee on the Irish Poor-law bill. It was not prudent to attempt to take away any of the privileges of a co-equal and independent branch of the legislature; they should take the beam out of their own eye, before they attempted to take the mote out of another's.

The House then went into committee.

CHURCH-RATES.

MAY 23, 1837.

Mr. Bernal brought up the Report of the Committee on the Church-Rates regulation. On the motion that the resolutions be read a second time—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that one of the inconveniences which attended protracted debates was, that so many topics were touched upon in the course of every speech addressed to the House, which had no immediate reference to the subject-matter of debate, that the attention of the House was diverted from those main considerations by which its decisions should be influenced. It was five-and-thirty minutes from the time the right hon. gentleman opposite commenced his speech, before he applied himself in any respect whatever to the subject before the House. Five-and-thirty minutes were expended in graceful preludings, before they heard the burden of the right hon. gentleman's song. He promised the House that he would not occupy so much time in the main discussion of his argument against the measure; and he said this, because he had a different object in view from the right hon. gentleman, who was too skilful not to know that it was better to allude to any thing than the matter before the House. The true policy of the case was, that the attention of the House should not be directed to extraneous topics, which could not influence any rational men in forming an opinion on this subject. The question they were called upon to decide on that occasion was, whether, in that, the richest and most prosperous country visited by the light of heaven—and finding that there existed for ages a direct contribution for the maintenance of the fabrics of the Church Establishment—they would abolish such payment of Church-rates? For time out of mind, all property in the country had been liable to a contribution for this purpose; but for the last 300 or 400 years, the landed proprietors had been more particularly called upon to keep up the fabrics of the national church. Most of this property was in the possession of those in connection with the church, and the proprietors of those estates, who had the greater portion of the amount to pay, did not wish to be relieved from this burthen. They were now told, that an equivalent could be found for this impost in the property of the church itself, and this on the single pretext, that it would relieve the conscientious scruples of certain persons who dissented from the church. This was the subject-matter of the proposition before the House. The right hon. gentleman, and the rest of his Majesty's ministers, said they had found an equivalent for Church-rates. True it was, that the fabrics of the church must be maintained, and all the members of the government, until within the last six months, said, that if these rates were abolished, an equivalent must be provided by the state. The new proposition was, that the landed proprietors, nine-tenths of whom had no conscientious scruples as to the payment of Church-rates, should have their estates—which had ever been liable to the charge of these rates, and in consequence of the existence of which, every owner, be he Dissenter or Churchman, made a proportionate reduction in the price when he purchased it—relieved from the burthen, and that an equivalent should be taken from the funds of the church to provide for these matters, now charged on the Church-rates. Would any one deny, that this was the principle of the proposition of the right hon. gentleman? The right hon.

gentleman must know what were the opinions of impartial men on his proposition. He knew the censure that was passed on the Irish parliament for abolishing the tithe of agistment. He must have heard the condemnation of the lay legislators, who robbed the church to increase the value of their own property. What did they propose to do in this instance? Did any one deny that the land was subject to this charge; and was it not proposed to relieve the landowners from the payment, and throw it on the church? And was the church rich enough to afford it? He would answer that question by referring to an authority which they could not deny. The whole of the speech of the hon. and learned member for Liskeard, delivered this night, tended to show that the church was overburthened with wealth—that it had ample funds for the extension of religious instruction, and the abolition of Church-rates too; but the Report of the Church Commissioners, which five of the members of his Majesty's government had signed, stated that such was the destitution of the means of religious worship, that the church possessed no funds which would afford an adequate supply. They described in that report the case of the metropolis, and of the great manufacturing towns; they admitted that the population had outgrown the means of religious worship; they admitted the inadequacy of the present funds to make the necessary provision; they contemplated a fund which might supply the deficiency, and the ministers now proposed to divert that from its legitimate course, and apply it to defray those expenses which the property of the wealthy landed proprietors had hitherto defrayed. They urged, in speeches and in pamphlets, that though it was true the liability existed, yet there were no means of enforcing it. Would that excuse avail them? His right hon. friend had referred to the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, which stated the law on that subject in these words:—"It is the duty of churchwardens to take care that the body of the church is duly repaired, and that all things necessary for the decent performance of divine service are provided. And the law imposes on all parishioners the burthen of raising, by Church-rates, the funds required to pay the expenses. To this extent the authorities concur." That report was signed by Lord Tenterden, Dr. Lushington, the Judge-Advocate, by, in short, all the most eminent legal authorities of the day; and it established this principle, that there was a legal obligation on landed property, to contribute to the maintenance of the fabric of the church. Did that obligation exist on their estates when they purchased them? Or did the vendor say it was true the legal obligation existed, and the right could be enforced only by a difficult process in the Ecclesiastical Court? If he had so stated, would not their answer have been—"Dr. Lushington told them, that the legal obligation existed, and they would not be so shabby as to look out for a mode of evading it, because the process of the Ecclesiastical Court was dilatory and embarrassing?" They would have insisted on the full payment of what was due to the church; and if the Church-rates amounted to the sum of £25, the value of twenty-five years' purchase would have been deducted from the amount of the purchase-money. Then, said the right hon. gentleman, there was the case of Ireland as a precedent. He maintained that that offered no inducement. So far from the case of Ireland being an inducement, he would say it afforded one of the most powerful grounds for exhorting them to avoid it. What was the consequence of acceding to their proposition? When it was made, they were told that the case constituted an exception to the general rule. They admitted, as the right hon. gentleman now admitted, that the Church of England and the Church of Ireland were united by law, and constituted one church; but he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) and his hon. colleagues were parties to a declaration made by the King, that the circumstances of Ireland were peculiar, and that they called for separate legislation. They said, that the Church of Ireland had greater resources than it required for the spiritual instruction of the people, and that there existed in that case that peculiarity which they now relied on, as a reason for asking for the acquiescence of the House in the present proposition. They urged, that in Ireland the vestry was an exclusive one, consisting solely of Protestants, and that was relied on as a reason for making Ireland an exception. They were told then, that the vestries in Ireland were differently constituted from the vestries in England—that the grievance was felt to be greater, because they were composed exclusively of members of the Established Church—because the Roman Catholics were altogether excluded. They were told, that here the Dissenters were not excluded ; here they had a voice in the granting of Church-rates ; but in Ireland, the peculiarity of the grievance was, that the vestries were composed exclusively of Churchmen. The very same party by whom that argument was used now turned round, and relied on that which was granted us, because of the peculiarity, as a reason why the principle should a fortiori be extended to this country. If they granted this measure, what security had they that five years hence they would not be told, that they had recognized a principle fatal to the existence of the establishment, when they gave up the church to be maintained out of its own revenues—that tithes were public property, and though, unlike Church-rates, they were a burthen borne by the occupier of the soil, the payment of them was disagreeable to him who dissented from the establishment? What security had they that his Majesty's ministers would not hereafter use that very argument which was now used by only a portion of the Dissenters themselves—that they would not urge the objection which had been made to Church-rates, and contend, that with the Church-rates had been abandoned the principles of a Church Establishment? A word now with respect to the conscientious scruples of the Dissenters. He was called on to make this change, on the ground of giving relief to those conscientious scruples. A broad and intelligible ground was the ground on which they ought to argue this proposition, but such was not the ground on which they did argue it. First, they proposed to retain the existing debts. They drew a distinction between the collection of Church-rates for the maintenance of the church, and the collection of Church-rates for the payment of a debt to be hereafter granted by an assessment in vestry. There might be good reasons for keeping to that arrangement ; but, so far as the relief of conscientious scruples was concerned, there was just as great a violation of conscientious scruples in calling on the Dissenters to pay Church-rates for the liquidation of a debt, as for the future consecration of the church. The right hon. gentleman, however, attempted to draw a distinction, and said he felt assured that no Dissenter would ask to be relieved from the payment of a debt. Why, if a Dissenter had a right to object to contribute to a rate for the support of a form of worship from which he dissented, he had just as much right to refuse the payment of a rate for the liquidation of a debt incurred for the support of that form of worship. He might say, that it was contracted by a majority, he having been a reluctant part of a reluctant minority. He might have resisted the imposition of the rate, and the incurring of the debt, and yet the right hon. gentleman admitted, that where the debt existed, the Dissenter should be called on to pay it. Surely, the calling on the Dissenters to pay for the liquidation of the debt, showed that they did not proceed on the broad ground of granting relief to conscientious scruples. Again, if they did maintain that principle, what would they do with the Dissenters in Scotland? They had never answered that question. In Scotland, they imposed on him who dissented from the Established Church the duty of maintaining the establishment. The land-owners had inherited, or had bought their property subject to that charge. And if some great landed proprietor, having so inherited his property, and being a member of the Established Church in England, were now to declare that he felt a conscientious scruple against contributing to the relief of the Establishment in Scotland, he would venture to say, that if they did not fear the retaliation of the argument, they would denounce it as a most dishonest proposition. But if they admitted the conscientious scruple—if they admitted the principle, that those who dissented from the Established Church ought not to be called on to contribute towards its support, he asked again, what did they intend to do with regard to Scotland? They had no scruples there ; but, if they had, he apprehended that they would find no bishops' lands to lay hold of there—there was no commission they could establish there for the purpose of administering ecclesiastical property. In that country there was no superabundant resources possessed by the church out of which they would be enabled to provide for the repair of its fabrics. Either, therefore, they must make the Dissenters from the Established Church still liable to contribute to the repair of the church, or they must provide from the public funds an equivalent. He had another reason for concluding that they did not mean to maintain the principle of observing conscientious scruples. When the case of destitution, as regarded the means of religious worship, was stated in a former debate, the noble lord, the Secretary of War, admitted the strength of the case made out of the want of religious education, and said, that it might be the duty of his Majesty's government to come forward with a proposition to provide out of the public funds additional church accommodation. If they took that course, they would thereby negative the claim of the Dissenters to relief on the ground of conscientious scruples; for a conscientious scruple would be more violated by a new proposal to give increased accommodation, than by continuing an impost which had been levied on property for centuries. Government might have a right to say to the Dissenters, "Your property is subject to this burthen, and we will continue it; but it would be much more unsatisfactory to that body of the population, when an ancient fund existed, to propose any new grant for the same purpose." It would be infinitely better, then, on their own showing, to apply the fund already existing to the object contemplated, than to reverse the order of proceeding, to set about finding an equivalent for the church revenues, and to provide increased accommodation to its members out of the public taxes. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said, that he argued that landed property was subject to this charge, whether acquired by inheritance or purchase, and yet that he had professed his readiness to relieve it by acquiescing in the proposal of Lord Althorp. Now, he contended, that the advantage of making landed property contribute to the maintenance of the fabrics of the establishment was the formation of a connection between the holders of that property and the national church. The support of an Established Church, it must be admitted, was implied when the state, either by a contribution levied from the landowners, or by a vote from the public funds, provided for the maintenance of its fabrics. Certainly he should, to some extent, relieve the land by acquiescing in the proposition of Lord Althorp, but in a very different degree to that in which he should relieve it, by taking the equivalent sum from the property of the church; because the landed property would contribute a very material part of the amount which might be granted from the public taxes. The landed property of England would contribute no small share of the £250,000 or £300,000, which Lord Althorp proposed to grant instead of the produce of the present Church-rates; but to deprive the church of that produce would be a simple and unrequited removal of the burthen without providing any substitute. His chief objection, however, to that course was, that it dissolved the existing connection between the Church and the State. He would throw aside all consideration of the mere sum of which it was proposed to despoil the church, and look only to the principles which such a proceeding would establish. Government proposed to make the bishops annuitants on a commission appointed by the state, the majority of which were to be laymen, removable at the pleasure of the Crown; and the heads of the church, instead of being proprietors, were to receive a fixed stipend, payable every quarter. How, then, could they tell him that they did not alter the condition of the episcopal order, when, instead of possessing a settled property, that property was to be removed from them? They might point to Ireland, and tell him that he had already consented to the enactment of a similar measure in that country. He would quote in return their repeated assurances, when they invited him to agree to the passing of that measure in Ireland, that it was a peculiar case, which did not necessarily establish such a rule in this country. The right hon. gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, had been satiating his curiosity by a perusal of Hansard's Debates, following the example of the hon. member for Tipperary, who had come down to the House the night before, loaded with the fruits of a ten years' search through its pages. Never had he been more alarmed than by the preliminary movements of the hon. and learned gentleman, the moment the hon. baronet near him (Sir F. Burdett) had risen on that side of the House. The learned gentleman came down, absolutely tottering under the weight of Hansard, armed with a formidable collection of instruments from that arsenal, having picked out his vulnerable points from the debates of the last ten years, ascending from 1824 to 1835, and attacked the hon. baronet with the seeming determination of making him a victim to his prowess. He was reminded of the revolutionists, according to Burke, sharpening their deadly weapons on the carcass of the Duke of Bedford, and coolly examining "how he bellows on the caul and on the kidneys." He thought the hon. baronet was to have been made the victim of the most scorching display of sarcastic eloquence ever made since that devoted peer had fallen prostrate, as the bos humi, before the withering scorn of the great orator. But he rejoiced to be able to congratulate the hon.

baronet on his escape. He rejoiced to say that the pillars of that noble edifice, to which the hon. and learned gentleman had offered his tribute of reverential homage, while he asserted that in its cornices birds of evil omen had made their lurking-place, remained unshaken, after all the puny efforts of the hon. gentleman's pickaxe and shovel. But the right hon. gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was not satisfied with Hunsard, he had resorted to the still more lugubrious reading of Acts of Parliament, and of private acts too; for it appeared that he had exhausted all the public acts in search of a precedent for the violation of Church property. The right hon. gentleman, it appeared, had succeeded in finding a private act which answered his purpose, that private act having in it numerous blanks which were left in it by the intelligence of the clerk, the right hon. gentleman admitting that it might have been intended that it should be amended when occasion required. Yet this was the only ground on which the right hon. gentleman vindicated the dispossessing the bishops of their property. He knew of similar omissions, which had occasioned fatal defects in titles to railway property. He knew a case in which, because the chairman of the committee had made a perpendicular mark through the figure 3, instead of a horizontal one, the Act of Parliament had limited the right of the company to their approaches to two years instead of three. He had also heard of an act, in which the penalty appointed was imprisonment, one half to be given to the informer, the other to the King. Unless the House wanted to establish the precedent of interference with landed estates, they must reject the argument of the right hon. and learned gentleman, who urged, that because the clerks had made a verbal error or omission, parliament should dispossess the bishops of their landed property. Another reason which might induce him to assent to the proposal of Lord Althorp was, that the substitution of a direct impost for the present Church-rates would so far operate as an equivalent, that it would establish the principle of a connection between the Church and the State. It would accomplish that, which Lord Althorp had declared in that House that it was the duty of the State to do, when on the 21st of April, 1834, he said, "The principal argument used this evening is, that no contribution ought to be made by the State out of the public funds, for the purpose of maintaining the fabrics of the Church. I entirely agree with the right hon. gentleman (Mr. C. Wynn), that it is the absolute duty of the State to provide the means of public religious instruction for the poorer classes of the community." The noble lord (said Sir R. Peel), who is just now taking a note, can tell the House if the present measure is calculated to retard or to advance that most sacred and important of all the objects of government. Why, when ministers made their proposition of 1834, they had this Irish precedent then before them. If they thought this Irish precedent of 1833 so indispensable, why, in 1834, had they proposed that the equivalent for the abolition of Church-rates should be derived from the public funds? The right hon. gentleman complained that an outcry should be raised against ministers, as being enemies of the Church, because they were enemies of Church-rates. With the motives and intentions of ministers he had nothing to do; if they professed friendship, he was bound to believe they felt what they professed; but their acts he had a right to consider. And this he would venture to say, that if, on any question affecting the interests of Dissenters, ministers had had a majority of 116, they would have considered that majority to be decisive in their favour. Ministers had a majority of 116 in favour of Lord Althorp's proposition, which they introduced with the Irish precedent before them. Perhaps ministers might say, "We never anticipated this extraordinary discovery of a new fund, for which the hon. member for Weymouth has given us such great credit." The hon. member for Weymouth declared, that his obligations to the right hon. gentleman on this account were extreme, though he was going to vote against him, and that he never could have thought it possible that this divine man could have discovered the fund. Did it never occur to the hon. gentleman, that they had dealt with the bishops lands in somewhat the same way in Ireland? Did the hon. gentleman suppose Lord Althorp did not know that the bishops had lands in England, and that, if he chose to dispossess them of their property and to run the term of tenure against the life of the lessee, something might be made of it? Lord Althorp, he believed, knew that; yet he never thought of applying such a plan as the present to Ireland. Ministers dealt with the estates of the Irish bishops in
